PREFACE.

THIS Cyclopædia is designed to fill a void which still exists in our general literature. It is especially intended to give the Laity, in a condensed and handy form, a great variety of information, culled from many elaborate volumes, and written by a great diversity of men, as to the constitution, nature, and practical working of the Church of CHRIST. It is to enable them to judge for themselves, upon the many questions of fact, and doctrine, and government, in our Communion, furnishing them the materials for forming such judgments, and for holding correct views thereon.

The importance of having the Laity intelligently taught concerning these things, cannot be overrated in our Church, where the Lay element is so conspicuous and powerful.

Nor would we wish it less prominent. The Church gains largely by the wisdom and sound counsel of its Laity. Hence the more accessible ecclesiastical information is made to them, the wiser will be their action, the more loyal their support, and the more conservative their influence.

While this Cyclopædia will be of much use to the Clergy who have not the advantage of libraries, yet it was not prepared for them, as they are supposed to have already a certain basis of information on these topics, and also opportunities of prosecuting their researches in any special line of history or doctrine.

Hence, only the outside, as it were, of many questions is shown here; for many of the subjects here introduced require volumes, rather than pages, and many minds, rather than one mind, to do them justice. As furnishing heads and data of thought and fact concerning the large circle of topics here introduced, this volume, then, will be of the greatest service to all Lay people, as well as furnish a convenient reference book for the Clergy.

In preparing this volume, the Editor, himself a scholar of much ripeness and breadth, has called to his aid writers of varying shades of opinion, so as to reflect, as far as possible, the many-sidedness of the Church's views on some of the practical questions of ritual and discipline. It does not represent one party or school, but gives fair and candid expression to many different minds and opinions, which are tolerated within the wideness of the outstretched arms of the Church of the living God. It is well that it should be so. In an age when no asserted truth goes unchallenged, and no opinion is uttered without subjecting it to the crucible of heated criticism, we want to know how these points are viewed by divergent, yet representative, minds, in the several departments of sacred learning. The names of the contributors show the range of minds, as the number of the different subjects treated show the range of topics embraced in the volume. The plan has been to let each man speak for himself, and so be responsible alone for his opinions.

Whatever will enlarge the area of knowledge, or give shape and definiteness to floating opinions, or throw light upon obscure points, or stimulate deeper investigation in this broad department of learning, cannot but prove a great blessing to all thinking and Christian men. This Cyclopædia will, it is hoped, fulfill all, or nearly all, these conditions, and it ought, therefore, to be hailed with favor, especially by the Laity, as a marked help to them in seeking after a deeper knowledge and wider views of the person and glory of CHRIST our LORD, as seen in "the Church which is His body, the fullness of Him that filleth all in all."

THE CHURCH CYCLOPÆDIA.

A.

A and Ω (Rev. i. 8, xxi. 6, xxii. 13; cf. Is. xii. 4, xlv. 6). The first and last letters of the Greek alphabet, used to express the eternity of God. Its form belongs to St. John's Revelation, but its meaning is found already in Isaiah. It was used by the Jews later to express the comprehensive nature of God. The symbol is generally assigned to our LORD. In the first passage, the symbol may refer to the TRINITY, but it is better (in view of the fact that in xxii. 13, our LORD gives this title to Himself) to hold that it is one of our LORD's titles, implying for Him all the attributes of the Godhead, as being the Source, Upholder, and End of all things. These two letters passed into early Christian use, being found in the catacombs; and into ecclesiastical Latin poetry (vide Prudentius, Cathem. ix. 10), and so into liturgical use. It is often used as a monogram in church decorations. (Vide Bishop Wordsworth's New Testament, Arch bishop Trench's Commentary on the Epistles to the Seven Churches, for thorough discussion of the meaning of AΩ in the Revelation.)

Aaron, the brother of Moses and the first High-Priest under the Law. His father was Amram, and his mother was Jochebed; his wife was Elisheba, daughter of Nahshon, of the tribe of Judah. He was three years older than Moses, and apparently, since God Himself called him "the Levite," he was of priestly dignity in his family. His was a far weaker character than his brother's. Able to speak well, ready, and not wanting in courage, he was given to Moses to be his mouth-piece, as Moses was the mouth-piece of God, i.e., the Prophet. In then his being first the Prophet and then the High-Priest Aaron becomes a type of CHRIST. He went willingly with Moses upon the mission. They twain went to the people and gathered their elders. Aaron apparently does the evidential signs before them instead of Moses, and after they had been acknowledged by the people, the two brothers go before Pharaoh. Throughout the first part Aaron acts for Moses: Aaron casts down the rod that becomes a serpent; he smites the Nile, stretches the rod over the streams, smites the dust. The two sprinkle the ashes of the furnace. Thence till the last stroke Moses acts. He stretches the rod toward heaven, for the storm of hail; over the land, for swarms of locusts. But the LORD reserved to Himself without stroke of rod or word of prophet the two death-plagues at the set time: the murrain wasted the herds of Egypt; at midnight there was the great cry. Aaron is withdrawn from the prominent place in the narrative till the Israelites reach the wilderness of Sin. Moses bids him prepare the people for the miracle of the manna. Aaron bears up Moses' hand with the rod till Amalek is discomfited. He draws near with Moses to the summit of Sinai, but does not enter the Fire and the Cloud. Now left to himself, he shows the weakness of his character. The murmuring of the people upon the long absence of Moses, and their cry for some god to go up before them, led him to collect the offerings of their golden ear-rings and to cast the molten calf. It shows him to be a facile and popular leader rather than a deeply-principled master of men. The worship of the molten calf with the rites due to the LORD perversely offered before it led to the sin of licentiousness. The end of it was the shame and shrinking on Aaron's part, the indignant discipline inflicted by Moses, and then his wonderful, loving intercession for the sinning people and his erring brother. The forgiveness was complete, for Aaron was immediately consecrated to the High-Priesthood, and it was conferred by a perpetual grant to his family alone. Here we have to call attention to the typical character of his office. It was his right to enter into the Holy of Holies once in the year, on the great Day of Atonement, with the blood of the goat and the bullock. He made the atonement when he stood between the living and the dead, and stayed the fire that burst from the LORD's anger. It was his right to offer asylum for his lifetime to the manslayer fled to the city of refuge. He could not share in funeral rites. The intercessory, expiatory, and ever-living work of our LORD are typified in these rites. Whatever defects in his private character marred its evenness, in his official character he was between JEHOVAH and JEHOVAH's people. Aaron appears again when he murmured against his brother. His commission, its grandeur, and its awful duties dazzled him. His sister presuming upon her office as prophetess showed herself jealous of Moses also. In fact, Miriam was the chief in the resistance to the Lawgiver's authority. Its vindication by God Himself was a severe lesson. Again, when Korah's rebellion ended in his destruction and Aaron had used his priestly function of making an atonement, then, as a further attestation to his office, the LORD chose to give the people the sign of his rod, with buds, blooms, and fruit,—a sign that was laid up together with the pot of manna before the ark testimony. Then God gave a special charge to Aaron that he and his sons, and his father's house, should "bear the iniquity" of the sanctuary, and he and his sons should "bear the iniquity" of the priesthood (cf. Ps. lxxxix. 50, 51, and the Agony in the Garden). His were to be the tithes, the peace-offerings, the wave-offerings, the first fruits, the devoted, the redemption-money of the first-born, of man and beast, for he and his sons were to have no inheritance in the land, but to be separate to the LORD. Aaron's character appears again markedly in sharing his brother's impatience at the rock, when he smote when he should have only spoken. Miriam by this time was dead, and the weary journeying was drawing to a close; now at the very end when the longed-for land was almost in sight, to be forbidden. He seems to have acquiesced in the decree. And when the command came for him to climb the Mount Hor, and there upon its top to have his priestly garments taken from him and put upon his son, and then to lie down and die there, in the sight of the congregation, his submission did not fail him. The Lawgiver, the faithful servant, despoiled his loved brother of the sacred vestments with which he had, at the outset of their journeyings so many years before, adorned him, "And Aaron died then in the top of the mount, and Moses and Eleazar came down from the mount." The real greatness of Aaron's character is overshadowed by the splendor of his brother's, but he was, with all the weaknesses so faithfully recorded in Holy Scripture, a far more perfect man than many others who are in their careers more prominently, not more really, types of CHRIST. His own shortcomings may have taught him that compassion which our Great High-Priest had learned, not from taint of sin, but by contact with and suffering from its loathsome effects. In Aaron's descendants flowed the blood of their mother, a daughter of the tribe from which our LORD took His Flesh.

Abaddon (Job xxxi. 12, Destruction). In Job xxvi. 6, the Chaldee paraphrast makes it mean the "house of destruction;" in Job xxviii. 22, its Chaldee equivalent is the angel of Death. It was also applied later by the Jews to the Christian schools Be'Abidan. In Rev. ix. 11 it is a title of the "Angel of the bottomless pit," whose name in the Hebrew tongue is Abaddon, but in the Greek tongue hath his name Apollyon (i.e., destroyer). There is much Jewish trifling upon the name. It is, however, one of the titles of Satan. The woe in Rev. ix., where Abaddon is spoken of, is interpreted usually of the Saracens, and he is named as their king.

Abba (Syriac). A peculiarly tender form of FATHER. Our LORD (Mark xiv. 36) uses it in His Prayer in the Garden. St. Paul uses it twice (Rom. viii. 15; Gal. iv. 6), in referring to our adoption as Sons through the HOLY GHOST (vide Confirmation). Selden and other writers say that the Jews had a law which forbade bond-servants to use the term father to their masters, so Paul used a term tender and expressive of filial reverence. In the Palestinian and Egyptian Churches it became an ecclesiastical title, and so probably passed into the West as Abbot.

Abbess. The Mother or Superior of an abbey of nuns, or female persons living under religious vows and discipline.

Abbey. The building in which a society devoted to religion dwelt; a monastery whose head was an Abbot or Abbess. They were quite numerous in England before the Reformation, and the title still clings to some of the churches. Westminster is better known as Westminster Abbey than as St. Peter's. In Cathedral Abbeys the Bishop was the Abbot, and the presbyteral Superiors of these establishments were styled Priors. Cranmer and Latimer tried hard, at the dissolution of the monasteries, to save some of the abbeys from confiscation to put them to reformed use, but did not succeed.

Abbot. The Father or Superior of a body of men living under religious vows. The derivation of the word is from Abba (Med. Lat. Abbas). The word Father, in its forms Abbas, Papa, Father, has been ever applied to the Christian presbyter as a title of respect, except in the later history of the English Church. An Abbot was elected either by all the members of the monastery, or by a part of them as a chapter. Abbots were divided into two ranks, Abbots and Mitred Abbots. There were in England twenty-five Mitred Abbots, who sat and voted in the House of Lords. Abbots were subject to their diocesan; but special exemptions were granted, for favors or by purchase, to many monasteries,—some owning obedience to the See of Rome, others to the Crown, and so exempted from episcopal visitation and reformation. The Abbot received confirmation of his office and benediction from his diocesan, and vowed canonical obedience to him. (Dugdale's Monasticon, Willis's Mitred Abbots, Encyclopædia Britannica, sub voce.)

Abjuration. A solemn act of renouncing all false or heretical doctrines which a person had formerly held. There is no authorized form in use in the English Church, though public abjuration has been made by persons at different times. A form was put forth by one of the houses of Convocation, 1714, but it did not receive royal sanction.

Ablution. A liturgical term for any ceremonial washing of the person or of sacred vessels. I. Person.—The washings of the priests in the Mosaic Law previous to consecration, and after it frequently in their ministrations. The washing of the feet, after our LORD's example, and according to St. Paul's question as to the character of a widow needing church aid if she have washed the feet of strangers; also the early ritual use of washing the hands before and after the celebration of the Holy Communion. II. Things.—So the ablutions in the ceremonial of the law. In early liturgic use a reverent ablution of the vessels with a little water for the consumption of every portion of the consecrated elements.

Abraham. The Father of the Faithful (Rom. iv. 16). The Friend of God (Is. xli. 8). The Heir of the World (Rom. iv. 13). The Solitary in the religion and worship of JEHOVAH. The grandest of the men of the Old Testament save his great descendant, Moses. The man through whose faith the world has received the blessings of CHRIST the LORD. The man whose name was changed by GOD as a sign of His blessing. He in his life and conduct stands forth as almost unapproached in true courtesy, noble loftiness, and simplicity. The patriarchal life he led is accurately portrayed in Holy Scripture, and can be, even yet, verified in the customs and habits of the Arabs, some of whom are his descendants.

He was the son of Terah, an idolater. Though Abram's name is first in the list, he was probably the second son. The sons of Terah were Haran, who died before the migration, Abram, and Nahor, who remained in Ur. Terah died in Haran, and Abram became the head of the family. The life of the patriarch is divided into four chief eras:

I. The migration from Ur to Haran (Charran, Gen. xi. 31; cf. Acts vii. 2-4). Here Terah died, and then (Gen. xii.) the command was given to Abram to remove from Haran to a land God would show him, and then he would be blessed, and of his descendants should be made a great nation, and a solemn promise of protection was added. He obeyed, and removed with Lot, his nephew. He first settled near Bethel, and there built an altar to the LORD; thence he went down to Egypt. It is strange as we read it, but in reality it was most natural, that he should have unconsciously distrusted the full meaning of the promise of protection. He was afraid that his wife would be taken from him, and he framed a deceit by having her say she was his sister. Sarah was taken from him, but Pharaoh was plagued of the LORD because of her, and restored her to him, and he was dismissed. From Egypt he returned to Bethel, and there upon the altar he had built he renewed his worship of JEHOVAH (Gen. xiii. 1-4). A wealthy, prospering man, with a large retinue, and a kinsman with him who also was wealthy, he was sufficiently strong to be safe from attack. But this very wealth, and the need of room, caused a strife between their followers, and they found it prudent to separate. Lot chose the plain of Jordan, near Sodom, and Abram remained in the hilly region. Here he received a renewal of the promise, which was a little more clearly and fully expressed, and he was directed to walk through the length and breadth of the land, for it should be his. Upon this command he removed to Mamre (Hebron), and there built an altar and worshipped. At this point occurs one of the most vivid of the incidents of his life. While crushing the revolt of the subject Sodomites Chedorlaomer carried off Lot and his family. Abram, with his three hundred and eighteen servants, planned a night surprise, which was completely successful. He apparently slew the king in the fight. Upon his victorious return, Melchizedec, the mysterious king of Salem, priest of the Most High God, met him with bread and wine, and blessed him. Abram paid him tithes and received his blessing as from a superior. Abram's refusal to receive any part of the spoil was a nobly proud act on his part.

II. The second period of his life is from this event and the renewed promise which followed till the third covenanted promise with direct promise of Isaac. This second renewal was still more full, and was sealed with a sacrifice and a solemn sign of a horror of great darkness in his sleep. He was told of the servitude in Egypt, of the deliverance and the establishment of his descendants in the land God promised him. To accomplish this promise Sarah persuaded him to take her Egyptian maid as a concubine; but the act was both a proof of his yet defective trust and of the evil of taking accomplishments into his hands. Hagar's insolence and Sarah's jealousy drove the concubine to run away from her mistress. Hagar was ordered to return and to submit to Sarah. She became the mother of Ishmael.

III. And yet again the promise was renewed when Abram was ninety-nine years old. God appeared to him, promised that Sarah should bear him a son, changed his name to Abraham, and gave him the covenant sign of circumcision. Still its fulfilment was delayed. Here occurred the touching visit of the JEHOVAH Angel with two attendants to Abraham, their warning him of the impending destruction of Sodom, and his earnest, persistent plea in its behalf. It was a proof of his growth in faith and in a trusting confidence. Again, however, he shows his distrust when among the Philistines. Afraid of being deprived of her (despite God's promise that Sarah should give him a son), he called her his sister, and King Abimelech sent and took her. God protected her, and warned the king of his error, who restored Sarah, with a just reproach to Abraham for his deceit. After this Sarah bore Abraham a son, and she called him Isaac, or Laughter, in reference to Sarah's laugh of joy when she heard the promise that she in her old age should have a son and also to his own happiness.

IV. The last main period begins with the great trial of faith to which Abraham was subjected. He was tempted, was proved in the highest form in the command to offer up Isaac. How could the promise be fulfilled if Isaac was offered, and how could a human sacrifice be acceptable to the God of Life? The command was couched in words which showed how precious Isaac must be: "Take now thy son, thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest." The Patriarch had learned that nothing could fail of all that JEHOVAH had promised, and he obeyed. His obedience and its result were thenceforth the very crown of faith and of the truth of God's promises, and became the type of the sacrifice of His sinless Son upon the Cross. It was so wonderful a proof of His trust that the gift was given him that the spiritual blessing he had should be given to all nations upon earth, and the Son of Abraham is the heir of the world, by that act in verity upon the Cross, which was done by figure upon the altar in the Mount Moriah. It was done, it is well to note, when Isaac could understand what was to be transacted, and his obedience, therefore, must not be overlooked. Was it now that Abraham saw the day of CHRIST and was glad?

Sarah died at an advanced age at Kerjath Arba, to which Abraham removed from Beersheba, some time after the offering of Isaac. The whole account of the death, the purchase of a burying-place in the land which had all been given to him, his courtesy and stately mode of preferring his request, and the high respect paid to him by the Hittites, and the simplicity of the whole narrative, make it one of the most touching passages in the record of his life.

He lived nearly thirty years longer, and married Keturah. It was, perhaps, not, we should suppose, fit for so holy and exalted a personage,—one so blessed and prospered,—but Abraham was living at a different era, with ideas current around him far other than those we are habitually using and living in.

He is a person, to us, so conjoined to the faith that he displayed that we cannot think of him as a man who, in that Eastern life, needed the care of some woman's hand to minister to him. At the age of a hundred and seventy-five years he died, and was buried by his sons, Isaac and Ishmael. Abraham is for us the type of the solitariness of the man of faith. Others, as Job, as Melchizedec, were servants of God and of great holiness, but he had still greater and more enduring blessings because of his faith. And this faith grew; it was disciplined and developed. The clash between this faith and his conduct that occurs in his career was rather the result of not seeing how trustfulness must penetrate the lower planes of our daily life and work. He believed that God would not forsake him; still, the emergencies seemed so pressing that he deemed he must do something, and he acted as he did. The consequences bore evil fruit for him and his children in the first instance, as the Egyptian maid gave him so much trouble, and a thousand years later Ishmael sorely distressed Israel. And, too, the daily life and authority of a man of lordly means, while it was a constant proof of God's blessing, tended to withdraw him from the finer, subtler interconnection of his religious life with the slightest parts of his daily life. But this he evidently outgrew. Again, to him we owe our salvation. To him, more than to any one man, we owe our Christian privileges. The children of Abraham (according to the faith he had, before circumcision) we are heirs with him of the world, not only of this visible, but of the world unseen. From him came the LORD JESUS CHRIST, through whom he, as well as we, received all the promises, and in whom they are fulfilled.

The more Abraham's life and conduct are studied the more thoroughly human do they appear. He was a great man, endowed with large capacities, with deeply religious and meditative characteristics, with power of will to rise to the height of the demands made upon him, and with a loving and a sympathetic strain throughout. His abilities and weight were early acknowledged by the peoples in whose neighborhood he dwelt. It was only by deep pondering and prayer that he could have been strengthened to meet the discipline God put upon him. The influence Sarah had over him and his deep affection for Isaac are proof enough of that best of all domestic bonds,—a loving nature.

Absolute. In theology, a perfect unalterable condition, e.g., Divine goodness is absolute; so Divine justice and mercy, without imperfection or defect. The absolute gift of redemption will be at the resurrection. Its gift is conditional here and now.

Absolution. The authoritative act of declaring God's forgiveness of a penitent. Cf. P. B., "Hath given power and commandment to His ministers to declare and pronounce to His people being penitent the absolution and remission of their sins. He pardoneth and absolveth all those who truly repent and unfeignedly believe His Holy Word." The use of this authority is confined only to the bishops and the priests. It is formed upon the authority our LORD gave His Church (St. Matt. xvi. 19, xviii. 18; St. John xx. 23). A charge thrice repeated at different times, first while preparing the Apostles for their work and then immediately after His resurrection. It is an integral part of the ministry of the Church to men, as it is involved in the sacraments of Baptism and the Eucharist. But its practical use was also long before involved in all sacrifices in the Levitical dispensation; and a notable instance of the declaration of absolution is in Nathan's reply to King David,—“The LORD also hath put away thy sin” (2 Sam. xii. 13). Our LORD making all forgiveness flow from His own person pronounced His absolution authoritatively. “Son, thy sins be forgiven thee. . . . That ye may know that the Son of man hath power on earth to forgive sins.” So to the sinful woman, “Thy sins are forgiven.” Then it was a development into Christian use of the germ which lay in the Mosaic dispensation, and was ordained by our LORD for the comfort of His own. As all power is His in heaven and in earth, and as He is ever with His Church to the end of the world, and has by a direct gift of the HOLY GHOST for that end endowed the Apostolate with the Commission, it must be of continuous and continual use in His Church.

“The special acts or ways in which the ministers of CHRIST are commissioned or authorized to exemplify this their power of retaining or remitting sins appear to be four acts of the ministry whereby the benefit of absolution is ordinarily dispensed unto men.

“The power of administering the two sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper to all such as are qualified to receive them, which is, therefore, called ‘sacramental absolution.’

“The power of declaring or publishing the terms or conditions upon which the Gospel promises pardon and remission of sins, which is called the ‘declaratory absolution of the word and doctrine.’

“The power of interceding with God for pardon of sins through the merits of CHRIST, which is the ‘absolution of prayer.’

“The power of executing Church discipline and censures upon delinquents, which consists in excluding flagitious and scandalous sinners from the communion of the Church, and receiving penitents again into her communion when they have given just evidence of a sincere repentance.

“In these four acts, regularly exercised, consists the ministerial power of retaining or remitting sins, so far as the delegated authority of man can be concerned in it.” (Bingh. Chr. Ant., bk. viii.)

“The minister can only lend his mouth or his hand toward the external act of absolu-tion; but he cannot absolve internally, much less the unqualified sinner. CHRIST Himself has assured us, that unless men repent, they must inevitably perish; and that unless they forgive men their trespasses, their heavenly Father will not forgive them their trespasses. Now, it would be absurd to think, after this, that a sinner who performs neither of these conditions should, notwithstanding, be pardoned by God, continuing impenitent still; and only because he chances surreptitiously to be loosed on earth by some error or fraud, that, therefore, he should be also most certainly loosed in heaven. This were to imagine one of the vainest things in the world, that CHRIST, to make His priests' words true, would make His own words false, as they must needs be if any outward absolution, given by a fallible and mistaken man, could translate an impenitent sinner into the kingdom of heaven.” (Bingh. Chr. Ant., bk. iii.)

The very formal words which our Church requires to be used in the ordination of a minister are these: “Whose sins thou dost forgive, they are forgiven; and whose sins thou dost retain, they are retained.” (The Form of Ordering of Priests.) We acknowledge most willingly that the principal part of the priest's ministry is exercised in the matter of “forgiveness of sins,”—the question only is of the manner, how this part of their function is executed by them, and of the bounds and limits thereof.

That we may therefore give unto the priest the things that are the priest's, and to God the things that are God's, and not communicate unto any creature the power that properly belongs to the Creator, who “will not give His glory unto another” (Isaiah xlviii. 11), we must, in the first place, lay this down for a sure ground, that to forgive sins properly, directly, and absolutely, is a privilege only appertaining unto the Most High. “I, even I, am He that blotteth out any transgressions for mine own sake, and will not remember thy sins” (Isaiah xliii. 25). “Who is a God like unto thee, that pardoneth iniquity?” says the prophet Micah (vii. 18); which in effect is the same with that of the scribes (Mark ii. 7, and Luke v. 21): “Who can forgive sins but God alone?” And therefore, when David says unto God, “Thou forgavest the iniquity of my sins” (Ps. xxxii. 5), Gregory, surnamed the Great, the first Bishop of Rome of that name, thought this to be a sound paraphrase of his words: “Thou, who alone sparest, who alone forgivest sins. For who can forgive sins but God alone?” (Gregor. Exposit. xi., Ps. Pœnit.) Irenæus tells us that our SAVIOUR in this place, “forgiving sins, did both cure the man and manifestly discover who He was. For if none,” says he, “can forgive sins but God alone, and our LORD did forgive them, and cured them, it is manifest that He was the Word of God made the Son of man; and that, as man, He was touched with compassion of us, as God He hath mercy on us, and forgiveth us our debts which we do owe unto our Maker" (Irenæus, adv. Hæres., lib. v. cap. 17). Tertullian (lib. iv. adv. Marcion, cap. 10) says, that "when the Jews, beholding only His humanity, and not being yet certain of His deity, did deservedly reason that a man could not forgive sins, but God alone, He, by answering of them, that 'the Son of man had authority to forgive sins,' would by this remission of sins have them call to mind that He was 'that only Son of man prophesied of in Daniel, who received power of judging, and thereby also of forgiving sins'" (Dan. vii. 13, 14). St. Ambrose also observes, upon the history of the woman taken in adultery (John viii. 9), that "JESUS being about to pardon sin, remaineth alone. For it is not the ambassador," says he, "nor the messenger, but the LORD Himself that hath saved His people. He remaineth alone, because it cannot be common to any man with CHRIST to forgive sins. This is the office of CHRIST alone, who 'taketh away the sin of the world'" (Ambros. Epist. lxxvi., ad. Studium). So, too, St. Chrysostom is careful to preserve God's privilege entire, by often interposing such sentences as these: "None can forgive sins but God alone" (Chrysost. in 2 Cor. iii., Hom. vi.). "To forgive sins belongeth to no other" (Id. in John viii., Hom. liv., ed. Græc., vel liiii., Latin). "To forgive sins is possible to God only" (Id. in 1 Cor. xv., Hom. xl.). "God alone doth this; which also He worketh in the washing of the new birth" (Id. ib.). Whence it is seen that the work of cleansing the soul is wholly God's, and the minister hath no hand at all in effecting any part of it. Having thus, therefore, reserved unto God His sacred rights, we give unto His under-officers their due, when we "account of them as of the ministers of CHRIST, and stewards of the mysteries of God" (1 Cor. iv. 1, 2), not as lords, that have power to dispose of spiritual graces as they please (Chrysost. in 1 Cor. iv., Hom. x.), but as servants that are bid to follow their master's prescriptions therein (Id. in 2 Cor. iv., Hom. viii. circa init.); and in following thereof do but bring their external ministry, for which itself also they are beholden to God's mercy and goodness, God conferring the inward blessing of His Spirit thereupon, when and where He will. "Who then is Paul?" says St. Paul, "and who is Apollos, but ministers by whom ye believed, even as the LORD gave to every man?" (1 Cor. iii. 5). "Therefore," says Optatus (lib. v.), "in all the servants there is no dominion but a ministry." "It is He who is believed that giveth the things which is believed, not he by whom we do believe" (Id. ib. Similiter et Chrysost. in 1 Cor. iii., Hom. viii.). Whereas our SAVIOUR then said unto His apostles, "Receive the HOLY GHOST; whose sins you forgive shall be forgiven" (John xx.). St. Basil (lib. v. adv. Eunom., p. 113, ed. Græco-Latin), Ambrose (de Spir. Sanct., lib. iii. cap. 19), Augustine (contra Epist. Parmenian, lib. ii. cap. ii. et Hom. xxiii. Ex. 50), Chrysostom (in 2 Cor. iii., Hom. vi.), and Cyril. Alexand. (in Joh., lib. xii. cap. 56), make this observation thereupon: that this is not their work properly, but the work of the HOLY GHOST, who remitteth by them, and therein performeth the work of the true God. "For, indeed," says St. Cyril (Id. ib.), "it belongeth to the true God alone to be able to loose men from their sins. For who else can free the transgressors of the law from sin but He who is the author of the law itself?" "The LORD," says St. Augustine (Hom. xxiii. Ex. 50), "was to give unto men the HOLY GHOST; and He would have it to be understood, that by the HOLY GHOST Himself sins should be forgiven to the faithful, and not that by the merits of men's sins should be forgiven. For what art thou, O man, but a sick man that hast need to be healed? Wilt thou be a physician to me? Seek the physician together with me." So St. Ambrose (de Spir. Sanct., lib. iii. cap. 19), "Behold, that by the HOLY GHOST sins are forgiven. But men to the remission of sins bring their ministry; they exercise not the authority of any power." St. Chrysostom, though he makes this to be the exercise of a great power, yet in the main accords fully with St. Ambrose, that "it remains in God alone to bestow the things wherein the priest's service is employed" (Id. in Joh. xx. Hom. lxxxvi., ed. Græc., vol. lxxxv. Latin). "And what speak I of priests?" says he (Id. ib.). "Neither angel nor archangel can do aught in those things which are given by God; but the Father and the Son and the HOLY GHOST do dispense all. The priest lendeth his tongue, and putteth to his hand." "His part only is to open his mouth; but it is God that worketh all" (Id. in 2 Tim., cap. i. Hom. xi.). And the reasons whereby both he and Theophylact (Id. in Joh. viii., Hom. liv., Græc., vel liiii., Latin) after him do prove that the priests of the law had no power to forgive sins, are of as great force to take the same power from the ministers of the Gospel. First, because (Theophylact in Joh. viii.) it is God's part only to forgive sins, which is the moral that Haymo (Halberstat in Evang. Domin., xv., post Pentecost) makes of that part of the history of the Gospel, wherein the lepers are cleansed by our SAVIOUR before they be commanded to show themselves unto the priest, "because (Theophylact in Joh. viii.) the priests were servants, yea, servants of sin, and therefore had no power to forgive sins unto others; but the Son is the LORD of the house, who was manifested to take away our sins, says St. John (1 John iii. 5)." Upon which saying of his, St. Augustine writes: "It is He in whom there is no sin that came to take away sin. For if there had been sin in Him too, it must have been taken away from Him; He could not take it away Himself" (August., Tract. iv., in 1 John iii.). There then follows another part of the ministry of reconciliation, consisting in the due administration of the sacraments, which being the proper seals of the promises of the Gospel, as the censures are of the threats, must therefore necessarily also have reference to the "remission of sins" (Acts ii. 38; Matt. xxvi. 28). And so we see the ancient fathers held that (Cyprian, Epist. lxxvi. sec. 4, ed. Pamelii, 8 Goulartii; Cyril. Alexand., in Joh., lib. xii. c. 56; Ambros. de Pœnit. lib. i. c. 7; Chrysost. de Sacerdot., lib. iii. tom. vi., ed. Savil., p. 17, lin. 25; vide et tom. vii. p. 268, lin. 37) the commission, "Whosoever sins remit, they are remitted unto them" (John xx. 23), is executed by the ministers of CHRIST, as well in the conferring of baptism as in the reconciling of penitents; yet so in both these, and in all the sacraments likewise of both the testaments, that (August. Quæst. in Levit. clxxxiv.; Optat. lib. v. contra Donat.; Chrysost. in Matt. xxvi., Hom. lxxvii., edit. Græc., vel lxxxiii., Latin; in 1 Cor. iii., Hom. viii.; et in 2 Tim. i., Hom. ii. circa finem) the ministry only is to be accounted man's, but the power God's. "For," as St. Augustine observes, "it is one thing to baptize by way of ministry, another thing to baptize by way of power" (Aug. in Evang. Joh., Tract. v.): "the power of baptizing the LORD retaineth to Himself, the ministry He hath given to His servants" (Id. ib.): "the power of the LORD's baptism was to pass from the LORD to no man, but the ministry was; the power was to be transferred from the LORD unto none of His ministers; the ministry was both unto the good and unto the bad" (Id. ib.). And the reason which he assigns is, "that the hope of the baptized might be in Him by whom they did acknowledge themselves to have been baptized. The LORD, therefore, would not have a servant to put his hope in a servant" (Id. ib.). And therefore those schoolmen argued, "It is a matter of equal power to baptize inwardly, and to absolve from mortal sin; but it was not fit that God should communicate the power of baptizing unto any, lest our hope should be reposed in man. Therefore, by the same reason, it was not fit that He should communicate the power of absolving from actual sin unto any" (Alexand. de Hales, Summ., part iv. quæst. xxi. Memb. i.). Our SAVIOUR, therefore, must still have the privilege reserved unto Him of being the absolute LORD over His own house. It is sufficient for His officers that they be esteemed, as Moses was, "faithful in all His house as servants" (Heb. x. 5, 6). The place wherein they serve is a steward's place; and the Apostle tells them that "it is required in stewards, that a man be found faithful" (Cor. iv. 2). They may not, therefore, carry themselves in their office as the unjust steward did, and presume to strike out their Master's debt without His direction, and contrary to His liking (Luke xvi. 6-8). But our LORD has given no authority unto His stewards to grant an acquittance unto any of His debtors that bring not unfeigned faith and repentance with them. "Neither angel nor archangel" can; "neither yet the LORD Himself (who alone can say, 'I am with you') when we have sinned, doth release us, unless we bring repentance with us," writes St. Ambrose (Epist. xxviii. ad Theodosium Imp.); and Eligius, Bishop of Noyon, in his sermon unto the penitents, "Before all things, it is necessary you should know that howsoever you desire to receive the imposition of our hands, yet you cannot obtain the absolution of your sins before the divine piety shall vouchsafe to absolve you by the grace of compunction" (Eligius Noviamens, Hom. xi. tom. vii., Biblioth. Partr., p. 248, ed. Colon). To think, therefore, that it lies in the power of any priest truly to absolve a man from his sins, without implying the condition of his "believing and repenting as he ought to do," is both presumption and madness in the highest degree.

And Cardinal Bellarmine, who censures this conditional absolution in us for idle and superfluous, is driven to confess that when the priest (Bellarmine, de Pœnitent., lib. ii. c.

4, sect. penult.) says, "I absolve thee," he "doth not affirm that he doth absolve absolutely, as not being ignorant that it may many ways come to pass that he doth not absolve, although he pronounce those words; namely, if he who seemeth to receive this sacrament" (for so they call it) "peradventure hath no intention to receive it, or is not rightly disposed, or putteth some block in the way. Therefore the minister," says he, "signifieth nothing else by those words but that he, as much as in him lieth, conferreth the sacrament of reconciliation or absolution, which, in a man rightly disposed, hath virtue to forgive all his sins."

"Evil and wicked, carnal, natural, and devilish men," says St. Augustine (de Baptism, contra Donatist., lib. iii. cap. ult.), "imagine those things to be given unto them by their seducers, which are only the gifts of God, whether sacraments or any other spiritual works concerning their present salvation." But such as are thus deceived ought to listen to this grave admonition of St. Cyprian (de Laps., sec. 7, ed. Pamel., 14 Goulart): "Let no man deceive, let no man beguile himself; it is the LORD alone that can show mercy. He alone can grant pardon to the sins committed against Him, who did Himself bear our sins, who suffered grief for us, whom God did deliver for our sins. Man cannot be greater than God, neither can the servant by his indulgence remit or pardon that which by heinous trespass is committed against the LORD; lest to him that is fallen this yet be added as a further crime, if he be ignorant of that which is said, 'Cursed is the man that putteth his trust in man.'" Whereupon St. Augustine (in Evang. Joh., Tract. v.) writes, that good ministers do consider that "they are but ministers; they would not be held for judges; they abhor that any trust should be put in them; and that the power of remitting and retaining sins is committed unto the Church, to be dispensed therein, "but according to the arbitrament of God" (Id. de Baptism, contra Donatist., lib. iii. c. 18). Repentance from dead works is one of the foundations and principles of the doctrine of CHRIST (Heb. vi. 1). "Nothing maketh repentance certain but the hatred of sin and the love of God" (August. Serm. vii., de Tempore). And without true repentance all the priests under heaven are not able to give us a discharge from our sins and deliver us from the wrath to come. "Except ye be converted, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. xviii. 3). "Except ye repent, ye shall all perish" (Luke xiii. 3, 5), is the LORD's saying in the New Testament. And in the Old, "Repent, and turn from all your transgressions; so iniquity shall not be your ruin. Cast away from you all your transgressions, whereby ye have transgressed, and make you a new heart and a new spirit; for why will ye die, O house of Israel?" (Ezek. xviii. 30, 31). (Dr. Stephens's Notes to Book of Common Prayer.)

Abstinence. A reduction of food for the sake of self-discipline. It implies a certain degree of voluntariness on the part of him who practices it, and also a power to determine how far he will or will not abstain. It is not to be confounded with fasting, though it is so often. As for total abstinence, i.e. from "alcoholic liquids," no Christian can take the vow in its fullest sense, as he must receive for his soul's health the Holy Communion. But St. Paul gives us the only true principle in, "It is good neither to eat flesh nor to drink wine, nor anything whereby thy brother stumbleth or is offended or is made weak."

Accidents. This term of ancient philosophy, which referred to the changeable parts of matter, as form, color, taste, as opposed to substance, proper, and the immutable properties of matter, was appropriated by later mediæval theologians to the alleged change in the elements after consecration at the Eucharist. The "species," or "accidents," were said to remain of bread and wine, but the substance was transubstantiated. It was a mere subterfuge for a logical difficulty in endeavoring to explain what is given us as a mystery.

Accommodation. A word used to express the manner in which Divine teachings convey and adapt Divine truths to our comprehension. These, it is evident, must be fitted to the capacity, development, and circumstances of those receiving these truths. Abraham, with his surroundings, could not receive what was given to David, or Isaiah, or Daniel, though he was the Father of the Faithful. So, again, the use of parables is an instance of accommodation. But, again, it is an accommodation to our limited power to speak to us of God's anger or jealousy, or that His Eye is upon us, His Hand upholds us. It would be impossible for us to understand many things revealed to us of God without some such accommodation from Him. But while fitted to our dwarfed power, yet they are themselves truths, which we are gradually enabled to understand better and to throw aside grosser, materialistic conceptions which the mere words would teach. Another form of accommodation is in the gradual additions to the fundamental elementary truths first revealed. Eve received a prophecy of CHRIST, but a fuller one was given to Abraham, and a still fuller to David, and so on. We practice this mode, rather of development than of accommodation, in teaching children. So St. Paul gave the Corinthians milk rather than meat. But a positive accommodation perverts the truth and therefore it is inadmissible, and any attempt to explain difficult passages upon such a principle must be condemned.

Acephali (without a head). Certain heretics who separated from the Church, following Nestorius, or who held Eutychian principles and were condemned by the Synod at Constantinople 536 A.D. The Church in Cyprus was acephalous, not being under the jurisdiction of the Patriarch of Antioch. So, too, priests who refused to be under a bishop were said to be acephali.

Acolyte. A sub-officer assisting in Divine service in the Latin and Greek Churches. His duty is to light the candles, hand the bread and wine, the water, etc., to the priest. In the Greek Church it is another name for a sub-deacon. In the English Church, before the Reformation, the name was corrupted into Collet.

Acrostic Psalms. Certain Psalms in Holy Scripture begin with the several successive letters of the alphabet, each stanza beginning with each letter in its order. There are twelve such poems in the Old Testament: Psalms xxv., xxxiv., xxxvii., cxl., cxli., cxlix., cxlv., a part of Prov. xxxi., Lamentations i.-iv. But Psalm cxlix. is the most remarkable of these compositions. It is divided into twenty-two sections, of eight couplets each; each division beginning with that letter of the alphabet in its order, and every couplet in the division beginning with the letter of its division, e.g., the first division begins with Ashre, etc., and each couplet begins with the letter A. Psalms xxv., xxxiv., and cxv. are of twenty-two stanzas each, the first line only of each couplet being acrostical. Psalm xxxvii. is in twenty quatrains, the first line of each quatrain being acrostical. Psalms cxl. and cxli. are of twenty-two lines each, and each line begins with a new letter in alphabetical order. But Proverbs xxxi. is in twenty-two couplets; Lamentations chs. i. ii. in twenty-two triplets, the first line of each triplet being acrostical. Lamentations ch. iii. is in twenty-two triplets, each triplet being in each line acrostical, while Lamentations ch. iv. is in twenty-two couplets, each couplet, in its first line, being acrostical. These remarkable poems exhibit well the rhythmical and antithetical character of Hebrew poetry, and its peculiar style of parallelisms.

Acts of the Apostles (The). Probably St. Luke did not give any title to his work further than would be implied in the term by which he designates this gospel,—“the former treatise” (Acts i. 1). In this, then, as in nearly all the other books of the Bible, there was no title or name supplied or prefixed by the writer. And as the heading Acts of the Apostles does not literally conform to the contents of the history, it would be better to give it its truer meaning, “Practice of the Apostles,” which is probably nearer the idea intended by those who supplied the title. For the treatise only records, and, too, partially records, the Acts and the Practice of four Apostles, SS. Peter, John, Paul, and Barnabas, with scarcely more than a reference to St. James. In fact, SS. John and Barnabas appear only in connection with, or in relation to, SS. Peter and Paul. The history, then, may be considered as the inspired record of what should be the Apostolic policy and practice historically illustrated by the actions of these representative Apostles; also as unfolding the expansion of the Gospel from Jerusalem to Samaria, and thence to the Gentiles; as beside in a peculiar way declaring the controlling power of the ascended LORD JESUS.

It is no lessening of the authenticity and inspired accuracy of St. Luke to suppose that he may have used written documents, easily accessible to one so situated as himself, for his earlier facts, and to have recorded what came within his own personal knowledge later in his attendance on St. Paul. But the whole tone of the Acts implies that though he may not have taken an active part, yet he was not only an eye-witness of the general course of the events he records, but had intimate relations with some of the principal actors. The minute touches in his narrative prove this, e.g., the description of St. Stephen before the Sanhedrim, and the spirited condensation of his speech; the mention of significant surnames; the detailed account of St. Peter's deliverance from prison, and his reception at the house of Mary, the mother of Mark, whose surname is John. Even the narrative of the conversion of Cornelius renders it probable that he was one of the brethren who went with St. Peter from Joppa to Cæsarea. Of course in the journeys of St. Paul we have the record of an actual companionship, though St. Luke was often separated from the Apostle by the exigencies of the mission work, as is clearly marked by the pronoun “we” used in many places, and then (when St. Luke was away) dropped for “they.”

The plan of the book, while the narrative passes on in a perfectly natural way from event to event, is not always evident to ordinary readers. But when we remember that the HOLY SPIRIT caused certain facts to be set down, and others seemingly even more important to be omitted, and that there is no waste or uncertainty in His purposes, His purpose, we may reverently say, is to record the work given to the Church to do, not the achievements of His servants. With this clue we can well see that it is an outline, sufficient, clear, definite, but very concise, of the work to be done, of the lines upon which the future officers in the Church were to move forward. It contains in its history the true solution of the problems which can be presented to the Church in the several epochs of her career. It is (to borrow the illustration of Bishop Wordsworth) the journal of the movements, directed by the Captain of our Salvation, of His officers leading His army to its final victory. The Apostles had much the same difficulties to encounter. And their mode of surmounting obstacles and their strategy and tactics are lessons to us in the present day. The plan of the Acts is simply a development of our LORD's direction, “But ye shall receive power, after that the HOLY GHOST is come upon you, and ye shall be witnesses unto me, both in Jerusalem and in all Judæa, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth.”

Beginning with the Ascension (ch. i. 1–12), St. Luke goes on to record the continuance of the company of the one hundred and twenty faithful in prayer and supplication (vs. 13, 14), and the election of Matthias into the place of Judas (vs. 15–26); then the wondrous outpouring of the HOLY GHOST (ch. ii. 1–4), and the attention it attracted, and the resulting conversion of the three thousand (vs. 5–41). Thereupon he describes the practice of the new community (vs. 42–47). Chapter iii. narrates the miracle of healing the lame beggar at Solomon's Gate, and St. Peter's appeal, and ch. iv. the arrest and imprisonment by “the priests, the Captain of the Temple, and the Sadducees,” with St. Peter's manly boldness, and their dismissal (vs. 1–22), and the thanksgiving, and their renewed courage by the grace of the HOLY GHOST (vs. 23–31). Then the community life is described (vs. 32–37), with the stern retribution that fell upon Ananias and Sapphira (ch. v. 1–11); the continued growth of the Church through the signs and wonders wrought by the Apostles (vs. 12–16); the indignation this produced in the Jewish rulers; the arrest of the Apostles and their defense; the private consultation and the counsel given by Gamaliel; their illegal stripes and release (vs. 17–42).

Then the narrative relates for us another step in the Church's development. It has nearly outgrown the swathing-bands of a mere community life. The increase of their number demanded a new arrangement for the government of the rapidly-growing Church, and this led to the establishment of the Diaconate and the special reservation to themselves by the Apostles of the duties of prayer and the ministry of the Word (ch. vi. 1-8). The new Order, however, shared in the work of preaching; specially Stephen (vs. 9, 10), who was arrested and placed before the council (vs. 11-16). Then follows St. Stephen's most characteristic speech (ch. vii. vs. 1-53), and glorious martyrdom (vs. 54-60). Out of the change in the interior organization grew this first martyrdom, and then the persecution (ch. viii. 1-3), which, without breaking up the Church, drove those who were active in the work of conversion to the third step in her work. The deacon Philip goes down to Samaria, and there (vs. 4-13) gathers in many of the Samaritans, but as yet no Gentile was admitted. Since only the Apostles could confirm, the College of Apostles sent SS. Peter and John down to give them the HOLY GHOST by the laying on of hands (vs. 14-16), and took the opportunity (v. 25) to preach in the neighboring Samaritan villages. Then follows the sending Philip to gather in the first convert for Africa (vs. 26-40). Then (ch. ix.) succeeds the narrative of St. Paul's conversion (vs. 1-22) his escape from the Jews, who lay in wait for him (vs. 23-31). St. Peter's mission work in lower Syria (vs. 32-43) brought him to Joppa, whence he was called to fulfill his work part in laying the foundation of the Church for the Gentiles by the baptism of the centurion Cornelius (ch. x.).

This brought on the second dissension within the Church (ch. xi. 1-18), which was settled by St. Peter's account. Henceforth, whatever temporary or local prejudice there might be, there was no contention about it. But this work was transferred, as soon as it began to be important, to Barnabas, who soon took Saul to labor with him (vs. 19-30). St. James's martyrdom and the imprisonment of St. Peter follow in the narrative (ch. xii. 1-19), which, however, soon reverts to Barnabas and Saul. But the Church has overstepped her narrow bounds. The mission, by command of the HOLY GHOST, of Barnabas and Saul to their work (ch. xiii. 1-3) inaugurates a new work. Henceforth, while the Jews are first appealed to, the Gentiles have the Gospel preached to them. This first missionary journey beyond the limits of Syria (chs. xiii. 4; xiv.) was important in its results, but really it led the way to greater changes. Saul becomes Paul, and is the leading speaker. Ch. xv. records the third and last struggle within the Church. The Judaic party made their last resistance upon circumcision. This was also settled; and now whatever bickering might arise, the policy of the Church was settled by this Council at Jerusalem in its Encyclical.

From this time forward the narrative is of St. Paul alone with the company he gathered about him (ch. xv. 36-99). But there is also a significant change in the policy of carrying forward the Gospel. St. Paul does not trust to his personal influence and constant supervision, nor pause for minute attention to comparatively unimportant fields. That is trusted in true faith to his companions, or to those chosen out of the new converts to be their ministers. He seeks centres and influential towns with the instinct of a general who plans his strategy and leaves tactical dispositions to his trusty subordinates. Only in Corinth and in Ephesus did he make voluntarily any long stay, and both were most important posts for the Church to hold firmly. His first journey is recited in chs. xiii. and xiv. His second in chs. xv. 36; xviii. 23. His third journey is recounted in chs. xviii. 26; xxi. 14. His labors are henceforth from a prison or a guard-house, ever in the presence of, if not chained to, a soldier, or else upon a storm-driven ship, till he is at last permitted, though a state prisoner, to dwell in his own hired house through two quiet years. These last chapters (from ch. xiii. to the end) are most precious to us Gentiles. With the direction of our LORD clearly set before us, they are the only record of the fulfillment of His command. This Book of the Acts, then, bears upon its front the stamp of consistent truthfulness. It is a faithful account, scrupulously accurate, of the chief and to us most important facts connected with the Apostolic founding, nurture, organization, and proclamation of the Church as the Body of CHRIST, which He purchased with His own blood. Its title, "The Practice of the Apostles," gives with concise clearness its purpose. When we question it we find that it gives us the Threefold order,—Apostles, Presbyters, Deacons. It sets before us the Sacrament of Baptism; the necessity of Confirmation; the daily celebration of the Communion; the observance of the LORD'S DAY. In it we learn the true Financial policy of the Church; the Apostolic authority for Episcopal visitation; the tone and policy of our missionary work; the power of sermons; the use of forms of prayer. In it is given us naturally, incidentally as a part of the narrative, the usages or practice of those who had the mind of CHRIST, and who had been instructed by Him for the forty days He was with them in the things pertaining to the Kingdom of Heaven.

This, as with every other book of the Scripture, has been subjected to the wildest, vaguest criticism, which is best replied to by pointing out that, as in so many other cases, the critics cannot agree upon any one common ground. Its text, which, of course, was copied out by writers in successive ages, has undergone some mutilation, and some slight variations have crept in, but there is nothing to throw the slightest shadow of doubt upon its genuineness or its inspiration. Nor is there any material variation in the best critically restored form of the text that can affect the sense of our Authorized Version.

Adiaphoristic Controversy. (Adiaphora, or things indifferent.) A dispute which arose and continued for some time between the followers of Luther and of Melancthon about the traditions and ceremonies of the Church. Melancthon was disposed to surrender them as indifferent for the sake of peace and unity. The chief opponent in the controversy was the Hebrew professor at Wittenberg, Illyrius Flaccus.

Adjuration. The binding of, or solemn appeal to, a person by an invocation of the Divine name, as the High-Priest to our LORD: "I adjure Thee by the living GOD that Thou tell us whether Thou be the CHRIST the SON of GOD." To this adjuration our LORD, hitherto silent, at once replied. Adjuration was a part of the form of exorcism which anciently was the prece-dent office to baptism.

Administration. The performance of a duty, or office, or function. It is used several times in the Prayer-book, as in the title to the Office of the Holy Communion, the prayer for those to be ordained, and in the Ordinal. In ecclesiastical law it refers to the distribution of the effects of intestates.

Admonition. Advice or warning. A word used to assert the advisory authority of a Bishop over his clergy, when they promise to follow with a glad mind his godly admonition. But it is also in the charge to the priest at his ordination. It is, however, now used in a harsher sense, meaning the first step of warning, which, if persistently rejected, must lead on to excommunication; following St. Paul's direction, "A man that is an heretic after the first and second admonition reject" (Titus iii. 10).

Admonition, Godly. The earliest form of an examination of a candidate for orders during the process of ordination is found in an Ordinal of the eleventh century, though questions were asked of Bishops, at the time of their consecration, at an earlier period. The questions propounded in our Ordinal are peculiar to the English service, and were framed by the reformers of our Liturgy in 1549-50. They seem, as Palmer has said, "to have been modeled in a great degree after the parallel formularies used in the ordination of Bishops." The last question is probably the most ancient of them all, and is found in manuscript Ordinals, written eight hundred years ago, where it is placed in exactly the position which it holds in our service, at the beginning. In the English Prayer-book the phrase used is, "Will you reverently obey your Ordinary and other chief ministers?" The Ordinary, according to Canon Law, is the Bishop, and the "other chief ministers" are such officers as are established by law,—the Archdeacon, Dean, or Commissary of the Bishop. But in our Ordinal is inserted after "chief ministers" the words, "who according to the Canons of the Church may have the charge over you." The reason of this change is found in the fact that on the introduction of the Episco-pate into this country, it was not deemed best at that time to introduce those other offices and titles, such as Archdeacons, Deans, and Rural Deans, which have so long existed in England. It will be noticed that the only chief ministers other than the Bishop whose admonitions and judgment the Deacon and Priest are to follow are those who are invested with such authority by the "Canons of the Church." This must mean the Canons of this Church, because the Canons of the English Church recognized these several offices and dignities; and its use here was evidently to restrict this vow of obedience to those whom the American branch of the Church by its Canons might appoint over them.

The only chief ministers recognized by our Canons as invested with any governing or controlling authority are those elected by the several Standing Committees, which Standing Committees, under certain circumstances, exercise "the powers and duties to be performed by a Bishop." For in case there is a vacancy in the Episcopate, the Standing Committee is the ecclesiastical authority of the diocese for all purposes declared in the Canons of the Church. And this authority is exercised by them when acting in their corporate capacity as members of that committee. There is but little doubt that the phraseology of the question was so framed in order to meet just such a development as is now seen in some of the dioceses where the Cathedral and Decanal institutions and usages obtain more or less, and which, perhaps, it was conjectured might in the future, in the great growth of the Church, arise as a practical necessity.

Confining ourselves simply to the American Ordinal, what is promised here? Reverent obedience; conformity to godly admonitions; submission to godly judgment—of the "Bishop and other chief ministers who, according to the Canons of the Church, may have the charge and government over you." But here the question arises, What is meant by the phrases "godly admonition; godly judgment"? This must be interpreted by the tenor of the office in which the terms are found, and by the general usage and explanation of it in recognized authorities. It is that admonition and that judgment which as a reverend father in God in the fullness of his Episcopal office he delivers in questions of conduct and duty in carrying out the provisions of the Church's law and worship. It is an "admonition" delivered in the fear of God, to whom the Bishop is amenable for all his acts, in reference to some course or practice which the Bishop, acting as an authorized ruler in God's house, deems wrong. It is a "judgment" made in the fear of God, and with a full recognition of his being judged of God; as to the right or wrong, the propriety or impropriety of some act or ceremony which, in the estimation of the Bishop, contravenes the letter or the spirit of the promise of conformity to the doctrine, discipline, and worship of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

It is not meant that a godly admonition or a godly judgment should be a perfectly holy and perfectly just admonition or judgment such as God Himself would give, because the admonition and judgment, being human, must necessarily partake of human infirmity and imperfection. Neither does it mean that such an admonition or judgment will be such as shall be sustained by process of law, because decisions of law are ever varying both in time and place, and the conflict of laws is a fact recognized by the most eminent jurists.

Neither does it mean that such an admonition and judgment shall always be wise and productive, for as "to err is human," so Bishops are not exempt from such errancy, and with the most devout aspirations and earnest endeavors to do right they may yet miss the marks of wisdom and prudence. But it does mean that when a Bishop under the realizing sense of his consecration vows to "banish and drive away from the Church all erroneous and strange doctrine contrary to God's Word," and "both privately and openly call upon and encourage others to do the same," and "diligently exercise such discipline as by the authority of God's Word and by the order of this Church is commended to Him;" does, on questions of conduct which he believes to be reprehensible or on points of ritual of doubtful interpretation and authority, give his official admonition and judgment touching these things, it is the duty of the clergy to reverently obey such godly admonition and submit themselves to such godly judgment. Yet this submission to obedience does not debar them the privilege or weaken the duty of testing the right of the clergy to their course and views by the process of Canon Law. For such admonition and judgment but takes the place of a temporary injunction in civil law, whereby a course of conduct is arrested and made stationary until judicial decision shall be had in the premises. So in these cases, if the clergyman feels aggrieved by the admonition of the Bishop or that he has been wronged by the judgment, he has redress in law. The ecclesiastical courts are open to him, and questions of fact, of interpretation, of issue, can be then and there settled.

Bishop Mant, in his "Discourses upon the Church and Her Ministrations," says in reference to these words: "The rule and limits of the respect and deference due may be judged to be that in all matters of spiritual or ecclesiastical concern, in all matters which affect the welfare of religion or of the Church, it is the duty of the clergy to comply with the advice and to acquiesce in the decision of their Ordinary, unless his authority be suspended by a paramount or superior power. If the Law of God or the law of the country clearly and indisputably prescribe a different course, their authority surpasses that of the Bishop and ought to be preferred. If neither of these authorities clearly interferes with it, then I apprehend they concur in sustaining and supporting it, and it becomes the duty of the clergy to follow with a glad mind and will the admonition of their lawful governor, though abstractedly their inclinations may lead them in a different course, and to submit their judgment to the judgment of their official superior, though abstractedly they may not be convinced of the correctness of his decision." (The Church and Her Ministrations, p. 236.) "It may be noted also," says Dean Comber, "that the candidates promise gladly to obey, that is, readily and willingly, without murmuring or too nice disputing, unless the thing enjoined be notoriously evil; for to be very scrupulous proceeds from the pride of inferiors and tends to overthrow the superior's authority. Yet this doth not give superiors any unlimited powers to command anything that is evil, for they only promise to obey their godly admonitions, so that such as govern in the Church must take heed they do not enjoin anything but that which is either good in itself or apparently tends to promote piety and virtue and is not evil." (On the Ordination Offices, p. 214.) Canon James (Comment on the Ordination Services, p. 270) says "The Episcopal admonition which the clergy are to follow, and the like judgments to which they are to submit themselves, must be 'godly admonitions' and 'godly judgments.' Now this caution by which the vow is accompanied, like every other cautionary counsel and guarded command given by the Church, is used not as doubting either the godliness of the Bishop or the due obedience of his clergy, but because this or any other vow is required to be solemnly made, and because all the services, and particularly the ordination services, are written as unto fallible men, and there can be no sound legislation either in Church or State where all is not based on this principle. The framers, therefore, of these services wisely so acted. They remembered that St. Paul scrupled not to avow of himself that he was a man of like passions, as well with those he ordained as with those among whom he ministered. A frank avowal this that he was liable to error. It is only in this view of the case that the term can be considered appropriate, for to suppose that the admonitions of a Bishop to be other than godly would appear impossible, and it is equally impossible to conceive otherwise of his judgment in matters of religion than that it should be godly according to the written Word of God declared in His Gospel and adopted by the Church."

The venerable Bishop White, in his "Comment on the Ordination Offices," a book unanimously approved by the whole House of Bishops in 1833, speaking of these promises, after stating that these "godly admonitions must have respect to some standard by which they are directed, and that this standard must be the various established institutions of the Church and not the private opinions of the Bishop," he adds, "that injudicious or even impertinent interference is possible ought not to be denied, and cannot be justified." But there are two descriptions of cases in which no such censure is applicable. One is where an offense against morals, the other where an offense against order is the subject. In either of these cases indeed the admonition of the Bishop would be unseasonable unless the offense were notorious and admitted, because he would be in danger of making himself an accuser when he is appointed to be a judge. But if either of the species of offense is acknowledged by the offending party, and especially if it be justified and persevered in, then is here claimed to the Bishop the right in question, not only on the ground of ecclesiastical law, but on that of the consent of the party in the answer to the question last read, which may be considered as a personal contract binding him to submission under reproof for past fault, and to amendment under exhortation relative to the time to come.

When, therefore, a Bishop acting as a Father in God of a family over which the HOLY GHOST has made him overseer, moved by an honest and zealous love for God's truth, and sustained by the specific decisions of the established and recognized Ecclesiastical tribunals of the Church of England, a Church from which ours has not departed "in any essential point of Doctrine, Discipline, or Worship," and by the decisions and Canons of our own Church, issues his admonition and gives his judgment upon questions of usage and ritual, especially when the points objected to are innovations upon the established services of this Church, as carried on since its foundation nearly a century ago, such admonitions and judgment are those recognized by the Ordinal as godly. They proceed from godly motives, are directed to godly ends, and concern things pertaining to the worship of God in His Holy Temple.

To disobey, then, is an act of self-will and subversive of all authority. In the case of a Deacon, we see at once that subordination to the Presbyter which makes that Presbyter, specially the one under whom he serves, one of the chief ministers set over him, to whose admonitions and judgment he must conform himself as a true Diaconos; and if to a Presbyter set over him in a particular parish or missionary station, much more to his Bishop, to whose direction and authority he is canonically bound.

RT. REV. WM. BACON STEVENS, D.D., Bishop of Pennsylvania.

Adonai. One of the titles of GOD (q. v.); My LORD. It was pronounced by the Jews for the word JEHOVAH, which was only uttered by the priests in the sanctuary when blessing the people (Numb. vi. 22), and by the High-Priest on the Day of Atonement when before the mercy-seat. The true pronunciation was said to be lost. The Jews refuse, generally, to utter the "Incommunicable Name," and for it substituted the phrase Shem Hammeaphorash, i.e., the name of four letters, Yod He Vav He. The Alexandrian translators of the Scriptures into Greek (Septuagint) used the word Kyrios as its equivalent, and thus it passed into the New Testament as the title of our LORD. The word Adon, LORD, is found in many names, as in Adonijah, Adonizebek, Nebuchadon-ezer, and in Greek mythology the Syrian Adon is Adonis.

Adoption. A term of Roman law which St. Paul used to express the relation of the Christian to his heavenly Father. The Roman law ran thus: "When aliens were to be taken into a family or into the place of children, the ceremony was either before a prætor or before the people. If it were done through the prætor it was called adoption." The parallel is accurate. Our adoption is not created by our will or choice, but is by the gift of God. We may choose whether we shall accept it, but it is still His gift, and not ours by any claim or merit. It is granted to us in and through our LORD JESUS CHRIST, therefore by His incarnation and the grace thereby accruing to the human race from Him. It is conveyed in baptism, and reversing the order of the verses, "As many of you as have been baptized into CHRIST have put on CHRIST" (v. 27); "For ye are all the children of God by faith in CHRIST JESUS" (v. 26), and then "And if ye be CHRIST's then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise" (Gal. iii. 29); and the Apostle proceeds in his argument (ch. iv. 4-7): "But when the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth His Son, made of a woman, made under the law to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons. And because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of His Son into your hearts, crying Abba, Father. Wherefore thou art no more a servant, but a son; and if a son, then an heir of God through CHRIST." So, too, in the Apostle's argument in the eighth chapter of Romans. St. Paul uses the word adoption in Rom. viii. 15, 23, ix. 4; Gal. iv. 5; and Ephesians i. 5.

Adoptionist. Heresy. A heresy which taught that CHRIST was not the Son of God by His eternal generation, but by adoption. It was broached as early as the later Arian controversies, 380 A.D., but did not take a distinct shape, though combated by the early fathers (as Ambrose, Gregory, Naz. Ep. ad Cled., i.), till the eighth century, and in Spain, Elipandus, Archbishop of Toledo, and Felix, Bishop of Urgel. It was probably hit upon by Elipandus as a theory to conciliate the Mohammedans among whom his province was placed. Felix was a subject of Charlemagne. They taught that CHRIST JESUS as man was adopted, though as the Word of God eternally begotten, thus practically dividing the Person of CHRIST, for they denied that the man CHRIST JESUS from the beginning of His Incarnation perfectly united with the Word the eternal and only-begotten SON of GOD. It was but another form of Nestorianism. Several theologians at once combated it, as Beatus and Bishop Etherius, of Osma, but Charlemagne sent for Alcuin, who refuted the heresy in several works and letters written both to Felix and to Elipandus, founding his argument not only upon the opposing silence of Scripture, but upon the contradiction in the nature of the Unity of Person in CHRIST, that He could be the SON of GOD by nature and the SON of GOD by adoption. His two natures cannot make Him two Sons, for they are perfectly conjoined in His one Person.

Felix recanted his heresy at the Council at Ratisbon, 792 A.D., but was sent to Rome by Charlemagne, where he had to make a second still more formal abjuration of his error in full orthodox terms, but when he regained his diocese he relapsed. Being summoned anew, and his tenets condemned at Frankfort (796 A.D.), he sought refuge with Elipandus within the Mohammedan rule. Adoptionism was again condemned at Friule (796 A.D.).

The heresy was condemned again at Aix-la-Chapelle, 799 A.D., and was abjured by Felix, but Elipandus steadily adhered to it to the last. They sought in vain to prove their error by appeals to the Liturgy, which appeals are valuable to us now as settling the date of parts of the Mozarabic Liturgy.

Adoration. A synonym for devout, reverent worship. Its origin is from the Latin manus ad os mittere, to put the hand to the mouth in token of silent awe. It is used exclusively to mean the worship paid to GOD, and is in act both outward and inward; outward in such kneeling or bowing and singing or speaking words of praise; interior, of the heart and mind in such devout affections as raise the soul in adoring thought. The outward is empty form if it be not conjoined and informed by the interior adoration, which make it acceptable as a personal offering to GOD.

Adultery. Criminal intercourse of a married person of either sex with another of the other sex, whether married or not. The moral sin of adultery is implied in the inspired words with which Adam received Eve, and is set forth in the Seventh Commandment. CHRIST confirmed the binding force of Adam's declaration in emphatic terms (Mark x. 6-9), and expounded the force of the Commandment in His Sermon on the Mount (Matt. v. 27-32). In all countries the crime has been branded as a heinous one, and often and earlier was punishable with death, and if the injured husband should slay the guilty parties flagrante delictu even now, the homicide does not receive the condemnation it should. Our LORD's forgiveness of the guilty woman (John viii. 11) is taken as a mitigation of the death-sentence under the Mosaic dispensation; but the guilt of it, both as to the moral and spiritual death of the sinning ones, and as to the sin against society, is not thereby extenuated, and the severest enactments have always stood upon the Church's Canon Law against the guilty parties. This and fornication are the only causes allowed by our LORD to justify divorce. It is a sin that is absolutely heinous in the sight of GOD and in His Law. But moral theologians sometimes distinguish between degrees of heinousness in reference to the destructive results to society. A petition against the sin stands in the English Prayer-book in the Litany, which petition has been softened by hardly equivalent phrases in the American form.

Advent. There is no certainty of the date when the season of Advent was appointed. The early Sacramentary of Leo I. does not mention any Sundays in Advent. The Comes of St. Jerome, and later the Sacramentary of Gelasius I. (496 A.D.), ascribe Collects, Epistles, and Gospels to five Sundays in Advent. These documents are probably much interpolated. But Maximus of Tours (450 A.D.) makes the earliest certain mention of Advent, and Caesarius of Arles (501-42 A.D.) has left the first set of Advent sermons we have (those ascribed to St. Ambrose and St. Augustine are spurious). In the Ambrosian and Mozarabic Liturgies the Advent season dates from St. Martin's day (November 11), and includes forty days, which were accounted as a lesser fast among the religious. But the first of these five Sundays was really counted as preceding the Sundays in Advent, so that there were only four Sundays counted. The Gallican Church (Maçon, 581 A.D.) ordered Monday, Wednesday, and Friday to be observed as fasts in Advent, but the rule was disregarded. In the Prereformed English Uses, as in the Gallican and Mozarabic Rites, we find special Epistles and Gospels for these days. The observance of Advent in the Greek Church was probably much later, for Balsamon (1200 A.D.) says "the others (besides the Lenten fast), as the fast of the Nativity, are each of seven days only. Those monks who fast forty days, viz., from St. Philip (September 14), are bound to this by their rule. Such laics as do the like are to be praised therefor."

Advowson. The right, in England, of patronage to a church or an ecclesiastical benefice, and he who has the right of Advowson is called the Patron of the Church, from his obligation to defend the rights of the Church from oppression and violence. For when lords of manors first built churches upon their own demesnes and appointed the tithes of these manors to be paid to the officiating ministers which were before given to the clergy in common, the lord who thus built a church and endowed it with glebe or land had, of common right, a power annexed of nominating such minister as he pleased (provided he were canonically qualified) to officiate in that church of which he was the founder, endower, maintainer, or, in one word, the patron. This patronage is heritable, and is subject to many curious and intricate rules. (Vide Burr's Ecclesiastical Law.)

Æon. This is a word which has two separate uses; the true one, in connection with the future life and eternity, and the other, in which the Gnostics used it, personifying and deifying their imagined succession of ages. Borrowing some phrases from Christian Revelation and adding to them the wildest imaginings, the Gnostics, who were either Orientals or Egyptians, pretended to a deeper Gnosis than that the Apostles taught. Their origin must have been in the years nearly contemporary with the close of the Apostolic century, for we find Ignatius alluding to this word shortly after the death of St. John.

Aerians. A small sect, founded by Aërius, a Presbyter of Sebaste, about 355 A.D. Aërius, it is said, was disappointed in not obtaining the Episcopate, and in consequence seceded from the Church and denied that there was any difference between the office of a Bishop and that of a Presbyter. In contrast to the care that all other schismatical or heretical bodies had taken to procure at the outset Episcopal consecration for their ministers, Aërius, by this, gave the best proof possible that hitherto an unbroken succession from the Apostles was ever deemed essential to a true ministry, even by those who were attacking that very authority of the ministry itself. The sect did not last very long.

Affections. The Affections, as love, joy, grief, anger, jealousy, are also called the Feelings. In later religious teaching they are made the basis of theologic systems to a much larger extent than the New Testament warrants. Feeling cannot be called into proper activity without a use (rightly or wrongly) of the Reason. As then reason must precede, to base religion upon feeling, which may or may not have any true depth in separate individual natures, is to build upon the shifting sand. The value of the Affections or Feelings cannot be overestimated in their true place, but they must be subordinated to the reason, and must not warp the free action of conscience, a danger which is very imminent in all enthusiastic forms of religion. The inspired teachers never appealed in the first instance to the Affections; nay, they speak very strongly upon the need of controlling them. The popular confusion of the principles and doctrines of Christianity, and the enthused reception of them, leads to a false comprehension of the true Christian state. According to a very common confusion, a person is not a true Christian unless he has certain experiences or feelings overlooking the true basis in the gifts and adoption by God in the Church. A German school of Pietism has endeavored to shelter religion from the attacks of opponents by withdrawing it into the province of Feeling. The folly of making Religion wholly a state of experience or spiritual judgment is evident by instituting the slightest comparison between the dogmas and history of the New Testament and the fanciful notions of the Pietist.

Affinity. The relationship contracted between a husband and his wife's blood relations. By the old Canons illicit intercourse also resulted in affinity. Within certain degrees the Divine Law (in the 18th ch. of Leviticus) has forbidden marriage with a wife's relations. The Table of Kindred and Affinity, which is Canon Law in England, does not bind the Church in America, though various efforts have been made to make it so, and the House of Bishops declared (General Convention of 1808) that it ought to be observed. By the old Law (Just. Cod.) a kind of spiritual affinity was created between the sponsors and the adult or the infant baptized, and marriage was consequently forbidden.

Affusion. Vide BAPTISM.

Agapæ. The feasts of charity, St. Jude v. 12; St. Peter ii. 13. They had their rise in the community of goods mentioned in Acts ii. 44, and as the sharing of all things in common could not be continued when the society became too numerous, such a feast for the poorer members would become a substitute which could express well the fellowship and love between Christians of all ranks. St. Paul describes but does not so designate a feast of this kind. It became very popular and spread throughout the Church. Pliny may refer to it in his famous letter to Trajan . . . "that they, later in the day, partook in common of a simple and innocent meal." Ignatius speaks of it. Tertullian also, in the next century; Clement (192 A.D.) also speaks of the luxury which was introduced into the feasts which were intended to be for the poor, and as simple and temperate as became Christians. Meat, wine, fish, cheese, bread, milk, poultry, made up the articles usually furnished by the richer for the poorer brethren. The real use of the feast was not the relief to the needy, for that could be and was attained by other agencies, but as a living proof of the common brotherhood. This common bond was lost sight of as the Church grew in wealth and drew into it the wealthy upper classes. Ascetic ideas, too, and the practice of fasting before Communion, and the abuses readily growing up about these Feasts of Charity, would lead to their disuse and abolishment. When they finally disappeared is not probably to be ascertained now, but traces of the practice survived in Egypt till near the close of the fifth century, and the Council in Trullo (692 A.D.) forbids them, though no other notice of them at that date is found.

Agenda. A term meaning Things to be done, in distinction from Things to be believed. It usually means the divine offices, as in the Council of Carthage (390 A.D.) and Innocent I. (Ep ad Decentium, though its genuineness is now questioned.) Latterly, as in Bede, it meant specially commemoration of the dead.

Agnosticism (from the negative particle a and γινώσκω, I know) is a modern word representing a form of philosophy which has attained a wide acceptance with some men of cultivated intellect. It is fairly described in the following sentences taken from Prebendary Row's "Revelation and Modern Theology Contrasted," London, 1883, p. 338: "This philosophy maintains that while belief in the existence of a first cause of the universe, which it designates God, is a necessity of thought, yet this first cause, or God, owing to the limitations of the human intellect, must forever remain unknown and unknowable to man. In other words, that it is impossible to affirm of it a single attribute; and that to assert that it possesses personality, volition, intelligence, or a moral character is nothing else than anthropomorphism, by which is meant that to ascribe such conceptions, being purely human, to the first cause of the universe is simply to manufacture a God after our own likeness. The God of this system, therefore, while the assumption of this existence satisfies an intellectual necessity, is precisely the same for all moral purposes as if He existed not. (Vide ATHEISM.) For anything that we can know, He is incapable of caring for us or regarding our conduct, and we, in like manner, may both live and die without any regard for Him." While this subtle philosophy is apparently more modest than atheism, and to that degree less offensive to the cultivated taste of intellectual men, it is plain from the above description that it is absolutely anti-Christian. (Vide ATHEISM. See also "Agnosticism: A Doctrine of Despair," by President Porter, of Yale College, in the series of "Present-Day Tracts." London, The Religious Tract Society.)

REV. HALL HARRISON.

Agnus Dei. I. The words with which St. John Baptist pointed out JESUS to His disciples—"Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world"—was very naturally and devoutly used in the liturgic worship. It was incorporated into the glorious hymn "Gloria in Excelsis," found at the end of St. Clement of Alexandria's works (192 A.D.), and now in our Prayer-Book. It was also used as a versicle during the celebration of the Holy Communion, at the time of consecrating the elements, and became common during the mediæval ages. But the English Use dropped it, though it is being revived in many places.

II. A medallion of wax stamped with the effigy of a lamb. It was an ancient custom to distribute to worshippers on the first Sunday after Easter particles of wax taken from the Paschal taper, which had been solemnly blessed on the Easter-eve of the previous year. These particles were burned in houses, fields, or vineyards to secure them against evil influence or thunder-strokes. In Rome itself, however, instead of a Paschal taper, the archdeacon was accustomed to pronounce a benediction over a mixture of oil and wax, from which small medallions were made bearing the figure of a lamb, to be distributed to the people on the first Sunday after Easter, especially to the newly baptized. In modern times this benediction of the Agnus Dei is reserved to the Pope himself, and takes place in the first year of his pontificate and every seventh year following.

Alabama, Diocese of. On Monday, January 25, 1830, a meeting of the members and friends of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the State of Alabama was held in the city of Mobile, for "the purpose of giving a more efficient and permanent character to its institutions, and for the better administration of its rites and ordinances." This seems to have been the first step taken towards organizing the Diocese. Two clergymen of the Church were then living in the State,—the Rev. Mr. Shaw in Mobile, and the Rev. Mr. Muller in Tuscaloosa,—and both were present at this meeting. It also appears that the Rt. Rev. Bishop Brownell, of Connecticut, and the Rev. William Richmond, of New York, were in Mobile at that time, and were invited to be present. Bishop Brownell, by special request, presided over the meeting.

The Diocese was formally organized by the adoption of a constitution, which recognized the authority of the Church in the United States. After this was done, a resolution was passed looking to the formation of a Southwestern Diocese, to be composed of the Dioceses of Mississippi, Louisiana, and Alabama. After correspondence between the parties interested in this, a number of clergy and laity, duly elected to represent these several States, assembled in Christ Church, New Orleans, on the 4th of March, 1835. Their object was to secure the privilege granted by a Canon of the General Convention of 1832, which Canon was expressed in the following words: "The Dioceses of Mississippi and Alabama, and the Clergy and Churches in the State of Louisiana, are hereby authorized to associate and join in the election of a Bishop, anything in the Canons of this Church to the contrary notwithstanding; the said association to be dissolved on the demise of the Bishop, and not before, unless by the consent of General Convention." Acting under the authority of such Canon, this Convention unanimously elected the Rev. Francis L. Hawks, D.D., of St. Thomas' Church, New York, Bishop of this Southwestern Diocese; but, in consequence of the repeal of said Canon by a succeeding General Convention, this plan was abandoned.

The Convention of Alabama which met in Tuscaloosa, on the 3d of January, 1831, invited Bishop Brownell to take charge of parishes in this State, under the provisions of Canon 20 of the Church in the United States, and to perform such Episcopal services as might be required. This invitation was accepted, and the Bishop remained in official charge of this Diocese until 1840, at which time he requested to be relieved. Between 1831 and 1840 Bishop Brownell paid at least two visits to Alabama. He presided at the Convention which met in Tuscaloosa in 1835, confirmed several persons, and consecrated the church in that city; and again in 1837, administered confirmation in the city of Mobile.

In 1836, Bishop Otey, of Tennessee, acting for Bishop Brownell, visited the State; and in 1838, Bishop Kemper, at the invitation of Bishop Otey, performed several Episcopal acts in the Diocese.

In 1840 the Diocese was placed under the official charge of the Rt. Rev. Bishop Polk, who made two visits to the Diocese, and presided at the Convention of 1843.

In the year 1842 the Rev. Martin P. Parks, of Virginia, at that time Chaplain at the Military Academy at West Point, was elected Bishop, but declined to take charge of the Diocese. In 1843 the Rev. James T. Johnston, of Virginia, was duly elected Bishop, but declined to accept the position.

At a Convention held in Greensboro', Alabama, in 1844, the Rev. N. H. Cobbs, D.D., of the Diocese of Ohio, was elected Bishop of Alabama. The Rev. Dr. Cobbs accepted the election, was consecrated in October, 1844, and came at once to his work in the Diocese.

At the Convention of 1845, the first one held after Bishop Cobbs took charge of the Diocese, the number of clergy entitled to seats was 17; at the Convention of 1860, the last one at which this Bishop was present, the number canonically connected with the Diocese was 32. The labors of this Bishop were very greatly blessed; the number of his clergy rapidly increased, and his Diocese was always a household at unity with itself.

Bishop Cobbs died in January, 1861, and on May 2, 1861, the Annual Convention of the Diocese assembled in St. John's Church, Montgomery. Failing to agree in the choice of a Bishop the Convention adjourned to meet in Selma, on Thursday, November 21, 1861; and reassembling at the time and place appointed, the Rev. Richard Hooker Wilmer, D.D., of the Diocese of Virginia, was unanimously elected Bishop of Alabama. The Rev. Dr. Wilmer accepted this election, and was consecrated in St. Paul's Church, Richmond, Va., March 6, 1862, the Rt. Rev. William Meade, D.D., Bishop of Virginia, the Rt. Rev. John Johns, Assistant Bishop of Virginia, and the Rt. Rev. Stephen Elliott, D.D., Bishop of Georgia, uniting in this consecration. When the war ended this consecration was fully recognized by the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, and the Bishop of Alabama took his seat with his brethren in the House of Bishops.

Bishop Wilmer came at once to his Diocese, and in God's providence has been spared to labor continuously in this portion of the Master's vineyard.

In 1857 the subject of a Diocesan School for Girls was brought before the Convention in the Bishop's address, and the action which then began resulted in the purchase of a lot near the city of Montgomery, and the erection of a suitable building, called Hamner Hall. This property was managed for a time by a separate board of trustees, then by St. John's Parish, Montgomery, and finally came into the possession of the Diocese. The school is now in a very flourishing condition, under the charge of Rev. George M. Everhart, D.D.

On the same lot is a large and handsome brick house, known formerly as the Bishop Cobbs Home for Orphans, which house is also the property of the Diocese, and is reserved as the residence of the future Bishops of Alabama.

In 1864, Bishop Wilmer issued a Pastoral Letter urging upon the Diocese the establishment of a Home for Widows and Orphans, which should be under the care of a Sisterhood of Deaconesses. The plan was approved by the Convention, and steps were taken to carry it into effect. A few orphans were collected at Tuscaloosa, but they were soon removed to Mobile, and to this number were added the inmates of the Bishop Cobbs Home at Montgomery. A building was purchased in which were placed a number of orphan girls. As necessity required it, a similar Home was furnished for boys, both Homes being under the care of the Deaconesses. The liberality of Church people, almost exclusively of Mobile, has enabled the managers not only to provide comfortably for these orphans from day to day, but also to lay up funds for future use; the property of the Home amounting, in 1883, to $15,769.29.

In 1846 there was formed a Society for the Relief of Disabled Clergymen, and of the Widows and Orphans of Deceased Clergymen. This society has preserved its existence under several changes of constitution, and seems destined to be the means of doing much good. It holds property to the amount of $13,108.42.

In 1836 an effort was made to secure a Bishop's Fund. Three trustees were appointed to receive a gift of land offered by Jacob Lorillard, Esq., of New York City, for the benefit of a fund whose annual interest would in time be sufficient to support the Bishop of the Diocese. This fund is managed by three trustees, who are elected annually by the Convention, and its property now amounts to $29,862.

From 1830 to 1844 the various reports show the following statistics: baptisms, 836; confirmations, 168; marriages, 194; funerals, 314.

From 1844 to 1861, baptisms, 6493; confirmations, 2351; marriages, 1082; funerals, 2287.

From 1861 to 1883, baptisms, 10,739; confirmations, 6768; marriages, 2558; funerals, 5134.

The present condition of the Diocese is best explained by citing some words from the address of Bishop Wilmer to the Convention of 1882:

"We have passed through a grand revolution, socially and politically. In view of all that has taken place during the last twenty years, the wonder with me is that so much has been accomplished by our people, under every possible disadvantage and discouragement. We have lost a large number of our people by emigration to more fertile territories. Compare the number of confirmations reported for the last twenty years with the number of communicants at present reported, and it will be seen how large a number must have emigrated from the State. And the clergy, finding no sufficient maintenance, have followed the tide of population.

"The statement following will show, at a glance, how the clergy have been affected by the fluctuations of the times:

No. of clergy canonically resident in the Diocese March 6, 1862.....	34
No. of clergy since added by transfer from other Dioceses.....	49
No. of clergy since added by Ordination to Deaconate.....	22

There has been a strong tendency on the part of the people to leave the country and make their homes in the cities, and in consequence, while the city parishes have rapidly increased in numbers, the country parishes have languished, and, in some instances, died. But there seems to be a bright future in store for this Diocese. The rich soil and mineral wealth of the State are beginning to attract attention, and with the return of prosperity the Church will go for-

Albany, Diocese of. History.—The Diocese of Albany, forming a part of the State of New York, consists of nineteen counties, which comprised the old Northern Convocation. These counties are Albany, Clinton, Columbia, Delaware, Essex, Franklin, Fulton, Greene, Hamilton, Herkimer, Montgomery, Otsego, Rensselaer, Saratoga, Schoenectady, Schoharie, St. Lawrence, Warren, and Washington. It embraces within its limits 20,888 square miles, and, according to the census of 1880, has a population of 949,545 souls. Its territory is diversified by lake and river, mountain and valley, forest and plain; while the great Adirondack Wilderness, with its wonderful resources, lies in its bosom. It has also such famous summer resorts as Lebanon and Richfield Springs, Luzerne and Scharon, Lake George and Saratoga. The Diocese takes its name from the capital of the State, which is also the residence of the Bishop. It was carved out of the Diocese of New York, together with Long Island, in the year 1868, by act of the General Convention. Its primary Convention, pursuant to the call of the Rt. Rev. Horatio Potter, D.D., LL.D., D.C.L., Bishop of New York, met in the city of Albany, in St. Peter's Church, on December 2, 1868. The Bishop of New York presided and preached the sermon. Among the visiting clergy was the Rt. Rev. Henry Lascelles Jenner, D.D., Lord Bishop of Dunedin, New Zealand. On the second day of the Convention, December 3, the Rev. William Crosswell Doane, S.T.D., Rector of St. Peter's Church, Albany, was chosen Bishop. His consecration took place in the same church on the Feast of the Purification in 1869, the preacher being Rt. Rev. W. H. Odenheimer, D.D., Bishop of New Jersey. The Bishop of New York was the Consecrator, and was assisted by the Bishops of New Jersey, Maine, Missouri, and Long Island. Under the wise management of Bishop Doane the Diocese of Albany has been steadily increasing in strength and influence. At the time of its organization in 1868 there were 78 clergymen belonging to it. In 1878 there were 117, and in 1883 there were 123. In 1868 there were 95 churches, in 1878 there were 113, and in 1883 there were 122.

There were reported from 75 churches:

	Baptisms.	Confirmations.	Communicants.
In 1868.....	1137	795	6561
In 1878.....	1800	1356	10,617
In 1883.....	1799	937	13,018

In 1868 the offerings were $118,433.87; in 1878, $236,400.05; and in 1883 they were $296,928.52. In some parishes new churches have taken the place of old ones, while in others the old have been renovated. Church property also of great value has been acquired for mission work and other religious purposes. Offerings are made for the following objects, as required by Canon : Diocesan Fund, Missions of the Diocese, Aged and Infirm Clergy, Widows and Orphans of Deceased Clergymen, Bible and Common Prayer-Book Society of Albany, Episcopal Fund, salary of the Bishop, Education of Young Men for the Ministry, Orphan House of the Holy Saviour, Domestic Missions, Foreign Missions. Offerings are also presented by the Sunday-schools of the Diocese for the Child's Hospital.

Missions.—The chief glory of the Diocese is its mission work. Under the energetic leadership of the Bishop, who must be the great missionary, the Church is extended far and wide, and the things that remain are strengthened. There are about ninety mission stations receiving aid from the Board of Missions, and the sum of $10,000 is appropriated annually for this work. The Board is composed of the Bishop, ex-officio president, and five other clergymen, and five laymen chosen by the Convention.

Convention.—The Convention meets annually on the first Tuesday after the first Sunday after the Epiphany. Where, the Bishop determines. Hitherto the cities of Albany and Troy have shared the honors of the meetings. This body is composed, first, of the Bishop; secondly, of all clergymen canonically resident within the Diocese for six months previous to Convention, restriction of time not to apply to rectors duly elected, or missionaries duly appointed; and, thirdly, to three lay delegates from the Cathedral and three lay delegates from each Church in union with the Convention. The delegates must be, in all cases, communicants. The sessions usually last two days. The permanent officers of the Diocese are the Bishop, a Standing Committee, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and a Registrar.

Convocations.—The Diocese is divided into districts called Convocations, the titles and limits of which are as follows: The Convocation of Albany comprises the counties of Albany, Greene, Columbia, Schenectady, Montgomery, Fulton, Hamilton, and Herkimer; the Convocation of Troy, the counties of Rensselaer, Saratoga, Washington, Warren, Clinton, and Essex; the Convocation of Susquehanna, the counties of Delaware, Otsego, and Schoharie; the Convocation of Ogdensburg, the counties of St. Lawrence and Franklin. The Bishop is head of each Convocation ex-officio, and the executive officer is an Archdeacon, appointed annually by the Bishop, on the nomination of the Convocation, from among its clergy. Two meetings are required each year by Canon. Others may be held by order of Convocation. The work of the Convocations is specially missionary in its character.

Other Institutions of the Diocese are the Bible and Common Prayer-Book Society of Albany and its vicinity, incorporated in 1820. St. Agnes' School for Girls, located in Albany, with the Bishop as Rector, and twenty-six teachers and officers; the Child's Hospital, Albany, with branch Home for Convalescents at Saratoga in the summer; the Orphan House of the Holy Saviour, Cooperstown; St. John's Clergy House, East Line, incorporated in 1881; Home of the Good Shepherd, Saratoga Springs, incorporated in 1869; the Church Home, Troy.

The Sisterhood of the Holy Child Jesus has its headquarters at Albany, and is under the direction of the Bishop of Albany. The Sisters are at work in St. Agnes' School, and in charge of the Child's Hospital, Albany, and the Child's Convalescent Home, Saratoga Springs. The Cathedral Building of All-Saints, which has been the dream of the Bishop for years, will soon crown the commanding site chosen for it. A large lot has been secured in the city of Albany, north of the Capitol, and near St. Agnes' School and the old chapel, which has done good service. About $75,000 are in hand, and the work is to be diligently prosecuted. The grand edifice, which will be built of stone, will be an enduring monument of the zeal and labors of the first Bishop of Albany. Bishop Doane, on whom has fallen the mantle-spirit of his sainted father, a former Bishop of New Jersey, is in his vigor and manly prime, and is noted for his ripe scholarship, his facile pen, his gifts as a presiding officer, his eloquence as a preacher, and his largeness of heart. He received the degree of Doctor of Laws a few years ago from Union University,—a just recognition of his ability and superior talents.

Albate. A sort of Christian hermits, so called from the white linen they wore.

Alexandria. Vide EASTERN CHURCHES.

Alexandria, School of. Every church had its catechetical school, somewhat corresponding to our confirmation classes, but with more definiteness of organization, and some provision was made for the education of Christian children, but no church ever possessed as famous a school as that at Alexandria. Its foundation is obscure, though ascribed to St. Mark, and the list of its earliest masters is very doubtful till we reach Pantænus, who was at its head about 179 A.D. He was as a heathen an eclectic, but brought his philosophical studies to the service of the Church. In such a city as Alexandria his ability would be very useful in attracting many to his lectures. When he was sent on his mission to the Indians (probably to Lybia), Clement, who was most likely of Roman extraction, himself in early life an enthusiastic student of philosophy, and later a devout Christian, succeeded him. His works, the "Cohortatio," "Pædagogus," and the "Stromata," discursive collections of his lectures, probably based upon a loose outline of the Apostolic constitutions, are a valuable picture of how far a public lecturer upon Christian topics could go before a mixed audience. The administrative ability of the Bishop Demetrius used both Pantænus and his two successors with great wisdom till Demetrius fell out with Origen. It is said that before Demetrius's time the Church of Alexandria had no dependencies, but from the date of Pantænus's mission, and from the fame and success of the school, soon Sees were added upon Sees, till Alexandria was at the head of a large province. Origen, who succeeded to Pantænus, who resumed his post upon his return, brought, perhaps, the loftiest abilities yet used for the task. Adamantine in endurance, with a mind capacious of all instruction, a master of the Scriptures, no mean critic, he was devoted to his school. His peculiar notions, probably more speculatively held than otherwise, gave a notoriety that pained him, since they were rather questions for debate in his school than formulated dogmas. At any rate, they were fastened upon him. In an hour of enthused fear for himself and his influence in the school he mutilated himself, giving a wrong interpretation to our LORD's words (Matt. xix. 12). The act disabled him from ordination. When, then, he received ordination on a visit to Palestine, contrary to the Canons, his Bishop took his office as catechist from him. The school became of less importance later as the adults to be prepared for baptism and confirmation grew rarer, but it nurtured a spirit of dispute which produced Arias, the famous heretic, who, however, had received his dialectic training from Lucian, of Antioch. The school was finally closed by becoming a mere nursing-school for the young to be prepared for baptism and confirmation. It is not worth the while to give the names of its later masters save one, Didymus, who was totally blind (340-395 A.D.).

Alienation is, in church matters, the improper disposal of such lands or goods as have been given to the Church for sacred and devout uses. It has always been deemed sinful to apply such means or property to other than direct Church needs. It was hardly an alienation in this sense, when, for the ransom of Christian captives, Bishops sold the Church's plate, or lands even. The like was done in cases of severe famine. But this does not justify the act under other circumstances. The Bishops were only the stewards, and not the owners, and many Canons were necessary throughout the history of every part of the Church restraining them from wasting and for private purposes parting with Church property.

Alienation in Mortmain. The conveying of real estate to any corporate body; in this case, for religious purposes.

Allegory (Gal. iv. 24). An allegory sums up in itself the separate purposes of the Type, Parable, or Metaphor, using either one of these three as a leading form at varying times. The Canticles are filled with types of CHRIST and His Church, but the whole is allegorical. It expresses one thing under words that, upon the surface, are the expression of another. So Ps. lxxx. 8-16, are an allegory. But the same imagery in Is. v. is there a parable. St. Paul uses the allegory in 1 Cor. x. 4, and in Gal. iv. 16-21. The use of allegories is peculiarly Oriental. It is a form adapted to the conveyance of religious truth in very attractive shapes. Allegorical interpretations became a favorite mode of explaining the obscurities in Holy Scripture. The example of St. Paul, as above quoted, was imitated, and a devout spirit, seeing CHRIST everywhere in the Scripture, was tempted to drag into line many texts which could not possibly contain any direct reference to Him. Theologians claimed for the interpretation of Scripture several modes of treating the text, some of them enumerating sixteen, but three were generally admitted,—the Moral, the Allegorical, and the Mystical Sense, apart from the historical or grammatical sense. But the striving to torture new significations and to find new allegories soon brought on a reaction. However, these methods of interpretation held precedence till the Reformation, when the reaction went too far, producing a temper which empties Holy Scripture of much of its true meaning.

Alleluia. A formula, or proclamation, "Praise ye the LORD," found in Ps. cxvii., and as a heading to several other Psalms, especially cxlii.-cxviii., the great Hallel. Psalms sung at all the greater Jewish festivals. The word has been transferred into all languages. It was recorded by St. John, as used by the Angel Host (Rev. xix. 6, 7). Of course it passed immediately into Christian usage. There is the story of the Hallelujah victory by the Christian Britons over the pagan Picts and Scots (429 A.D.). It was used as a watch-cry of encouragement. It was introduced into the Liturgy in both East and West. It is in the Liturgy of St. James, as the earliest instance. In the West, the Mozarabic (which is of Eastern parentage, however), it was freely used; but in the other Western Churches it was very sparingly used, being used most freely during the Easter and Whitsun feasts. Our own Church bears as one of the marks of Eastern influence the use of the Hallelujah in the Versicles, "Praise ye the LORD, the LORD's name be praised," in the Morning and Evening Prayers.

All-Saints. In the Eastern Church this was a very ancient feast, St. Chrysostom speaking of it under the name All-Martyrs. It falls upon our Trinity Sunday, crowning the Church's year with a joyful commemoration of all saints of God.

In the Western Church this feast had its rise much later, in the consecration into Christian Churches of heathen temples. This practice began in the latter part of Pope Gregory's life, and when (607 A.D.) Boniface III. procured from the emperor a recognition of his supremacy, his successor, Boniface IV., consecrated the Pantheon to the Virgin and all martyrs (May 13). It is not certain when the commemoration was transferred to November 1. It was not observed in Gaul till later; in England, Bede speaks of it; nor was it general till Louis the Pious, under advice from Gregory IV., ordered it. The Collect, Epistle, and Gospel were of later date.

All-Souls. A festival falling on the next day after All-Saints' Day. It had its origin in the continuous commemoration at the Holy Communion of "the souls of all those who have died in the communion of the body and blood of our LORD." But beside this Eucharistic commemoration, there were anniversary observances, probably by the surviving relatives. In 837, Amalarius of Metz writes of the annual commemoration of the dead. The festival was at once very popular, after an ordinance by Odilo, Abbot of Clugny, for the abbeys under him.

Almighty. Synonymous with Hebrew LORD God of Hosts; the Mighty God; Omnipotent. A title which God gives Himself in His covenant with Abraham (Gen. xvii. 1). It is continuously used afterwards adown the stream of Revelation. It was taken at once into the Creed, and has maintained its place there ever since as an integral part of the first clause. It is a most important title, for it may be considered (a) as Comprehensive, containing all things; (b) Comprehensive, as creating all things; (c) Preservative of all things. It is fitly used, therefore, by the Church in her Creed, in her Prayers, at the Holy Communion, and in her Hymns, the "Te Deum" and the "Gloria in Excelsis." But this power being of the essential attributes of the Divine Nature belongs equally to the THREE PERSONS of the TRINITY, and so the Athanasian Hymn, "So, likewise, the FATHER is Almighty, the SON is Almighty, the HOLY GHOST is Almighty, and yet there are not Three Almighties but One ALMIGHTY."

Alms. In Job's solemn protestation of his integrity he places the sharing of his bread with the poor as one of his righteous customs (Job xxxi. 17). From the earliest ages almsgiving and relief of the poor and needy has had a special promise and pledge attached. The Israelite when given the land was ordered to leave the gleanings. He was to share the tithe of his produce every third year with not only the Levite, but also the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow. From the Law the Israelite had this enjoined upon him, and he received the promises of prosperity (Prov. xix. 17; Ps. xii. 1). Our LORD assumes it as a right and duty in His Sermon on the Mount, and Himself, though ministered to by others, was a Giver of alms. It was the first popular duty in the Church, and it grew so rapidly that the Deaconate was established to superintend the work. When St. Peter and St. Paul arranged their missionary jurisdictions, St. Paul was enjoined to be mindful of the poor. And it received from him much attention, as we gather from his directions to the Corinthians and elsewhere. He went up to Jerusalem with the collections made for the saints there. When there was a famine threatened in Judæa, alms were sent to the poor from other parts of Syria. In the course of time this almsgiving took more systematic shape. The offertory included food as well as money, and it was shared by the ministers with the poor. The moneys gathered into the treasury were divided into three parts,—one for the ministry, one for the repairing and building churches, and the third for the widows and poor. The offertory now should take this latter place to a far larger extent than it has done, especially as the Rubric makes the alms for the poor its chief use. In England extraordinary collections have been taken up from time to time upon royal briefs, but latterly, as the machinery for such a gathering was very expensive,—taking up above half the amount collected,—it has not been often used. After reforms under Anne, and again under George IV., it gradually fell into disuse, though a royal brief was issued as late as 1854.

There should be some system devised and faithfully carried out in each Diocese that shall teach the duty of almsgiving, and show how much good it effects. Alms should be put into the hands of the Bishop of the Diocese for use oftener than they are.

Altar. A structure of stone or wood, upon which the elements of the Holy Communion are consecrated. The more usual name in the Prayer-Book is the LORD'S Table, but the term Altar is used in the office of Institution. The word occurs in the Epistle to the Hebrews, "We have an altar, whereof they have no right to eat which serve the tabernacle" (Heb. xiii. 10), and is best referred to the Christian Table. The altar of the Old Testament was one on which bloody sacrifices were offered, though there was also the Altar of Incense. The first altar was built by Noah. The altar was usually placed in some spot deemed for some reason hallowed: as where God appeared to Jacob. The material of which they were made was, according to the Mosaic Law, either of earth or of "stones, upon which no tool had been lifted." It was contrary to the Law to build an altar elsewhere than in the Tabernacle, and afterwards in the Temple, though this was frequently violated: as when David built an altar at the threshing-floor of Araunah. Altars, not for sacrifice, were often built, as when the tribes of Reuben and Manasseh, and Gad, put up an Altar of Witness. There was the altar for burnt sacrifice in the Tabernacle made of wood and overlaid with brass; a second larger one made wholly of brass was erected in the first Temple; a third, of unbewn stones (at least the one that replaced it under Judas Maccabeus, when he cleansed the polluted Temple after Antiochus Epiphanes had desecrated it, was so), was placed in the second Temple on the spot where the brazen altar had stood. In the Temple, as restored by Herod, the altar was also of unhewn stone. There was also the Altar of Incense, which, however, was not properly so, since no sacrifices were offered upon it. As for Christian altars, they have been made of various materials, in early times, generally of wood, but very often of marble, and in one or two instances of gold. Often the wood was decorated or covered with gold or silver plating or chased work and adorned with gems. The form varies from the Table to the Tomb form. In the Greek Liturgical language the term used is trapeza,—table, but with some epithet, as "the spiritual," "the mystical," "the royal," "the holy," or "the divine."

In this country there is no rule, and an altar may be made of either wood or stone, and in either of the forms above described. There can be no real objection to using the term altar for the Holy Table, since both terms are used in the Prayer-Book, and upon it are placed the oblations for the memorial our LORD commanded us to make of His one, full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice once offered.

Altar-Cloth. The cloths with which the Holy Table is vested, either as permanent coverings, or for the celebration of the Holy Communion. The earliest unquestionable reference to altar-cloths other than for the celebration is found in St. Chrysostom's Homily on Matthew xiv. 23, 24, wherein he contrasts the costly silken embroidered covering given for the Holy Table with the scanty clothing often grudgingly given to the poor. In his time (390-405 A.D.) we see that such costly altar-cloths were usual. The symbolic use of colors in altar vestments for the several seasons of the Christian year is not more than seven or eight centuries old. (VIDE COLORS.)

Altar-Piece. This was a picture or carved bas-relief placed behind and over the altar. This practice of placing pictures in churches, though very ancient, still won its way slowly, against much opposition. The danger that arose later was clearly seen by a few. The feeling that the house of GOD should be made as glorious as possible filled the devout hearts of the many. The earliest instance we have of a picture in a church is from St. Epiphanius (391 A.D.), who, when journeying through Palestine, found at Anablatha a veil hanging before the doors of the sanctuary of the church with a painting of CHRIST or some Saint upon it. This he had torn into pieces and given for a winding-sheet for the poor, and replaced it with a plain veil from his own home in Cyprus. Paulinus of Nola (402 A.D.) introduced pictures largely in his new church. They were of Scripture subjects, and were designed to instruct the illiterate. From this time on the decoration of churches with paintings became more common. These remarks apply to pictures proper, for we find symbolic decoration much earlier, but nothing that applies to paintings. But while frequent casual references are made to pictures, after this there is ever a note of warning sounded. The famous Gregory I., in condemning the misuse of pictures, urges that it would be wrong to remove them, as they were object-lessons in sacred history to the unlearned (Ep. ad Ser. Mass.). There was, at first, very much objection to producing any likeness of our LORD, but that, soon after the common introduction of art into the Church, was overcome.

Very early mosaics exist, the oldest of which are at Ravenna and at Thessalonica. The Cross was a symbol that was employed at a very early date, but the Crucifix was not used till very much later. The oldest frescoes are of Saints, in the catacombs at Naples, in the fifth, but the nearest in age after them are dated about the eighth, century. There were three styles, distinct in treatment of the same subjects,—the Roman, the Byzantine, and the Lombard, which developed upon different lines of church decoration. In the Greek Church the iconostasis is the space on which the greatest amount of painting is placed.

Altar-Rails are of modern arrangement, being due probably to Archbishop Laud, who had them erected to prevent the profanations and intrusions which frequently occurred. They have taken the place of the old open-work grating or screen which parted the choir from the nave. This latter separation was of ancient date, as may be shown by the frequent references and descriptions, as that by Eusebius (325-40 A.D.) of the Church in Tyre. It was open trellised work, often enriched by bronze or gilt or silver. The material was usually of wood or iron, but sometimes of stone. There was always some mode of marking the division between the nave of the church and the sanctuary. In the Eastern Church it was as above, till later, when the open-work was paneled and painted with pictures of CHRIST and the Apostles or Saints, and entered by doors, which therefore formed a complete partition between the two portions of the church (ICONOSTASIS). The material of which this iconostasis was made was usually of wood, though other material is used also. In the West, the partition was, as stated above, without railing and open-work.

Ambon, or Ambo. The desk or raised platform for the reader, from which the Epistle and Gospel were read, notices were published, and from which the inferior clergy preached. Its position varied. It probably occupied the same position relatively that the place for the readers did in the synagogue. It often stood in the middle of the nave, but, sometimes to the right of the front of what we now call the choir.

In large churches there were often two Ambons, one on the right for the Gospel, the other on the left for the Epistle. The Ambon was probably movable. It preceded the pulpit, which was later. (Vide PULPIT.) It was frequently ornamented with carved work on its panels, and in some examples still surviving it was supported upon a pillar. That at St. Sophia (536 A.D.) had two flights of steps, the one on the east, the other on the west. The Bishop generally preached from his chair (Cathedra), but sometimes from a desk in front of the altar. St. Chrysostom preached from the Ambon that he might be heard the better. At Ravenna exists still an Ambon which may date from the building of the church (493-525 A.D.).

Ambrosian Rite. Vide LITURGIES.

Amen. Faithful, True, Firm (Heb. and Gr.). The response of the people to every prayer. It is a strong asseveration of either faith in or consent to the contents of the prayer. The people gave their consent to the binding power of the curses pronounced upon Mt. Ebal (Deut. xxvii. 15) by their Amen. It was a title God by Isaiah (lxv. 16) gave Himself,—“the God of Amen.” It had the force of an oath, as when the accused woman was to reply to the Priest, reciting the curse upon perjury, Amen, Amen, in the trial for jealousy (Num. v. 22). It, of course, passed into Christian use at once (1 Cor. xiv. 16), but our LORD gave it a significance which we undervalue. The enunciation of solemn central truths of His Revelation was always preceded by an Amen, Amen (Verily, Verily), as in St. John iii. 3, 5, 11; v. 19, 24, 25; vi. 32, 47, 53; viii. 51, 58, etc. Compare with this and with Is. lxv. 16; Rev. iii. 14. The response was always made loud and full. The Amen should be printed in other type when it is a response than when it is an invocation. In the one case (in Italics) the congregation alone respond, as in the prayers generally, but when it is also for the minister to use, it should be always printed in Roman.

American Church, The (officially, “The Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America”), is that branch of the One, Holy, Catholic, Apostolic Church in America which traces its Apostolic origin through the Church of England. It is in communion and in agreement in doctrine, discipline, and worship with the Church of England, which it venerates as its mother-Church, while being at the same time as entirely independent of it as any daughter can be who has left her mother's home and is mistress of a house and family of her own.

Through the Church of England this Church has affiliations with the whole Church of the West. In its Creeds and Liturgy and Discipline it occupies the ground which is common to all the churches of CHRIST from the beginning. As having cast off the errors of Rome, it is so far in sympathy with those bodies of Christians who, since the Reformation of the sixteenth century, have been known as Protestant and Reformed.

The history of the Church in America is a story of full three hundred years, for it was in the year 1578 that on the shores of Frobisher's Straits (named in honor of the admiral in command) “Master Walfall celebrated a communion upon land, at the partaking whereof were the captain and many others with him. The celebration of the Divine mystery was the first signs, seals, and confirmation of CHRIST's death and passion ever known in these quarters.” The first known baptisms in English America were those of Virginia Dare, the granddaughter of Governor White, and “Manteo the savage,” both baptized on shipboard off Roanoke Island, on the coast of North Carolina, both baptized by White, the governor of Raleigh's second colony. Another layman, Sir Thomas Hariot, records his use of the Prayer-Book among “the poor infidels” in 1585,—one of “the first lay-readers in the American Church.” The next date takes us north again. In 1605 an expedition sailed from Bristol, under Captain Richard Weymouth, whose declared object was “the promulgating of God's holy Church by planting Christianity,” and which sailed up the Penobscot and erected a cross near the site of the present town of Belfast. This attempt failed, but two years later another effort promised better results. In August, 1607, a company, among whom was the Rev. Richard Seymour, landed on an island at the mouth of the Sagadahock, or Kennebec, and, besides fifty houses and a fort and store-house, built a church. The severity of the climate, and a fire that destroyed their store-house and church, disheartened them, and they returned to England the next season. This was thirteen years before the celebrated Pilgrim Fathers landed on Plymouth Rock. The same year, 1607, the first permanent settlement was effected in Virginia. In May, 1607, under Mr. Robert Hunt, a priest of the Church of England, the first services were held, and a church begun at Jamestown in Virginia. Services were held at first “under an awning and in an old cotton tent. This,” says Captain John Smith, “was our church till we built a homely thing like a barn, where we had daily common prayer morning and evening, every Sunday two sermons, and every three months the Holy Communion till our minister died. But our prayers daily, with an homily on Sundays, we continued till more preachers came.” With liberal gifts of money and land the Church in Virginia was in a fair way to prosper, though the disturbances at home told upon the colonies, and the clergy who came out were by no means all that they should have been. Among those who deserve to be remembered were Buck and Whitaker, who succeeded Mr. Hunt. Whitaker has been named the Apostle of Virginia. He it was who baptized Pocahontas. In the mean time settlements were being established all along the coast under different religious influences, and some of them, as in New England, distinctly hostile to the Church. Among them were here and there Churchmen and Church colonies, though the Church was never so strong, even in Virginia and Maryland, as is often supposed. Elsewhere it was very weak.

The case of Maryland is peculiar and not generally understood. The Charter of 1634 and the Act of 1649 are represented as a noble instance of religious toleration on the part of Roman Catholics, but without sufficient ground. Those acts, it is true, were obtained by Roman Catholics, but they were granted not by them, but to them. They were obtained from Charles and his advisers for the special benefit of Roman Catholics, and Roman Catholics took advantage of them, as it was intended that they should. That liberty and protection which was granted was all they asked for, and all they could have obtained. But neither in Maryland nor anywhere else did Roman authority ever regard the doctrine "that in conscience and in worship men should be free" as anything but insanity (deliramentum). In Maryland from the first the Church of England was "protected," and the Rev. Richard James, a clergyman of the Church of England, came on with the first Lord Baltimore and with his flock settled on Kent Island, opposite Annapolis. In 1623, Governor Robert Gorges brought with him the Rev. William Morrell, a Church of England clergyman, to his colony on Massachusetts Bay. In 1630 the Rev. William Blackstone sold his farm in Shawmut, where Boston now stands, and removed to Providence. In 1629, John and Samuel Brown, two of the original patentees, were banished from Salem for using the Prayer-Book. In 1646 and 1664 petitions were presented in Boston for permission to use the Prayer-Book; and the petitioners were punished for sedition. The first church services were held in Boston in 1686. None are known to have been held within the limits of New York before 1678, nor in Pennsylvania before 1695. When the Independents became the masters in Maryland, they at once repealed the laws of toleration and proscribed "popery and prelacy," as they had from the first in New England.

The Church grew, however, slowly, but it was without head or chief pastors until 1685, when Dr. Blair was sent to Virginia as Commissary of the Bishop of London; there was no authority over the Presbyters of the Church, who too often were just the men who needed overlooking. Soon afterwards Dr. Bray was sent out as Commissary to Maryland, and they did what good men could who were clothed with such authority as a Bishop can delegate, but who still were not Bishops. The Church in America for another hundred years was an Episcopal Church without a Bishop. Dr. Blair was Commissary of Virginia for fifty-three years. Dr. Bray entered upon the field of his labors in 1700, and a result of his missionary zeal was the founding of two societies which have done so much for the cause of the Gospel, the Society for promoting Christian Knowledge, and the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts. When after a few years he returned home, the majority of the colony of Maryland were accounted of the communion of the Church. In 1667 New Amsterdam was ceded to the English, and in 1696 "Trinity Church," in New York, was built and endowed. In 1679 King's Chapel, in Boston, was erected "for the exercise of religion according to the Church of England."

At the time of the foundation of the S. P. G. "in South Carolina were 7000 souls, besides negroes and Indians, living without any minister of the Church, and above half regardless of any religion. In North Carolina above 5000 without any minister. Virginia containing 40,000, divided into 40 parishes, but wanting near half the number of clergymen. Maryland containing 25,000, in 26 parishes, wanting half the number of clergymen. In Pennsylvania at least 20,000 souls, of which not above 700 frequent the church, and not above 250 are communicants. In New York the numbers are 30,000, 1200, 450. In Connecticut, 30,800, 150, 35. In other colonies of New England, 90,000, 750, 150." And the writer adds, "This is the true though melancholy state of our Church in North America."

The missionaries of the S. P. G. were sent into the provinces in which the Church had no establishment, as it had in Virginia and Maryland, and fruit was not wanting to their labors, though it was not gathered without opposition. In New England the movement Churchward began within the very walls of Yale College, when Dr. Cutter the rector of the college, and Messrs. Johnson and Brown, two of the tutors, through reading of works of the English divines in the college library, were brought to resign their positions, and in 1723 went over to England for ordination. Mr. Brown died in England of smallpox, but Dr. Cutter in Boston, and Mr. Johnson at Stratford, labored many years, and exerted a powerful influence for the Church. Many more would have followed them into the priesthood, but were deterred by the dangers of the sea-voyage and "the unhappy fate of Mr. Brown." "The fountain of all our misery is the want of a Bishop." They were bitterly opposed and persecuted, but nowhere in the country were there so many native clergy, and nowhere was the Church more firmly planted, at the breaking out of the Revolution, than in Connecticut. On the other hand, in Virginia and Maryland the Church, though comparatively strong in numbers, was weak in influence. There was no Episcopal authority, and the whole system of the Church was gradually dissolved. "Certainly," says Bishop White, "the different Episcopalian congregations knew of no union before the Revolution : except what was the result of the connection which they in common had with the Bishop of London. That authority being withdrawn, the clergy and people of any district might, without unlawfulness, have acted for themselves, and in some departments such a proceeding would not have been surprising."

There could be no confirmations and no ordinations, and the supply of clergy fell off, and the authority which belonged to a Bishop was usurped or lost altogether.

Many causes were at work to prevent the appointment of a Bishop, and to make that which was not altogether easy at first more and more difficult. The primary obstacle lay in the eighteenth century idea, which friends and enemies shared alike, that a Bishop was partly an ecclesiastical functionary and at least half a State dignitary. Many who would not have objected to a "purely religious Episcopacy" did object to a "political Episcopacy." So general has this apprehension become that Bishop White declares his belief that a few years before the Revolutionary war it would have been "impossible to have obtained the concurrence of a respectable number of laymen in any measure for the obtaining of an American Bishop," and that when all were ready to avow "their preference of Episcopacy and of a form of prayer." To add force to this apprehension came in the understanding that this dignity required a large endowment to support him. But more than all other causes was the prevailing ignorance and coldness which prevailed even among professed friends of the Church in the colonies.

A writer in 1735 expresses the feeling of a great many, who writes that "considering how long a time it is since the establishment (of the S. P. G.), the colonies may by this time be provided with ministers among themselves, and likewise be of sufficient abilities to support them if they were inclined to it." And still more when he adds, "in effect I know hardly any here that are disposed to do much for promoting or advancing religion, or that seems to be much concerned what becomes of it either abroad or at home." Efforts were made, but they failed. At one time matters went so far that a palace was purchased for the Bishop at Burlington, and considerable bequests were received for the endowment of the See, but the death of the queen in 1712 put a stop to all proceedings. In 1727, chiefly through the exertions of Berkeley (afterwards Bishop), a charter and a grant were obtained, but before the broad seal was attached the king died. Once the Church came near obtaining Bishops in spite of opposition, when Dr. Welton and Mr. Talbot were consecrated by one of the non-juring Bishops. But the matter went no further. Dr. Welton was summoned home, and Mr. Talbot dismissed from his post as missionary of the S. P. G. Archbishop Secker renewed the effort in 1761, and the New England clergy joined in strong representations, but all in vain.

But God was preparing for His Church a deliverance in His own way. England's statesmen in neglecting the Church in America had neglected the strongest of all bonds between the colonies and the mother-country, and England owes in no small degree to that neglect the loss of these colonies. When the war of the Revolution came, while in the North the Church clergy were generally loyal to the mother-country, they were weak in numbers and in influence. For a time it seemed as though the war, with its consequent hatred of England, would work the destruction of the Church. But instead, it gave her freedom. The close of the war saw most of the clergy exiles, their churches desecrated or destroyed, and their congregations broken up. In Pennsylvania only one church was left,—Christ Church, in Philadelphia, under the Rev. (afterwards Bishop) William White. Virginia entered on the war with 164 churches and chapels and 91 clergymen. At the close of the contest a large "number of her churches were destroyed, 95 parishes were extinct or forsaken, and only 28 clergymen remained, and the Church was so depressed and so little zeal was found in her members that Dr. Griffith was unable to go over, with Drs. White and Provost, to be consecrated Bishop of Virginia, because funds could not be raised to defray his expenses."

The number of those in "English America" who belonged to the Church was never so large as would be and is naturally supposed, partly owing to the fact that some of the colonies were settled by those disaffected and hostile to the Church, partly because of the immigration of those of other nations. At the beginning of the Revolutionary war there were only about eighty clergymen of the Church to the north and east of Maryland, and those, except in Boston, Newport, New York, and Philadelphia, principally supported by the S. P. G. Outside of Philadelphia there were never more than six in Pennsylvania. In Maryland and Virginia the Church was more numerous, and supported by legal establishments. Farther south they were less than in these provinces, but more than in the North. And besides this paucity of numbers, the very connection and name of England was a disadvantage. But the greatest disadvantage of all lay in its very organization, which required Bishops, who were denied.

The difficulties which stand in the way of the Church are illustrated by the fact that Mr. Adams took up the case of some candidates for orders, and through the Danish minister at the court of St. James made application for their ordination to the Danish Church, which was favorably received but never acted upon. Indeed, those who sought to supply the exigency had no idea of having recourse to any others besides the English Bishops, at least until that hope failed.

In 1784 occurred a correspondence which needs no comment to illustrate the condition of the Church. Two young men had braved the dangers of the sea to obtain ordination in England, but had been refused because the Bishops could not dispense with the oaths of uniformity, and they applied to Franklin for assistance. His answer is dated "Passy, near Paris," and with a refreshing innocence he informs them that he had applied to the Pope's Nuncio on their behalf, but advised them to give up the thought of England and go to the Church of Ireland, and if that application failed, to act as though England and Ireland were sunk in the sea; and expresses his wonder "that men in America qualified to pray for and instruct their neighbors should not be permitted to do it till they have voyaged 6000 miles to ask leave of a cross old gentleman at Canterbury, who seems, by your own account, to have as little regard for your souls as did Attorney-General Seymour for those of Virginia. Commissary Blair begged him to consider that the people of Virginia had souls to be saved. 'Souls!' (said he); '— your souls! make tobacco.'"

One curious result of the want of Bishops may well be noticed. In 1784, John Wesley ordained and sent out Dr. Coke to be Superintendent of the Methodist Societies in America, and afterwards joined Mr. Asbury with him in office. Partly as a result of this action, the Methodists were separated from the Church. For this action, so opposed to his former conduct and teaching, Mr. Wesley gave the reason that while at home he would not suffer it, inasmuch as there were in America "no Bishops with legal jurisdiction, his scruples were at an end." The excuse is a sufficiently weak one, and it is Dr. Coke's own testimony that he went further in separation than Mr. Wesley intended, as he did in calling himself a Bishop; but such as the excuse is, it suggests some interesting questions as to the possibilities in case even this had been wanting. It was only in November of the same year that Bishop Seabury was consecrated. In 1791, Dr. Coke applied to Bishop White for the ordination of the Methodist ministers and for the consecration of himself and Mr. Asbury, and expressed a strong regret for his past action and desire of reunion. The effort came to naught, but when the question of separation turned upon such points, it is hardly possible to avoid saying to ourselves, What might have been if a Bishop had been here! So hopeless did the prospect seem of obtaining Bishops and continuing the proper ministry of the Church, that Dr. White put forth a scheme of presbyterian and provisional ordination, in order that the duty of worship and of preaching the Gospel might not utterly lapse. But the peace of 1783 opened a better prospect, and in 1784 several conferences were held in Brunswick, N. J., in Philadelphia and New York, which resulted in a General Convention in Philadelphia in 1785. But in the mean time the clergy of Connecticut had acted for themselves, and by their appointment Dr. Samuel Seabury sailed for England and applied for consecration as Bishop. But the English prelates could do nothing without the consent of the ministry, and the ministry would not give their consent without a formal request of Congress, which of course was out of the question; and after waiting some months in vain, at length following the instructions which he had received at home, and acting upon the advice of friends in England, Dr. Seabury turned his steps to Scotland, where was a Church which, if it was persecuted by the state, and its assemblies forbidden by law, was, at least, not hampered in its spiritual rights by state control. On the 14th of November, 1784, in a little upper room in Aberdeen, the first Bishop of the American Church was consecrated by three Bishops, Kilgour, Petre, and Skinner, and in June, 1785, he was at home. His consecration had a double good effect, encouraging the Churchmen of America and rousing the authorities in England, by the certainty that even if they were refused by England, Scotland could and would supply them with Bishops.

At the Convention in Philadelphia in October, 1785, seven States were represented. Dr. White presided, and it is to his meekness and wisdom that the Church owes its deliverance from the many dangers that encompassed it. There were grave differences on almost every conceivable subject. Some were afraid of a Bishop, and wanted his hands tied and himself made the creature of the Convention. Some would have excluded the laity from the Convention. Some would omit the opening petitions of the Litany. Bishop Seabury and his clergy declined to attend the Convention. By some Dr. White himself was charged with Socinianism. There were elements in the Church and in the Convention that boded neither any good, but out of them all the Lord delivered them.

The "proposed book" of 1785, which was by order of the Convention sent out into the different States for consideration, and which embodied many radical changes from the English Prayer-Book, fell flat. Correspondence with the English Prelates resulted in bringing the mind of the Church to a general agreement that the best thing to be done was to take the English book with as few changes as possible, and when, in 1786, Dr. White and Dr. Provoost, elected for Pennsylvania and New York, arrived in England, they were favorably received, and on February 4, 1787, were consecrated in Lambeth Chapel by the two Archbishops, and the Bishops of Bath and Wells, and Peterborough. In 1789 the union between the Dioceses was happily effected, Bishops White and Seabury constituting the House of Bishops in General Convention. When again the alterations in the Prayer-Book came under discussion, the influence of Bishop Seabury appears in the important alterations in the Communion office, by which that office follows the Scottish model. The prayers of invocation and oblation are those of the First Book of Edward VI., but the order is that of the Scottish and of the ancient Liturgies. It was a change that "lay very near to the heart of Bishop Seabury," who even doubted whether the form of the Church of England "strictly amounted to a consecration." When the proposed change came down to the lower house, by the influence of the President, Dr. William Smith, it was accepted without opposition. By it "the Holy Eucharist is restored to its ancient dignity and efficacy," and we have an office than which nothing more magnificent and worthy can be conceived. In comparison with this great gain, for which, under God, we have to thank Bishop Seabury, the other changes and omissions are small. The omission of the Athanasian Creed was the only important omission. Besides changes required by the changed political condition of the country, others were made. Selections from the Psalms were added to the Psalter. The Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis were omitted, the Venite and Benedictus shortened, and other alterations were made, some of them decided improvements, some decided losses, and some for which it would be hard to give a reason, but none of them affecting any doctrine or indicating any "essential departure from the doctrines, discipline, or worship of the Church of England."

The revolution, therefore, effected no break in the line of the Church's history. Nothing in her discipline, or worship, or practice is to be regarded as having a beginning at that time. There were portions of the Prayer-Book, as the Articles, for example, not finally acted upon until 1801, and even later, but there was no release from former obligations on that account, except from those political obligations which were affected by the war. The Church always had the Liturgy, and that which was not expressly changed simply continued in force. The declaration which was made in the Convention of 1811, that the Protestant Episcopal Church is the Church formerly known under the name of "the Church of England in America," a declaration called for by some disputes which had arisen about land-titles, expressed the universal understanding that in no respect was this a "new Church." We look back over the long struggle for existence which culminated so successfully, and we are more and more impressed with the greatness of the leaders of the Church, of the two especially who made up the House of Bishops in 1789, and on whom so much depended; but of those two we must give the palm to one. Bishop Seabury's zeal and devotion to Church principles supplied what was lacking in the character of Bishop White, and we owe him a great debt of admiration and gratitude. But the gentle and firm hand that guided the frail bark of the Church through the dangers that beset her on every side, the one man who was to the Church what Washington was to the State, was WILLIAM WHITE.

The life was still very feeble. In 1790, one hundred and eighty-four years after the first planting of the Church of England in Virginia, Dr. Madison went over to England and was consecrated Bishop of Virginia. But nineteen years after, when the General Convention was held in Baltimore, the Bishop of Virginia considered that his duties to the college of which he was president were sufficient excuse for his absence from Convention, and the Diocese was not represented. At that Convention only Bishops White and Claggett were present, and, as Bishop Claggett was just recovering from a severe illness, it was a question not unlikely to present itself whether a single Bishop could constitute a house. Special reasons doubtless existed in some Dioceses for the weakness of the Church. In Virginia the immediate and apparent reason was the withdrawal of the stipends and seizure of the glebes by the Legislature. Patrick Henry resisted the act to the last, and as long as he lived it could never be obtained, and it was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States; but, aside from the illegality of the act, such was the character of many of the clergy who received the stipends and held the glebes, that, in the opinion of Bishop Meade, the loss of them was the saving of the Church, by relieving her of the burden of unworthy ministers and throwing her upon her own resources, though for a time her condition was deplorable.

The Convention of 1811 met in New Haven under serious difficulties, since out of seven Bishops in the Church there were but two present,—Bishops White and Jarvis. Bishop Claggett was prevented from attendance by sickness; Bishop Madison by the duties of his college. Bishop Provost was in ill health. The consecration of Drs. Hobart and Griswold was necessarily postponed, and, after the Bishops had gone down to New York, it was till the last minute doubtful whether the assistance of Bishop Provost could be obtained. He, however, "finally found himself strong enough to give his attendance, and thus the business was happily accomplished."

The Church in America was in more ways than one hampered by its English origin. The branch had been bound, and choked almost to death by long neglect before it was broken off and planted in the American soil, and it inherited many of the defects and deformities of worship and discipline of the mother-Church at that time. In its earliest dealing with its own proper missionary work it rivaled its teacher. In 1801 several clergy of Western Pennsylvania and Virginia, which were largely settled by Church people, made an effort to have the Western country organized into a separate Diocese. It was not till 1808 that General Convention gave the desired permission, which, in effect, was repeated in 1811. In 1819, Philander Chase was consecrated for Ohio; but it was not till 1825 that a Bishop was seen in Pennsylvania west of the Alleghanies. From 1800 to 1823 the clergy in Pennsylvania had only increased from 16 to 34. It is only natural to add that the Church in the western part of the State had been for many years in a state of decline, while the disposition to fraternize with those who in doctrine and discipline were the Church's enemies, and to "oppose the received properties of our Communion, or to undermine them insidiously and by degrees," saddened the last years of Bishop White's life, and made him fear, while he prayed, for the Church's existence.

In Maryland, party spirit ran so high that at Dr. Kemp's election a party endeavored to create a schism in the Church, and after the death of Bishop Stone, in 1838, it was three years, and after two elected had declined the See, that a successful choice was made.

In Virginia, the Convention which assembled to elect Bishop Moore, after Bishop Madison's death, numbered only 7 clergy and 17 laymen, and was the first which had met for seven years. In Richmond "Episcopacy was almost dead." Churchmen assured Dr. Moore that "no man could carry out our forms in all their rubrical sign;" but the man of their choice had had a different training and held different views, and acted upon them, though he was not able to carry the body of his clergy with him. The Church in Virginia, through his efforts and those of his successor, was roused from its slumbers that were almost death. Only three years before the election of Bishop Moore to Virginia, John Henry Hobart had been chosen Assistant Bishop of New York, and along with Dr. Griswold had been consecrated at a time when the Episcopate could with the greatest difficulty muster the necessary three for a consecration. He did not find the Church or the Churchmanship of New York what he left it, or what it has been ever since, but he roused his own Diocese from its slumbers, and the influence of his writing and preaching, and of his laborious and holy life, was felt in the State as well as the Diocese, and went out over the whole country and through the whole Church. His motto was "the Gospel in the Church," and he shrunk from no labor and from no contest in behalf of his belief. Bishop White looked forward to the future of his son in the faith with the keenest hope "that he would not cease to be efficient in extending the Church and preserving her integrity," and it was fulfilled. Schools and seminaries were established, publication societies incorporated, the Board of Missions was organized, the old apologetic tone was laid aside, and the Church claimed her place and her right. It is one indication of the rapid turn of the tide that the Diocese which at his consecration contained 40 clergy, twenty-four years afterwards—five years after his death—contained 198. Not till 1819 was the first "Western" Bishop consecrated,—Philander Chase for Ohio. In 1835, the last Convention at which Bishop White presided, Jackson Kemper was consecrated the first Missionary Bishop of the Northwest, and in his sermon at the consecration Bishop Doane spoke for the Church, which was awakening to new life, when he laid down the principle that this "Church is to be a Missionary Church, that her Bishops are true Apostles, and that of this missionary body every Christian by the terms of his baptismal vow is a member."

The difference between the Church of then and now is greater than appears by any mere comparison of numbers. We read in reports of General Convention, "so many Bishops present, so many Dioceses represented;" but the bodies which they represented were smaller still. In Illinois, in 1835, "three clergymen met for organization," and "this Convention unanimously appoint Philander Chase to the Episcopate of Illinois;" and at the seventh Annual Convention the Bishop reports "that neither as pioneer missionary, as a Diocesan Bishop, or as parish minister, has he received any salary except $12." In Delaware, in 1791, 3 clergymen and 11 laymen met to frame a constitution and organize the Church. In the Peninsula of which Delaware forms part, in 1827, there were only 15 clergy, while there were 40 churches in a fit state for worship. In Kentucky the "organization of the Diocese was thus happily effected, there being 16 lay delegates and 3 of the clerical order," only one of whom was "settled." In North Carolina, where, in 1770, a list is given of 18 settled clergy, and which was organized in 1817, at Bishop Ravenscroft's death, in 1830, the clergy only numbered 11. In South Carolina, where 153 clergy are recorded as laboring from 1700 to 1800, in 1786 only 9 parishes are represented. On the other hand, South Carolina, in 1882, reports 45 clergy; North Carolina, 73, and in 1883 asks for a division; Kentucky 36 clergy; and Illinois is a province including 3 Dioceses, with 60, 26, and 45 clergy, respectively.

Bishop Doane was elected to New Jersey in 1832, and died in 1858. During his Episcopate the number of communicants in New Jersey increased from 800 to 4500, the clergy from 14 to 94, and the parishes from 31 to 79. In 1882 the two Dioceses of New Jersey and Northern New Jersey report 99 clergy and nearly 8000 communicants, and 80 clergy and 8700 communicants.

The first Convention of New York, in 1785, consisted of 5 clergy and delegates from 7 parishes. In 1811, the year of Bishop Hobart's consecration, the number of clergy was 40. In 1835, five years after his death, the number was 194.

In 1882 the Dioceses of New York, Albany, Western New York, Central New York, and Long Island contained 743 clergy and 87,364 communicants.

Pennsylvania, which, in 1811, contained 20 clergy, in 1882 reports in the three Dioceses of Pennsylvania, Pittsburg, and Central Pennsylvania 352 clergy and 39,251 communicants.

Some figures presented at the General Convention of 1883 will give an idea of the general growth of the Church. In 1790 there were 7 Dioceses and 190 clergy; in 1800, 12,000 communicants. In 1832, 18 Dioceses, 592 clergy, 80,939 communicants. In 1883, 48 Dioceses and 15 missionary jurisdictions, with 67 Bishops, 3575 clergy, 4348 parishes and missions, 378,000 communicants. Between 1865 and 1883 the revenue of the Church increased from $6,471,669 to $23,217,765.

When the venerable Bishop Green took leave of the Convention of 1883, he said, "Of the Convention of 1823, which met in this city, I alone am alive. When I went into holy orders, sixty-three years ago, there were nine Bishops in the Church. When I looked around me to-day in the House of Bishops I cast my eyes upon more than seven times that number. How hath God wrought! His blessing hath been upon the Church and she hath prospered." Since 1800, when the first report is made of communicants, the increase has been over 30 to 1, while the population of the country has increased as 10 or 12 to 1.

If, however, the American Church suffered from the deadness of the English Church in the last century and in the first part of this century, it has felt in no less a degree the movement of life which has wrought such a reformation and restoration in that Church in the last forty years, and it is still feeling it. There was "in the forties" the same panic—fear of "popery"—here as in England, and the same folly has been repeated on occasion since; but wisdom has come with advancing years: only a weak handful has gone over to Rome to justify the fears, while in respect of knowledge of the Church and faith in her as a true branch of the Church Catholic, of the doctrine and practice of worship, of belief in her mission in America, there has been a general education and elevation that has brought whole "parties" forward upon ground which, forty years ago, they were almost ready to condemn as heretical. The Convention of 1844 came to the conclusion of far-sighted wisdom when, after days of excited discussion, the effort of some to procure a condemnation of the doctrine of the Oxford Tracts resulted in a vote of confidence in the "Liturgy, officers, and Articles and Canons of the Church as sufficient exponents of the sense of Holy Scripture, and affording ample means of discipline and correction." A similar result was reached in 1868, and again in 1871, when, after a protracted and brilliant discussion, the conclusion was in effect a vote of general condemnation of all ceremonies fitted to express a doctrine foreign to that set forth in the authorized standards of the Church, and expressing confidence in the paternal counsel and advice of the Right Reverend Fathers.

Some untoward events require to be noticed. The trial and suspension of the two brothers, Bishop Henry W. Onderdonk, of Pennsylvania, in 1844, and of Bishop Benjamin T. Onderdonk, of New York, in 1846, demonstrated at least the power of discipline that existed in the Church. The attempted "trial" of Bishop Doane (1849-53) resulted not only in his triumphant acquittal, and in "making the trial of a Bishop hard," but established firmly the principles of order upon which an Episcopal Church must stand. Bishop Ives, in 1853, set the only example of a Bishop of this Church perverting to Rome. In 1873, Bishop Cummins became the leader of the only schism which has rent the Church, and which has effectually taught us the lesson that all the treachery and danger does not lurk on one side of the camp. The "Reformed Episcopal Church," commonly known as the "Cumminsite movement," still continues to exist for our warning.

A real danger was escaped at the close of the civil war of 1861-65. During the war the Southern Dioceses had organized themselves under the title of the "Church in the Confederate States," and in the General Convention of 1862, which met in the midst of the war, none of them were represented. But in 1865, at the close of the war, two Southern Bishops presented themselves at the General Convention, and the reunion of the once politically-divided Church was happily and thoroughly effected. All signs of that division have long passed away, and no others appear to disturb us or to hinder our progress.

At the Convention of 1880 the new arrangement went into operation, by which the Convention is made the Board of Missions, and the session was marked by a new interest in the subject of missions. Three new missionary jurisdictions were set off and Bishops elected. The special work of the Convention of 1883 was dealing with the report of the committee on enrichment of the Prayer-Book. To some this work, and that of missions, seem to partake of the same character of catholicity with the final action upon doctrine and ritual in former Conventions, and either are a far more worthy subject of the attention of the Convention than the length of a cassock, or the conversation in a seminary student's room. It is believed that the development of the missionary work of the Church and the work of enrichment of the Prayer-Book will make the Conventions of 1880 and 1883, in the future judgment of the Church, among the most important Conventions that have been held.

The American Church is not without weak points in her constitution, some of which she inherited, and for some of which the neglect and exposure of her early existence are responsible.

The pew-system, which makes it a possible and not improbable thing that the poor shall be excluded from the house of the Lord; the vestry system and delegate system of most Dioceses, which makes it not impossible that the body on which depends the calling and supporting of a rector, and the lay portion of that body which elects the Bishop, may be composed of unbaptized unbelievers; the want of endowments, which makes the living of the clergy a precarious hire; the small salaries which hinder young men from entering the ministry, and which produce frequent changes of parishes; the disposition of the lay-power and the purse-power to tyrannize over the clergy;—these are some of the special forms of evil in our constitution, though not one of them is peculiar to us. On the other hand, there are some advantages which are the result of the independence of Church and State in this country which it would be difficult to overestimate. The Church in America is absolutely free from state control. She has only to speak the word to be absolutely free from the control of official worldliness. She is free to carry on her own affairs in her own way. Her failures and successes are her own. She has a fair field and no favor. Her relation to the state is that of the primitive Church, with the added advantage of being respected instead of persecuted. She is in the midst of a hundred different religious bodies, and in the eye of the state she is one among the hundred. But her real position in her own eyes is that she offers a centre of union for them all, and occupies the ground of apostolic order and evangelic truth, towards which all of them are tending, and where all can stand together. Her past history furnishes no ground for boasting, but much for gratitude and encouragement. The days of doubt and darkness have passed away; she no longer apologizes for existence or hesitates to assert her claims. Let us hope that the days of division and doubting each other have passed away also. The present is full of encouragement. The future is in the hands of them that believe and lay hold of it.

REV. L. W. GIBSON.

Amice. A vestment worn on the shoulders over the cassock and covering the neck. Apparently it was a sort of cape which could be drawn over the head. It was in use in pagan times, but the earliest use of it mentioned in England was in the tenth century. It was later a sort of fur cape. If, as is now held, the vestments were varieties of the usual dress which, being made of richer material and with more costly ornamentation, were used in the services, the amice was evidently used as a protection from the cold. When it was used as a distinct and sacred vestment, the mystical meaning of it was that it denoted the Helmet of Salvation, and a short prayer was recited when it was put on, imploring the overshadowing of the HOLY SPIRIT.

Amos, whose name signifies "burden," was of the herdsmen of Tekoah, a village not far from Bethlehem, and probably, though nowhere so recorded, a native of the place, as his tomb was shown there in the time of St. Jerome. It was in the days of Uzziah, King of Judah, and of Jeroboam II., King of Israel, that he was called to deliver God's message against the nations neighboring to Israel and Judah, and especially against the northern kingdom of Israel. The date of his prophecy is variously assigned to the years between 808 B.C. and 784 B.C., during which period these kings were contemporary.

Amos declares of himself that he was not the son of a prophet, nor trained in any school of prophets (chap. vii. 14), but that it was from feeding his flocks and gathering the fruits of the sycamore (Ficus Sycomorus) that the LORD took him and said, "Go, prophesy unto my people Israel."

This statement of his occupation and manner of life is corroborated by many expressions in the prophecy, which show the author to be a man accustomed to out-door life, observant of nature and familiar with the care of cattle (see chap. ii. 9, 13; iii. 4, 5, 12; iv. 1, 2, 9; v. 8; vii. 1; ix. 9, 13). Yet this prophet's language is not that of an unlettered or ignorant man, as it exhibits great natural powers of thought, of observation, and experience, and further presupposes a popular acquaintance with the Pentateuch, and implies ceremonies of religion (though corrupted by Jeroboam) in accordance with the law of Moses. The prophecy displays a remarkable unity throughout, and was probably put into its present form by the author himself; it may be analyzed into four principal parts, viz.: I. Chap. i. to ii. 3. A general denunciation against various nations connected with Judah and Israel; II. Chap. ii. 4, to vi. 14. Prophecies against Judah, and especially against Israel; III. Chap. vii. to ix. 10. An account of the prophet's visit to Bethel, and a series of visions or prophetic symbols; IV. Chap. ix. 10 to end. An evangelical prophecy foretelling the day when the fallen tabernacle of David shall be raised up again, and the hope of the MESSIAH's kingdom shall be fulfilled. The vigor, beauty, and freshness of the prophet's style have been acknowledged from the earliest times. It is true St. Jerome calls him "rude in speech, but not in knowledge," but the opinion of Bishop Lowth is far otherwise, as follows: "Let any person who has candor and perspicacity enough to judge, not from the man, but from his writings, open the volume of his predictions, and he will, I think, agree with me that our shepherd 'is not a whit behind the very chief of the prophets.' He will agree that as in sublimity and magnificence he is almost equal to the greatest, so in splendor of diction and elegance of expression he is scarcely inferior to any." (Lowth's Lectures on Hebrew Poetry.)

There is a tradition that Amos suffered martyrdom at the hands of his offended countrymen, but there is no sure foundation for the assertion, which might easily have been a development of Amaziah's complaint to Jeroboam, "Amos hath conspired against thee in the midst of the House of Israel; the land is not able to bear all his words."

Amphibalum. A name for a part of the ecclesiastical dress used in Gaul. Its Greek derivation is one of the minor proofs that the Gallican Church received so much of its details as well as its foundation from the East. The word was synonymous with casula, or chasuble, and was probably a heavy outer garment worn in bad weather; but as its texture and use were modified in course of time it passed into ecclesiastical use, and became a part of the vestments in the service. It was seamless, or rather united from top to bottom without any slit for the hands, without sleeves. It is probably identical with the phenoleon worn by the Eastern Bishops.

Analogy of Faith (Rom. xii. 6. A. V. "proportion of the faith"). It is evident that faith here is not the act of the mind, whether as a "saving faith" or merely belief. It must be compared (Eph. iv.) "with One Faith," and, Jude v. 3, "the Faith once delivered to the saints." It must therefore stand for the body of the doctrines whose contents are the object of faith. If so, it will be necessary to compare it with 2 Tim. i. 13, "the form of sound words." Now reverting to Rom. xii. 6, "Having therefore gifts differing according to the grace that is given us, whether prophecy, let us prophesy according to the proportion [analogy] of the Faith," the only fair conclusion that can be drawn is that there was a distinct body of doctrinal statements universally received, for St. Paul had no authority over the Christians at Rome, and therefore spoke of not what he might have ordained, but of what all received together, and to which the teacher was to conform his public teaching. It points to an apostolic form of the Creed; but without pressing this so far, this phrase of the Apostle's shows that already there was a criterion by which all teachers should be guided, and which was received as authoritative. It is as clear that at that date, 58 A.D., there was no body of Christian literature such as the New Testament now is that could claim that position. Therefore if it was not a Creed, as we now mean by this word, it was something equivalent to it. Again, there follows the necessity for us now to use the same restraint, not selecting such texts as suit our views, but using them all fairly, i.e., according to the proportion of the Faith. Compare Article XX. in the XXXIX. Articles: "The Church hath power to decree Rites or Ceremonies and authority in Controversies of Faith; and yet it is not lawful for the Church to ordain anything that is contrary to God's Word, written: neither may it so expound one place of Scripture that it be repugnant to another. Wherefore, although the Church be a Witness and a Keeper of Holy Writ, yet as it ought not to decree anything against the same, so besides the same it ought not to enforce anything to be believed for necessity of salvation."

Anaphora. (Gr. lifting up; offering; cf. Heb. vii. 27, offering sacrifices; thence the oblation at the Holy Communion.) The term Anaphora is, then, equivalent to our Lift up your hearts. The whole subject will come up under the word Liturgy, but it may be well here to compare the Eastern Liturgy with our own. Omitting the preparation, we have—

Preface.	Lift up your hearts.
Prayer of the Triumphal Hymn.	Preface.
Triumphal Hymn.	Sanctus.
Commemoration of our LORD's Life.	All glory be to Thee, etc.
Commemoration of institution.	And did institute, etc.
Words of institution for the Bread.	He took bread.
Words of institution for the Wine.	Likewise.
Oblation of the Body and Blood.	Wherefore, O LORD, etc.
Prayer for the Descent of the HOLY GHOST.	And we most humbly, etc.
Prayer for the change of the Elements.
General intercession for Quick and Dead.	Cf. Prayer for CHRIST, Church Militant, and Here we offer and present, etc.
Prayer before the LORD's Prayer.	Nothing directly parallel in our Prayer-book.
LORD's Prayer.
Embolismus, Prayer after LORD's Prayer.
Prayer of inclination Holy things to Holy Persons.
Fraction.
Confession.	ALMIGHTY GOD Maker of all.
Communion.	Communion.
Antidoro, or Thanksgiving.	Almighty and ever Living God.

But this, though the general order, was not invariable. The preceding preparation (pro-anaphora) was far less changed than this which we now would shrink from changing. Our own Prayer-Book has, in the placing the Invocation in the office, drawn more nearly to the Eastern rule than have any other of the Western Churches.

Anathema. (Gr. a devoted thing or offering. A cutting off from the offices and privileges of the Church of an obstinate offender.) Anathema was the greater, as Aphorismos or Separation was the lesser, excommunication. It is the extremest act of discipline that can be inflicted. It was based upon the words of our LORD, "If he will not hear the Church, let him be as an heathen man and a publican." "He must be a grievous and scandalous sinner, notorious, under accusation and conviction." St. Paul used the term five times, and always to express strong feeling of condemnation. It was derived from the Septuagint translation by the New Testament writers, and was understood by them in its deepest spiritual sense, not merely formal exclusion from the Church's privileges, but a most serious, nay, fatal loss to the soul. "If any man love not the LORD JESUS CHRIST let him be anathema." The anathema was directed against heresies, as they were the preaching of another Gospel. The form occurs in the declaration appended to the Nicene Creed. (Vide NICENE CREED.) "But those who say, 'Once He was not,' and, 'Before He was begotten He was not,' and, 'He came into existence out of nothing,' or who say that 'The SON OF GOD is of another substance, or essence, or is created or mutable or changeable,' the Catholic and Apostolic Church anathematizes." The consent or the refusal to subscribe to this formed the test. The anathema was afterwards used in several enactments by succeeding Councils, but the most notable were the twelve anathemas launched by Cyril of Alexandria against Nestorius at the Council of Ephesus, 430 A.D., and the Canon then passed, and re-enacted at Chalcedon, 451 A.D., threatening the anathema against the layman who should issue a Creed in place of the Nicene, also the anathema against all past heresies enacted by the fifth General Council of Constantinople (553 A.D.).

But later it became fearfully abused. Of course its binding power is only as the anathema defends a truth of Holy Writ, or cuts off an offender against it. But the terror it inspired was so great that many times it was utterly perverted. It was launched against the offender with solemn tolling of bells. Its terms were recited by the Bishop sitting before the altar in full vestments, with twelve priests in attendance holding each a lighted candle, which, as the last terrible words of the curse were uttered, were dashed upon the pavement. Hence the phrase "Cursed with Bell, Book, and Candle." Its misuse, while it wrought great and often irreparable mischief, overreached itself, and it was often set at naught at later times.

But the English Church has been singularly cautious in pronouncing any anathema. It occurs once in the Article (XIII.) upon obtaining eternal salvation only by the name of CHRIST, following closely in temper the example of St. Paul.

Anchoret. A person who lives apart; a hermit. (Vide HERMIT.)

Ancyra. In the year 314 A.D. a Council was held at Ancyra by some eighteen Bishops, among whom were Vitalis of Antioch, Marcellus of Ancyra, Lupus of Tarsus, and Amphion of Epiphania. Their consultations were embodied in 24 Canons, chiefly relating to the treatment of such as had fallen in times of persecution. Canon 10 allows those to marry who, on receiving Deacons' orders, declare their purpose to do so; but forbids marriage, under pain of deposition, to those who are ordained professing continence; Canon 13 forbids Chorepiscopi to ordain without permission in writing, from the Bishop.

Another Council was held at Ancyra in 358 A.D. by Basil of Ancyra and George of Laodicea, with a party of Semi-Arian Bishops. This Council condemned the doctrine of the pure Arians, and put forth an exposition of their faith, in which they affirmed that the Son was of like substance with the Father; meaning it to be inferred that He was not of the same substance; they condemned the term consubstantial, and, on the other hand, they also condemned the Arian formula of faith called the Second Creed of Sirmium.

Andrew, St., surnamed Protoelectos, or first-called, was a native of Galilee. He was the son of Jona, and, together with his brother Simon, he followed the occupation of fishing. Bethsaida, a small town on the Sea of Galilee, was their birthplace. Little mention is made of St. Andrew individually in the Gospels, yet a good judgment of his character may be formed from that little. He was probably older than his brother Simon, since he first attended the preaching of John the Baptist. When he heard the declaration of John, "Behold the Lamb of God" as he saw Jesus approaching, Andrew (after his interview with CHRIST, in company with St. John) went first to his brother, to whom he told of his finding the MESSIAH, and whom as a brotherly duty he brought to JESUS. He was of a devotional turn of mind, seeking earnestly for the truth himself, and desiring to bring others to the knowledge of it. After this first interview with his future LORD it is conjectured that more than a year passed before the formal call to the two brothers took place, which was after the miraculous draught of fishes on the Sea of Galilee, when, with their partners, James and John, "they forsook all and followed Him" (St. Luke v. 11).

There are but two other circumstances in St. Andrew's life mentioned in the Gospels, the first in St. John's Gospel, ch. xii. 21, where he brings the inquiring Greeks to JESUS, and the other in St. Mark, ch. xiii. 9, when Peter, James, John, and Andrew inquire privately of their LORD concerning the destruction of Jerusalem.

Ecclesiastical history, however, gives an account of the labors of St. Andrew. He went, after the dispersion of the Apostles, to Scythia, Cappadocia, and Bithynia, converting many to the faith and establishing Churches. From thence he went to Sarmatia, a portion of Russia that borders on the Black Sea, and for this he is called the Founder of the Russian Church, and is honored as their titular saint. Sinope and Sebastopol are both connected with the name of St. Andrew. Having suffered many persecutions he returned to Jerusalem. On his way he tarried at Byzantium, where he instructed the inhabitants in the religion of CHRIST and founded a Church, over which he consecrated "the beloved Stachys" as first Bishop.

He traveled after this into Thrace, Macedonia, and Achaia, where for many years he preached the faith, and at last gave his great testimony to its truth by laying down his life in its defense.

The account of his martyrdom is very affecting. At an advanced age he was called before the proconsul, at Patras, a city of Achaia, on the Gulf of Lepanto, and required to cease from preaching the Christian doctrine. Instead of complying he proclaimed CHRIST even before the judgment-seat of Ægeus, the proconsul, who was so enraged that he commanded the aged Apostle to be imprisoned and scourged seven times on his naked back, and then to be fastened to a cross with cords, that his sufferings might be prolonged. This cross differed from the upright cross, and was called the cross decussate, from the Roman numeral X.

When the suffering Apostle came near to this instrument of torture, he fell on his knees and addressed to it this famous invocation, "Hail, precious cross! thou hast been consecrated by the Body of my LORD and adorned with His limbs as with rich jewels. I come to thee exulting and glad; receive me into thine arms. Oh, good cross, I have ardently loved thee; long have I desired thee and sought thee; now thou art found by me and art made ready for my longing soul; receive me into thine arms, taking me from among men, and present me to my MASTER, that He who redeemed me on thee may receive me by thee." For two days the dying martyr preached to the people from the cross, at the end of which time the people importuned the proconsul that he might be taken down; but the blessed Apostle prayed earnestly to the LORD that he might at this time seal the truth with his blood, when he instantly expired, November 30, in the year 70 A.D.

The feast of St. Andrew, on which the beginning of Advent depends, is considered the beginning of the Christian year, and is of very ancient date, being one of those for which an Epistle and Gospel are provided in the Lectionary of St. Jerome, and which has also prayers provided for it in the Sacramentary of St. Gregory. The relics of St. Andrew, which had been preserved in Constantinople for thirteen centuries, on the taking of that city by the Turks were dispersed throughout Christendom. He is called the patron saint of Scotland and Russia, and three orders of knighthood bear his emblem (the Cruz decussata), the Scotch order of the Thistle, the Burgundian order of the Golden Fleece, and the Russian order of the Cross of St. Andrew, and for nearly three centuries this cross has been borne on the national banner of Great Britain.

Angels. "Which are spirits, immaterial and intellectual, the glorious inhabitants of those sacred palaces where nothing but light and blessed immortality, no shadow of matter for tears, discontentments, griefs, and uncomfortable passions to work upon, but all joy, tranquillity, and peace, even for ever and ever, doth dwell. As in number they are huge, mighty, and royal armies, so likewise in perfection of obedience unto that law which the Highest, whom they adore, love, and imitate, hath imposed upon them, such observants they are thereof, that our SAVIOUR Himself, being to set down the perfect idea of that which we are to pray and wish for on earth, did not teach to pray or wish for more, than only that here it might be with us, as with them it is in heaven. Beholding the face of God, they adore Him: being rapt with love of His beauty, they cleave unto Him: desiring to resemble Him, they long to do good unto all His creatures, and especially unto the children of men." (Hooker.)

"How oft do they their silver bowers leave
To come to succor us, that succor want!
How oft do they with golden pinions cleave
The flitting skies, like flying pursuivant,
Against foul fiends to aid us militant!
They for us fight, they watch and duly war,
And their bright squadrons round about us plant,
And all for love, and nothing for reward,—
O why should heavenly God to men have such regard?"
(Spencer.)

It certainly does not lessen the wonder, while perhaps it leads towards an answer to the question, if we believe that the appearances which are ascribed in the Old Testament to the Angel JEHOVAH ("the angel of the LORD") were Theophanies,—manifestations of God,—and that "the angel of the LORD" is the LORD of the angels, and not one of the angelic host. It is very evident that He who appears to Abraham in the plains of Mamre and in the land of Moriah, to Lot in Sodom, to Hagar in the Wilderness, to Jacob in Haran (Gen. xvi. 7; xviii. 1; xix. 1; xxii. 11; xxxi. 11, 13), to Moses in the bush, to Balaam, at Bochim to the people, to Gideon, to Manoah, to Elijah the Tishbite, is one who assumes the authority, exercises the power, and is called by the name of JEHOVAH and GOD (Num. xxii. 35; Judges ii. 1; vi. 11; xiii. 18; 2 Kings i. 3, 15). Other later cases there are where the angel is plainly the minister and messenger of JEHOVAH, as in the vision of David at the threshing floor, and at the destruction of the Assyrians, and in the vision of Zachariah (2 Sam. xxiv.

16; 2 Kings xix. 35; Zech. i. 12). But in the instances which have been cited, even where a distinction seems to be made, He whom JEHOVAH calls "Mine angel" is named by Isaiah "the angel of His presence" (Ex. xxiii. 20; xxxii. 34; Is. lxiii. 9), and by JEHOVAH Himself it is said "my presence shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest" (Ex. xxxiii. 14). And whether we understand with the earlier Fathers that "the angel of the Father is the LORD and God," or, with St. Augustine, that the Theophanies were "self-manifestations of God through a created being" (Liddon, Bamp. Lec.), the fact of those divine manifestations is the same. The Angel JEHOVAH is the LORD of the angels.

And they are His creatures and servants. We need not pause to consider the reasonableness of a belief, which all races and generations of men share, in the existence of orders of beings higher than man and between man and God, nearer to God than man is, holier and wiser, and, on the other hand, having relations of duty towards men,—the fact that all men do share it proves its reasonableness. What we have to consider, as servants of the same LORD, who has set them before us as our examples of obedience to His will, is, what He has revealed to us in His Word concerning them. And the instruction which He has given us is by no means so meagre as is sometimes supposed.

In the Old Testament, aside from those instances which have been cited, and which were with few exceptions evident manifestations of the Divine presence, the instances in which the angels are named are not many, but they are pregnant with meaning. Abraham saw three (Gen. xviii. 2, 3), of whom One was pre-eminent; Lot, two (ch. xix. 1). But He whom Joshua saw is Captain of the LORD's host (Josh. v. 4). The Psalmist names "the chariots of God, thousands of angels" (Ps. lxxviii. 17), "whom He maketh spirits" (Ps. civ.), "whom He giveth charge concerning" His people, who "excel in strength" (Ps. xci. 11; ciii. 20). Jacob saw them ascending and descending on the ladder from earth to heaven (Gen. xxviii. 12). Isaiah "saw the LORD high and lifted up, and His train filled the temple, and above it stood the seraphim, crying one to another, 'Holy, Holy, Holy'" (Is. vi. 1). Ezekiel saw "the cherubims of God," "the living creatures," "in the visions of God by the river of Chebar" (Ezek. x. 20). In Daniel's vision the angel Gabriel—"man of God"—is his teacher, and angels are the princes of the kingdoms, of whom Michael is one of the chief,—Michael, "who like God?" (Dan. ix. 16; x. 13).

In 2 Esdras the angel, who is sent to instruct the prophet, is named Uriel, "the flame of God" (Esd. iv. 1), one of "the innumerable multitude of angels gathered together" (ch. vi. 3), whose hosts stand trembling before the LORD (2 Esd. viii. 21). The angel's name in Tobit is Raphael, "one of the seven holy angels which present the prayers of the saints, and which go in and out before the Holy One" (ch. xii. 15), one not to be feared, but who served men "not of any favor of mine, but by the will of our God," as the angel who talked with St. John forbade his worship, "for I am thy fellow-servant" (Rev. xxii. 9).

But it is in the Christian Scriptures in the light of the "manifestation of God in the flesh" that we have the fullest evidence and doctrine of the angels of God. We can believe, we can almost understand, that His coming from heaven must have opened the way and brought the atmosphere and the angelic attendance of heaven with Him to the earth. An angel announced the birth of His forerunner (St. Luke i. 1, 27; ii. 10). The angel Gabriel saluted His virgin mother with the promise of His conception and birth. A multitude of the heavenly host attended the angel that announced His birth to the shepherds. An angel warned and guided Joseph (Matt. i. 20, 24). Angels delivered Him from the hand of Herod. Angels ministered to Him in His temptation (Matt. iv. 11). An angel comforted Him in Gethsemane (St. Luke xxii. 43). Legions of angels were at His bidding when He was betrayed (St. Matt. xxii. 53). Angels announced His resurrection (St. John xx. 14). Angels accompanied His ascension (Acts i. 10). Far above all angels He sitteth now. Before Him angels bow and veil their faces as they worship (Heb. i. 7). The voice of the archangel shall herald His coming to judgment (St. Luke iv. 16). With all holy angels He shall come (St. Matt. xxv. 31). Angels shall summon quick and dead before His throne (St. Luke xii. 8). Before angels He shall confess them that have confessed Him, and deny them that have denied Him. Angels shall be His ministers of reward and punishment (St. Matt. xiii. 39).

They differ from us and excel us, these glorious creatures of God, in many things, but most of all in holiness and obedience. They are wonderful in knowledge, in appearance glorious, great in power, in dignity exalted, in number "an innumerable company," "thousand thousands and ten thousand times ten thousand." These are they whom we understand by "the elect angels" (1 Tim. v. 21), who have passed the ordeal before which others fall, have "kept their first estate" (Jude 6), and will keep it forever. And yet these glorious and immortal beings are but creatures, and finite creatures. They are so far beyond us that the "worshiping of angels" (Col. ii. 18) would be the natural impulse of humility and of reverence for the infinite God. But they themselves forbid such worship. "Stand up," said St. Peter; "I also am a man" (Acts x. 26). And in the same spirit the angel forbade St. John, "I am thy fellow-servant, worship God" (Rev. xxii. 8). But, "let all the angels of God worship Him," for "by Him, the SON, were all things created, that are in Heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by Him and for Him, and by Him all things consist" (Col. i. 16). Finite, therefore, in power, for they were created; finite in magnitude, for space contains them; finite in knowledge, "desiring to look into" (1 Pet. i. 12) the mysteries of CHRIST, so that the Apostles of the LORD are "a spectacle to them" (1 Cor. iv. 9), and "even to the principalities and powers in heavenly places is made known by the Church the manifold wisdom of God" (Eph. iii. 11), and of the future ignorant. As compared with us wise; but "He chargeth His angels with folly" (Job iv. 18). As compared with us Holy, but a great host of them has fallen. The great leader of that fallen host, so great that he could make "war in Heaven" (Rev. xii. 7-9), and on earth so divide the kingdom of God that in the very presence of the SON of GOD he could offer Him all the kingdoms of the earth and the glories of them, is a fallen angel (St. Matt. iv. 9; 2 Cor. iv. 4).

Of that glorious host of the elect Heaven is the home. Of them alone, there they alone—the judgment is not yet, and all men wait for it—worship and adore and do the will of their GOD. There they worship and adore Him that sitteth upon the throne and the Lamb. "When He bringeth the first-begotten into the world He saith, Let all the angels of GOD worship Him" (Heb. i. 6). And angels worship Him who sitteth upon the throne in human form, who "took not on Him the nature of angels, but He took on Him the seed of Abraham" (Heb. ii. 16), "the MAN CHRIST JESUS" (1 Tim. iii. 5), "the SON of whom He saith Thy Throne, O GOD, is for ever and ever" (Heb. i. 8).

But their work is not all done in Heaven. "Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister to them that shall be heirs of salvation?" (Heb. i. 14) The existence of them that do the will of GOD in Heaven is no life of idleness. They are the fellow-servants of Him who is the LORD and the SAVIOUR of men. They are the agents of GOD and the means of intercourse between earth and Heaven. It is no novel interpretation to read, "He maketh His angels to be winds, and His ministers a flame of fire." The fires on Mount Sinai were the work of angels. An angel troubled the waters of Bethesda. In the Apocalypse we read of angels restraining the four winds. Works of vengeance, the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah by the fiery lava of volcanoes, the destruction of Sennacherib's hosts by means, it is supposed, of a suffocating wind, the pestilence in Israel when David numbered the people, the smiting of the earth in the Apocalypse, are ascribed to angels. Nature is not inanimate. Its toils are duties. "For all things serve Thee." "And every breath of air, and every ray of heat and light, every beautiful prospect, is, as it were, the skirts of their garments, the waving of the robes of those gracious and holy beings, whose faces see GOD in Heaven. And I put it to any one whether it is not as philosophical, and as full of intellectual enjoyment, to refer the movements of the natural world to them as to attempt to explain them by certain theories of science, useful as these are, and capable of a religious application." (Newman.)

They guarded, led, and fed His Church in the wilderness (Ps. lxxviii. 25). They watch over nations. They watch over men. "The angel of the LORD campeth round about" (Ps. xxxiv. 7); "and lo! the whole mountain round about was full of horses and chariots of fire round about the prophet" (2 Kings vi. 17). They are the instruments of mercies and punishments (2 Sam. xxiv. 16). They bear the prayers of men up to GOD (Rev. viii. 3). They watch over little children (ch. xxvi.). "Of such is the kingdom of Heaven," and "their angels do always behold the face of my FATHER which is in Heaven" (St. Matt. xviii. 10). They are present in the assemblies of Christians; the reason for their decency and order is "because of the angels" (Eccl. v. 6; 1 Cor. xi. 10). They are GOD's messengers to men (Acts viii. 26; x. 4), and under the guise of strangers and needy "some have entertained angels unawares" (Heb. xiii. 2). They watch over the living, and there is joy in the presence of the angels of GOD over one sinner that repenteth." And when Lazarus, the beggar, dies, they "carry his soul to Abraham's bosom" (St. Luke vii. 39; xv. 10).

Their work is of a kind that to our pride and envy (the devil's own sins) seem irksome and unworthy (1 Tim. iii. 6; Wis. ii. 24). But "the angelic life is passed between Heaven and earth" (Leighton), and in their eyes it is "Glory to GOD on high" where there is "peace on earth, good-will towards men," and nothing which is worthy of the care and love of GOD is beneath their attention. What we learn about them shows us that there is close connection between these two portions of the one kingdom,—the visible and the invisible. It is not without meaning that the Apostolic Liturgies repeat the very forms of words and of worship which the shepherds heard, and which were revealed to Isaiah and St. John (St. Luke ii. 14; Is. vi. 3; Rev. iv. 4-11). So Moses was bidden to "make all things according to the pattern showed to thee in the mount" (Heb. viii. 5). May it not be for a like reason that as the name of Malachi signifies "my Angel," and his prophecy of John the Baptist is "Behold, I send my angel before Thy face" (Mal. iii. 1), so in the letters to the Churches of Asia the LORD chooses to name the Chief Pastors not Apostles or Bishops, but by the very name of those ministering spirits which were about His throne? The men on earth officers in the Church visible, and the Spirits in Heaven officers of the Church invisible, are knit together in the same Communion of Saints, set to do the same will of God, and called by the same name of "Angels" (Rev. i. 20).

What St. John saw in Heaven it is for the Church to reflect on earth, and so to do the will of our Father. In their worship, its order, harmony, beauty, constancy, they show us who, and who alone, is the object of our worship,—not spirits of the dead and "souls yet under the altar" (Rev. vi. 9), not even their glorious selves, but "the LORD GOD ALMIGHTY, which was, and is, and is to come" (Rev. iv. 8), and how He is to be worshiped. And in their ministrations, making His will theirs, caring for what He cares for, seeking His glory because they are Holy and His, they show us what is to be the spirit and the manner of our work. The LORD tells us who they shall be that in the resurrection shall inherit the kingdom and be "as the angels" (St. Luke xx. 36), those who have like them ministered to "these his brethren" (St. Matt. xxv. 40). They have confessed Him here, and He shall confess them before the angels. They have followed and worshiped Him here, and there as here, "with angels and archangels and all the company of Heaven, they shall laud and magnify His glorious name, evermore praising Him and saying, Holy, Holy, Holy, LORD GOD of Hosts. Heaven and earth are full of Thy Glory. Glory be to Thee, O LORD, Most High."

Anglican. The Angles were one of the tribes of Teutonic sea-robbers that descended upon the coasts of England, drove the ancient Britons back to the mountains of Cornwall and Wales, and established themselves as permanent residents on the soil. For some occult reason, perhaps for its euphony, their name has been perpetuated in English and England.

The term Anglican is now commonly applied to the National Church of England, as the term Gallican is to the National Church of France,—the ancient Gaul,—Coptic to the Church of the Copts, or Russian to the Oriental Church in Russia.

These are national terms. They evince the important fact that while the Catholic Church is one over all Christendom and remains one and the same into whatever land her missionaries penetrate, still she conforms herself to national peculiarities. The customs, the tastes and habits, with the mode of thought and action, which distinguish the nations from each other, enter even into the national forms of religion. While the Anglican is, as she claims to be, the One, Holy, Catholic Church in England, she has her own English modes of Liturgical worship, and her special terms and ways of theological teaching. The Anglican Church was originated among the Britons in Apostolic times and was revived among the Anglo-Saxons, 598 A.D., by Augustine and his companion monks, who was induced by Gregory the Great, a Bishop of Rome, to enter upon a mission at Canterbury. The Roman Bishop pursued the same policy towards England that was so successful towards the other nations of Western Europe. His claim of supremacy was rejected at first by the British Christians, and was never tamely submitted to by the English Church or people. Even Hildebrand (Gregory VII.), while grinding under his heel the crown of the Holy Roman Empire in the person of Henry IV. of Germany, was careful not to turn the screws of his usurpations too tightly upon William of Normandy, conqueror of England. John was the first of the kings of England to acknowledge the temporal and spiritual lordship of the Pope, but even then the barons, who were the representative English people, wrung from him the Magna Charta, in which the phrase "our Church of England" shows that the nation itself rejected the uncatholic claims of the Roman Pontiff. At last, after many vicissitudes, the English Convocation, 1537 A.D., finally resisted successfully the Roman usurpations, and the National Church of England became, as she still remains, free from foreign control. She became only the more distinctly Catholic by rejecting the uncatholic assumptions of the Pope. The Gallican Church was at least equally restive under the Papal grip, but she now, like other National Churches of Western Europe, has been forced to succumb. The Anglican Church, however, maintains successfully her national autonomy. While recognizing the authority of the whole Church Catholic, and remaining ready to obey it should it ever be clearly and legitimately exercised, she supports the right of National Churches to conduct their peculiarly national affairs without foreign intervention.

What the Anglican Church claims for herself she allows to others. Both the Scottish and Irish Churches have their own Liturgies, canons of discipline, and general self-rule, while they keep up reciprocal communion with England. The English colonies being essentially parts of England, their Churches are branching outgrowths that still retain not only organic union with the "Church of England," but canonical conjunction with her.

The Church in America, though descending through both the English and Scottish lines of the Apostolic Episcopacy, is properly not Anglican. Here, as in England, in France, and in other countries, the Catholic Church is one in organic union with the universal Body of CHRIST, holding to the one succession under the one LORD, with the one faith and the one baptism, but she is already, and is more and more manifesting herself to be a distinctively national Church. She feels the current of progress, and while doing all she can to purify it and keep in the ways of truth and holiness, she does not madly and foolishly throw herself athwart it. Her mission is primarily and chiefly to the American people, and she is fast developing an American type of Catholic doctrine and practice.

The Anglican Church has no authority in the Church in the United States. She has rightfully great influence through the writings of her scholars living and dead, as well as through her noble example; but the daughter has a domain and household of her own which she holds directly under the one LORD, and by the grace of His presence she is bearing her witness to His name, winning souls to His glory, constructing forms of worship adapted to her time and sphere, and learning fast so to teach the one Faith that it shall take up into itself, after American methods, the best thought and purest life of the American people.

Annates. The revenues or profits of one year, and so far synonymous with first fruits. They were the revenues of the Bishopric for the first year after the consecration of the Bishop to his See. They were a tribute paid to the Papacy. They arose from the disposal made of the accruing rents, tithes, and payments due, though the Bishopric were vacant. Who was to enjoy them? The temptation to the Bishop over vacant benefices, and to the Metropolitan in the case of the vacant See, was to keep the See vacant and to appropriate the revenues, or else to require from the Bishop-elect the payment of the first year's incomes. This right, or rather, usurpation, passed on to the Pope. The beginning of the practice is said to have begun with Pope Gregory (600 A.D.), but it did not finally take the burdensome shape it attained till about 1253 A.D., when Innocent III., by granting to Henry III. the Episcopal revenues for three years, obtained the royal aid in fixing the claim upon the clergy for the Papacy. It formed part of the complaints made for centuries before the Reformation. It is estimated that in the forty-five years between 1486 and 1531 the equivalent of $225,000 a year was paid to the Popes by English Bishops in the form of annates alone. In 1531 the Convocation of Canterbury applied to the crown for relief, and a conditional act was passed, by which a compromise was offered to the Pope. As no notice was taken of it, the act was confirmed by letters patent two years later. Annates in a less burdensome shape have ever since been paid to the crown by every Bishop and every priest holding a benefice above a certain amount of annual value. But this revenue was applied to the benefit of the clergy by Queen Anne's Bounty Act, and is now chiefly used for building parsonages.

Annotine Easter. The meaning of the word is doubtful, but the most probable explanation is that it was the anniversary Sunday of those who had been baptized the previous years, as this was usually administered at Easter-tide; yet, if observed on the actual Sunday the year following, it might fall very much later, or before the Easter of that year. This will explain why it could fall on such varying dates. It does not appear to have been kept up, as it was obsolete (antiquus) in 1100 A.D., when Micrologus mentioned it in his treatise.

Annunciation. The Feast of the Annunciation of the Angel Gabriel to the Virgin Mary. The feast commemorating this event is said to date earlier than 492 A.D., for in the Sacramentary of Gelasius there is an Epistle, Gospel, and Collect, but the actual day observed varied. However, the Sacramentary has had interpolations, and no undoubted proof for the observance of the feast can be traced higher than the Spanish Council of Toledo (656 A.D.), which ordered that, as the feast day would fall in Lent, it should be observed in December, in accordance with the Laodicean Canon (51st), ordering that no festivals of Martyrs, i.e., Holy Days, should be observed in Lent. But the Trullan Council (692 A.D.) ordered that this feast should be excepted from the prohibition and restored to its right place,—the 25th of March. The purpose of the festival is to commemorate the announcement made by the Angel Gabriel to the Virgin, that she should conceive and bring forth the promised MESSIAH, and the conception of our LORD, which followed that announcement.

Antelucan. (Before dawn.) In the primitive Church in time of persecution the Christians were wont to meet before dawn to escape detection. The custom was continued after persecution had ceased, but it was broken up later, as it led to some irreverence and disorder. In dangerous times, of course, the Holy Communion was then most safely and readily celebrated; but in times of quiet this was not necessary, and the custom was no longer imperative. Also there were irregularities connected with the celebrations at that hour, so that it was ordered that the Holy Communion should not be celebrated at night.

Antependium. A frontal vesting the front of the altar. The color of the antependium should vary with the season and the special day. The Holy Table in the Greek Church is always vested with special care, with altar-cloths which were consecrated at the time the altar or the church was consecrated.

Anthem. Vide MUSIC.

Anthropomorphism. (The likeness or form of man.) The gross error of some heretics,—Audeans,—who held that God had a human form. It was and is probably a natural hasty error which some may find it difficult to put away. At any rate, it has been supposed that many held it whose language, following the accommodations of Holy Scripture, has seemed to justify the charge. One of the earliest, Tertullian (180–202 A.D.), taught that God had a body, but being self-existent, was bound by very different and to us incomprehensible, laws of existence. The language, His Eye, His Hand, His creating man in His own Image, is only suited to our powers of comprehension, for we are distinctly and authoritatively taught (Is. xl. 18; Acts xvii. 20, et al.) that He is everywhere present, a SPIRIT whom no man hath seen nor can see, who cannot be delineated by man's art or device, or, as the Article hath it (Art. I.), "There is but one living and true God, everlasting, without body, parts, or passions, of infinite power, wisdom, and goodness." As we can only use Scripture language upon such lofty and insoluble subjects, it is well to use great care and devout thought in forming such conceptions. Anthropomorphism does not necessarily exclude a person from the Church Communion, though, as St. Augustine says of those who were misled in the Church in Day, they are carnal and childish.

Antichrist. A word compounded from the Greek anti and Christos, and meaning "opposed to," or, "instead of CHRIST." There is probably no theological subject involved in greater obscurity, and from the earliest times the explanatory theories have been almost innumerable. The idea of Antichrist may be traced back almost as far as the Messianic idea, and is undoubtedly the Christian analogue of that dualism which characterizes all Oriental religious systems, and which is most familiar in the Persian Ormuzd and Ahriman, the personal opposing powers of Good and Evil. The simplest solution of these striking analogies is that the great truths of Christianity were foreshadowed in the primeval or patriarchal revelation and retained in purity only in the Old Testament prophecies, but lived on in one or other corrupted form in all the cognate heathen systems. The term Antichrist is found in the New Testament only in the 1st and 2d Epistles of St. John, although the idea is very clearly taught in St. Matthew xxiv. and St. Mark xiii. St. Paul, also, in 2 Thess. ii., speaks of "The man of sin," by whom it is generally believed he means Antichrist. Certainly St. John states positively that the coming of Antichrist was a doctrine well known to those to whom he wrote. The greatest diversity of opinion has prevailed as to whether is meant by Antichrist a person, or a system, or a corrupted Church, or a persecuting anti-Christian power; as to whether Antichrist has already come, or is yet to be expected, or is typical of a constant opposition of the world-power to that of CHRIST. In the Roman Church Antichrist is generally believed to mean heathen imperial Rome, though many interpret the prophecies in Revelation as pointing to a personal opponent of Christianity who is to appear immediately prior to the second coming of CHRIST. In the Greek Church Gregory VII. was called Antichrist by some, as Boniface III. had already been by Phocas; but the prevailing belief has pointed to Mohammed, as might naturally be expected. Among Protestants the almost universally accepted solution has been found either in the Pope or in the Church of Rome; while individual rulers, from Caligula to Napoleon III., have been claimed as meeting the most minute requirements of prophecy. It would be as unprofitable as impossible to allude, even, to all these beliefs and fancies. The sad divisions of Christianity have caused almost every Christian system to be regarded as Antichrist by some opposing system. The confusion has largely resulted from the many unsuccessful attempts to solve the mysterious prophecies of Daniel and the Revelation, especially those which concern "the number of the beast," and the "time, and times, and dividing of time," which are supposed to point to the name of the individual Antichrist and the duration of the anti-Christian power. This immense diversity of belief, together with the mystery in which the whole subject is involved, would seem to suggest that the matter, outside of the general principles taught by our LORD Himself, is of far less practical importance than has been assigned to it. The one essential point is that Christianity is in constant conflict with "the prince of this world," "the evil one" from whom the LORD has taught us to pray for daily deliverance, and that Antichrist is to be found in every concrete development or incarnation of his power. A close examination of St. Paul's language in 2 Thessalonians will show conclusively that the Roman emperors, of whom Nero was the type, fulfilled every particular of his description of the "Man of sin." They were in all respects personal Antichrists. They were "Christoi," "anointed" sovereigns; they were worshiped as God and declared themselves to be incarnations of the Supreme God, assuming the title "Dives;" they claimed "lying wonders" in support of their assumed divinity; they were monsters of iniquity such as the world has never seen before or since, and they were the relentless persecutors of all who confessed CHRIST, demanding the abjuration of His faith and the substitution for it of their own worship as the price of life from every apprehended Christian; and, finally, the great Arian apostasy immediately preceded the final destruction of Roman heathen imperialism by "the breath," or "spirit"—"pneuma"—of the LORD's mouth, for the death of the half-converted Constantine ended forever the great centralization of the world-power which had been the uncompromising opponent of the kingdom of CHRIST, and thenceforth Christianity became the dominant power in the world. This view is greatly strengthened by St. Paul's reference to our LORD as having predicted the events which, for obvious reasons of safety to the Church as well as to Himself, He could mention only in figurative and obscure language. It was, doubtless, to this language of St. Paul, and other and more secret teachings to the same effect, that St. John alludes in his First Epistle, and his declaration that there were then "already many Antichrists" is most significant, as apparently designed to draw attention from the prevailing expectation of a personal Antichrist, and the immediate occurrence of the Second Advent, and fix it upon the doctrinal defection which had even then arisen, and which embodied the most important features of the prophecy. In regard to the bearing of the Revelation upon the subject, that book is yet too much an unsolved mystery to permit any definite conclusion to be drawn. How much of it is prophecy and how much the mystical description of events already past or then passing we cannot yet decide. Nor is the theory above advanced in any way inconsistent with the doctrine of a personal Antichrist, immediately to precede the final coming of the LORD in glory. Almost all prophecy is manifold in its fulfillment, having general and special significations, the teaching of some general truth being always the more important, and the prediction of events in most cases secondary. This is undoubtedly true of the prophecies of Antichrist. What we need to know and remember may be summed up in a very few words. No orthodox development of Christianity can possibly be meant as being a power hostile to CHRIST. But the world-power is always opposing the Christ-power and striving to set itself in its place, and the world-power is always assuming some concrete form to make its opposition tangible and effective. As faithful Christians we must be constant in maintaining the LORD's side in this ceaseless conflict, and in enduring the trials which that faithfulness involves, and doing so we need not to disturb our minds with looking for a personal Antichrist, but rather direct them in watchful hope to the coming of the LORD Himself in the full assurance that every opposing power will be destroyed before Him and every faithful watcher be rewarded.

Antidoron. The remaining unconsecrated bread which had been blessed in the service of the preparation of the Elements. Prothesis. Its name signifies "instead of the gift" (i.e., the consecrated bread), given to non-communicants instead of the consecrated bread. There is, doubtless, a historic bond, though not very distinct, connecting the old love-feasts (1 Cor. xi. 20, 39), this Antidoron, the Eulogiæ of the Western Church, the "pain beni" of the Gallican, and the blessed bread of the older English Church, together.

Antinomianism. (Opposed to Law; in Church History, those opposed to the moral Law of God.) The earliest Antinomians were the Gnostics, whose wild speculations and gross imaginations led them into such a conclusion. Their profligate lives and absurd doctrines and high pretensions to Wisdom and inner Knowledge naturally led to the denial of any moral obligations at all. But in this they sought for some support from the strong and decided language of St. Paul upon Faith, and so misled those willing to be misled by their want of self-control. There is always an Antinomian principle in mere human nature, and this reappears in some form or other along the line of Church history, some leader in each age not being entirely free from some form of the error. But it reappeared with violence at the Reformation. In that age and in the whirl of that terrible breaking up it is not at all surprising that some were tempted to use more violent language than the truth would bear (as did Luther), and that others would fall into this heresy. John Agricola, at Wittenberg (1538 A.D.), became the leader of the sect. His tenets were repudiated by Luther and Melancthon, and it is said that he himself recanted his error afterwards. It sprang up again under Cromwell in England, among the innumerable sectaries which swarmed in that country during the Great Rebellion (1640-56 A.D.). In every age, however, some sectaries have held it, though in a repressed way. The Holy Scriptures present, as is their wont, both sides, both Faith and Works, most strongly, and the Church's duty is to do the same. Logical consequences in such cases are to be measured by practical consequences. The true line is to fill out works with the Life of Faith and to clothe faith with the body of works. "Show me thy Faith without thy Works, and I will show thee my Faith by my Works" (cf. iii. 13; Jas. ii. 18).

Antioch. There were two Antiochs, the best known in Syria, where the disciples were first called Christians, where St. Peter labored so much, where St. Ignatius afterwards ruled; the other a large town in Pisidia, where St. Paul preached and suffered for the Gospel's sake. But the first Antioch deserves a longer notice, from the important events which took place there, and from the influence its School exercised at one time.

It was founded by Seleucus Nicator (300 B.C.), and a part of its population was Jewish. It grew apace, as its position was excellent both in a political and in a commercial sense. It was adorned by the Seleucid kings, the Romans favored it, and Herod the Great contributed to its adornment. Its population, like that of Alexandria, was witty, gay, and licentious, easily roused, and often (as in the famous case of the Statues) proceeding to excesses. Its fondness for giving nicknames possibly is noted in the fact that the disciples received there their future designation as Christians. Ignatius, upon the death of Evodius in a riot, became the Bishop of the Jewish, as he already was of the Gentile, congregations, and, having safely brought his flock through the persecution under Domitian (95-96 A.D.), bravely set the example of a good confession before Trajan. His letters are a precious result of his devotion, and the journey to Rome was unintentionally a better way of proclaiming the Gospel than if he had remained inhumed at home. Antioch became famous for its Catechetical School, under Lucian, who was martyred (311 A.D.). He was a clear, cool man, with a great deal of insight and originality. But he was hardly orthodox in his teaching. His pupils were nearly all afterwards Arians, under the lead of Arius, who was himself trained in this Antiochean school. Lucian's teaching seems to have been of a disputatious turn. He combated the Syrian mysticism and gnosticism, and in the effort brought out the plan of proposing problems on the Faith for debate. The sophistical style of argument was in vogue, and to his training in dialectics in such a school Arius owed much of his first successes. In this the school of Lucian did much more harm to Christian Truth than all the fancies of Origen. Lucian redeemed his own good name afterwards by a good confession at his martyrdom (311 A.D.), but he sowed seeds that bore poisoned fruit in the next twenty years. The history of Arianism belongs to another article, but here in Antioch were held some of its strongest Councils. Lucian's school soon died out, but his influence in urging more practical and grammatical criticism of the Bible long continued. From him really came the tone which influenced Diodorus of Tarsus in his exegesis, and through him Theodore.

A Council was held at Antioch in the year 340 or 341 A.D. Some historians affirm that there were two Councils, one in each year, but whether or not that was so, it will suffice to consider the things done as the acts of one Council. The Emperor Constantine had laid the foundations of a magnificent church at Antioch, which was finished about this time by his son Constantius; and Eusebius of Nicomedia gathered together a large number of Bishops (as many as 97, of whom 40 were Eusebians) to dedicate it; these organized themselves into a Council, which is often called the Council of the Dedication, and is the second Council of Antioch, if, as some think, another was held in 340 A.D. The Bishops assembled were from the East alone, no one from the Western Empire being present, nor any representative of the Pope; and Eusebian opinions seem to have prevailed, either through the retirement of the orthodox Bishops, or through the influence of Constantius, who was present in person. The charges against St. Athanasius, formerly preferred at the Synod of Tyre (of murder, sacrilege, and impurity), were renewed, in spite of having been plainly confuted; and he was condemned without a hearing. The Council then proceeded to elect and consecrate a Bishop of Alexandria in his place,—one Gregory of Cappadocia, a coarse and violent man, who presently took possession of his See by military force with many outrages and cruelties. They then drew up three or four creeds, which under ordinary circumstances would have been unobjectionable, but were suspicious from the careful omission of the term ὁμοούσιος (co-essential, consubstantial), which had become the test of orthodoxy. The second of these creeds is sometimes styled the Formulary of Antioch, or the Creed of the Dedication, but is ascribed to an earlier date than the Council. Besides these Creeds twenty-five Canons were passed, which, though technically rejected as the work of heretics, have actually been received into the Code of Church Canons, being confirmed by the Council of Chalcedon. Those of most interest now are the following: The 1st Canon establishes the decree of Nice concerning Easter; the 5th prescribes a rule for dealing with those who assemble private independent congregations; the 7th enjoins the use of letters of peace, or dismissary letters; the 12th (which was directed against Athanasius) deprives of all hope of restoration any one who being deposed shall carry his complaint to the emperor instead of to a Synod of Bishops; the 15th forbids appeal from the unanimous decision of a provincial Synod; the 21st forbids translations; and the 22d forbids one Bishop interfering in the Church of another. Other Councils or Synods were held at Antioch, as follows: in 345 A.D., when the Confession of faith called the μακρόστιχος was drawn up; in 360 A.D., when Meletius was elected Patriarch of Antioch, who, warmly espousing the defense of the Catholic faith, so provoked the Arians that they procured his banishment as a Sabellian; in 363 A.D., when the Creed of Nice was received as the exposition of the true faith; in 380 A.D., of which no records are preserved, though the Council is said to have received, unanimously, the Epistle of Pope Damasus; in 391 A.D., when the errors of the Massalians were condemned; in 417 A.D., against Pelagius; in 433 A.D., against Nestorius; and in 435 A.D., when the memory of Theodorus of Mopsuestia was defended.

REV. R. A. BENTON.

Antiphon (English form, Anthem). Antiphonal chanting, i.e., responsive, as when two choirs respond to each other. Antiphonal reading, as in our reading the Psalter in the service, minister and congregation replying the one to the other. It was the Jewish mode. Indeed (Is. vi. 3, "this cried to this," Heb.), the Seraphim respond the one to the other. The arrangements of the choirs (1 Chron. vi. 31, sq., and xxv.) necessarily involved antiphonal singing. Many of the Psalms (e.g. xxiv., cxviii., cxxxiv.) must have been so used: Miriam's Song at the Red Sea was choral and antiphonal. The dedication of the rebuilt walls of Jerusalem was evidently with antiphonal singing, as was also thus celebrated the founding of the second Temple (Heb. xii. 36, sq.; Ezra iii. 10, 16).

Pliny's famous letter to Trajan about the Christian implies in the phrase "secum invicem," by terms among themselves, antiphonal singing. It is a very old tradition that Ignatius of Antioch introduced antiphonal singing into the Gentile Church because of a vision of antiphonal chanting in heaven. Most probably, as he united the Jewish and Gentile congregations under his jurisdiction, it may be a way of recording his argument from Isaiah to the Gentiles for such singing. East and West took it up, and it spread with great rapidity. The custom once taken up was not laid aside. But the term antiphon came later to have various meanings, springing out of the one central use of the Psalms: (a) The Psalms were so called from their use. (b) It came to mean later a section of a Psalm, or a compilation of several Psalms, or other selections from Scriptures. The use was in this case for one choir to sing each verse, and at its close the other choir responded with an unvarying versicle. Such arrangements are frequent in the old office-books. The Canticles used in English state services instead of the Venite are of this nature. (c) A further change took place in its meaning when it was the name for a single sentence from the Psalm, originally sung between the verses, but later only at the beginning and the close. (d) The last step was to make it mean the sentence taken by itself and sung alone. This antiphon might be from Scripture or from some other source. These antiphons are very common in the Greek services. The word anthem (antiphona, O. E. antefn, antem), found in Chaucer (Mod. E. anthem), means in English music such a verse most usually from Scripture, though often the composer made a single anthem out of two separate texts or passages from the Holy Writ. The antiphon forms a very notable part of the Liturgical services, especially in the Mozarabic and Eastern rites. (For the use of the Anthem in the service, see ANTHEM and MUSIC.)

Antiphonal. (Antiphonar.) The book which contains the invitatories, responsories, verses, collects, and whatever is sung in the choir, but not including the hymns peculiar to the Communion service, which are contained in the Graduale. It is a book that belongs to the Roman rite. The antiphonal was also used in the English service till the compilation of the Prayer-Book did away with its use.

Antipope. Rival Popes were called antipopes. They were pretenders to the Papal throne, elected by partisans upon some pretext or claim. But several of them were elected under such circumstances that, had they been successful in their claims, they would have been acknowledged as legitimately chosen. The number of rival claimants has been variously stated, and probably cannot be completely given. But it has been estimated at about forty. Many began an opposition which maintained itself too short a time to require notice. Others again surrendered their claims by compromise. From the date 251 A.D. there was but one century (the thirteenth) which was not marked by an antipope. For over a century, from 1046 A.D. to 1180 A.D., there was a continuous series of antipopes; and at the outset (1046 A.D.) there were as many as four in the field. The Council of Pisa (1409 A.D.) deposed both the legitimate and the anti pope and elected a third. This but introduced three rivals. The Council of Constance (1414-18 A.D.) deposed two, the third abdicated, and a fourth was elected, who remained possessor of the See; but before he died there were two rival claimants (1425-26 A.D.). This, together with other historical facts, make a very significant commentary upon the doctrine of Papal infallibility.

Antitype. This word can be used in two distinct and opposing senses: (a) as opposed to mere representations of a reality, as the substance is opposed to the shadow. CHRIST was the antitype; Moses, David, Solomon, were the types. It is also used (b) in a reverse sense, as twice in the New Testament (Heb. ix. 24): "For CHRIST is not entered unto the holy places made with hands, which are the figures (the antitypes) of the true; but unto heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of GOD for us," where the antitype means the shadow, while the type, as St. Chrysostom says, has the power of the reality. And again in 1 Pet. iii. 21, where the word antitype led to its use in the Liturgies: "The like figure whereunto (the antitype) baptism doth also now save us." The Fathers then used this word in the same way. Irenæus: "The HOLY SPIRIT is then invoked that the bread may be the body and the cup may be the blood of CHRIST, that they who receive these antitypes may obtain remission of sins and everlasting life." St. Basil uses this term antitype in reference to the human body. As at first glance the body would be called a simple substance, but subsequent reasoning would show that it was a complex thing, having color and shape, and antitype and magnitude, when, if the text be correct, it is difficult to translate it unless it be a reference to its prototype—God's Image. It can be compared, therefore, with the phrase in His Liturgy: "We offering the antitypes of the Holy Body and Blood of CHRIST, beseech Thee that Thy HOLY SPIRIT may descend upon us and upon these gifts."

Apocrypha. This Greek word means "hidden, secret." It seems to be used for "spurious" in the latter part of the second century. Perhaps the name indicates a secret knowledge made known only to the initiated. The names of distinguished men, as Solomon and Ezra, Daniel and Jeremiah, were falsely given as authors of the various books. The introducing of Apocryphal books into the Septuagint gave them a certain weight, though Jerome speaks strongly against an undue valuation of them. The Church of Rome, at the Council of Trent, included the doubtful books in its definition of Canonical Scripture, excepting the two books of Esdras and the Prayer of Manasseh. The German and English Reformers followed the opinion of Jerome. In Luther's German Bible the title "Apocrypha" had this addition: "i.e., Books which are not of like worth with Holy Scripture, yet are good and useful to be read." Wiclif used the term Apocrypha for the uncanonical books, and the judgment of St. Jerome is given in the VI. Article of the English Church. He admits them to be "read for example of life and instruction of manners," but not "to establish any doctrine." The Apocryphal books are interesting in their connection with the literature and history of the Jews. "They represent the period of transition and decay which followed on the return from Babylon, when the prophets, who were then the teachers of the people, had passed away and the age of scribes succeeded." "The alterations of the Jewish character, the different phases which Judaism presented in Palestine and Alexandria, the good and the evil which were called forth by contact with idolatry in Egypt, and by the struggle against it in Syria, all these present themselves to the reader of the Apocrypha with greater or less distinctness." These books lack the prophetic element, though there is some attempt to feign it. The Song of the Three Children is the only poetry in the Apocrypha. Where the writers are affected by Greek culture there is "the taste for rhetorical ornament which characterized the literature of Alexandria." In the Apocrypha works of fiction appear, which rest, or purport to rest, on "an historical foundation." The Jewish exiles had a reputation for music, and were asked to sing the "songs of Zion" (Ps. cxxxvii.). The trial of skill in wise sayings given in 1 Esdras iii. and iv. "implies a traditional belief" that the Persian kings honored those who possessed such gifts. The transition to story-telling was natural. The captivity, with its remoteness of scene and strange adventures, gave a wide field to the imagination. In Bel and the Dragon there is a love of the marvelous, and a scorn of the idolater. In Tobit and in Susanna there is a moral tendency. Jeremiah has a prominent place in the hopes of the Jews, and so in 2 Macc. xv. 13-16, he is represented as appearing to Judas Maccabeus and giving him "a sword as a gift from God." This may help to explain the rumor of the people in CHRIST'S day, that "Jeremias, or one of the prophets," had appeared on earth (Matt. xvi. 14). With regard to the false names given to Apocryphal writers, it is difficult at this day to know how much deception existed, if any was intended. Solomon's name may have been used to draw attention by personation. Later Jewish history shows this, however, to be a dangerous practice. There are inaccuracies in the history contained in the Apocrypha. This may be partly due to a want of "power to distinguish truth from falsehood." The influence against idolatry is strong, as in the story of the noble Maccabees, and in the books of Judith, Baruch, and Wisdom. The heroic death by martyrdom of the mother and her seven sons in 2 Macc. vii. is a wonderful narrative. A high idea of almsgiving appears in Tobit iv. 7-9, which form a part of the sentences used in the Offertory. In Tobit xii. 8, prayer, fasting, and alms are named as characteristics of a holy life. Our LORD explains their relation to true religion in St. Matt. vi. 1-18. The Wisdom of Solomon is a book of a very elevated tone of thought. Wisdom is beautifully styled "the brightness of the everlasting light, the unspotted mirror of the power of God, and the image of His goodness" (ch. vii. 26). "In all ages, entering into holy souls, she maketh them friends of God" (v. 27). This resembles Philo's teaching, and foreshadows St. John's description of CHRIST as the Word of God and "the true Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world" (John i. 1, 9). Eternal blessedness shines out in this book. How magnificently the following words sound in days of heathen darkness: "The souls of the righteous are in the hand of God" (Wisdom iii. 1), and, "In the sight of the unwise they seemed to die" (v. 2); "But they are in peace" (v. 3). See the final triumph of the righteous in ch. vi., with its figures of rapidly passing life, in the ship, the bird, and the arrow. In such a fleeting life the wicked cry, "We in like manner, as soon as we were born, began to draw to our end" (v. 13). The wide love of God is described in ch. xi. 23-26: "Thou lovest all the things that are, and abhorrest nothing which Thou hast made" (v. 24); "O Lord, Thou lover of souls" (v. 26). The second book of Esdras, from the "allusions to JESUS CHRIST and to the phraseology of the New Testament," is supposed to be the work of a Jewish Christian. Ecclesiasticus is believed to be written by the son of Sirach, as it claims to be. Josephus excludes the Apocryphal books from the Canon of Scripture, and "Philo never quotes them as he does the Sacred Scriptures. By the Jews they were never viewed as part of the Canon." Still they form an "important link" in Jewish history, and narrate "the fulfillment of many of the Old Testament prophecies, especially those in the book of Daniel." They give accounts of customs and circumstances alluded to in the New Testament, and so help us to understand it. They contain, also, "pious reflections, written by devout men, who were waiting for the consolation of Israel." The Fathers often appealed to them and quoted them. In very early times "they were read in most Churches, at least in the West," not as Canonical Scripture, but as ancient and valuable for instruction, as a homily or sermon might be read. The Belgic Confession allowed them to be read in Churches. This passage occurs in Cecil's "Remains": "Man is a creature of extremes. The middle path is generally the wise path; but there are few wise enough to find it. Because Papists have made too much of some things, Protestants have made too little of them. . . . The Papist puts the Apocrypha into his Canon; the Protestant will scarcely regard it as an ancient record." While the English Church reads the Apocrypha in the public service, it is not read as Scripture. The Episcopal Church wisely takes the middle ground of which Cecil speaks. While she, with the Jews themselves, excludes the Apocryphal books from Canonical Scripture, she is ready to draw from them such information as may be of benefit to her children. Bishop Ch. Wordsworth contends that if the early Church had claimed canonicity for them she would have impeded the entrance of the Jews into her fold; but all the Apostles were Jews, "the first fifteen Bishops of Jerusalem were of Hebrew extraction" (Euseb. H. E., iv. 5). The Greek Church, though not considering the Apocrypha inspired, venerates it, and by a proper use of it we keep in concord thus far with that ancient body. While the Apocrypha was allowed to be read for instruction in ancient Churches, Cyril's Catechetical Lectures show that the Church of Jerusalem was an exception, and the Council of Laodicea determined the case for some other Churches by forbidding all but the Canonical books to be read in the Church. The author of the Apostolic Constitutions, giving orders about the reading of Old Testament books, omits the Apocrypha.

REV. S. F. HOTCHKIN.

Apollinarianism. Apollinaris, Bishop of Laodicea (d. 390 A.D.), a very learned and influential Bishop, promulgated certain erroneous teachings concerning our LORD's nature. The Nicene Council had determined Holy Scripture to teach that He was perfect man as well as Eternal Son of God. As perfect man His human nature must subsist of body and soul, or He would not be perfect man. But this Apollinaris denied. He did not deny the true body, but he did deny the soul in our LORD's human nature. He was refuted by Athanasius (who, however, did not mention his name, for they were personal friends), by Gregory Nazienzen, Gregory of Nyssa, and others, and was condemned by a Council at Alexandria (362 A.D.), and by the second General Council at Constantinople (381 A.D.). His error led him to leave the Church and create a sect. Gregory Nazienzen states firmly the true doctrine of the Church (Ep. ad Cled.): "Let not men deceive nor be deceived," supposing "the lordly nature" (using this term instead of our LORD and GOD) "to be soulless. For we do not separate the manhood from His Divinity; but we confess that it is one and the same; not that the manhood was first, but, that He was GOD, the only SON, before all worlds, without a human body or its attributes. But in the fullness of time He took upon Him flesh for our salvation. He was capable of suffering according to the flesh. He was incapable of suffering according to His divinity, circumscribed according to His body; not to be circumscribed according to His divinity; at once earthly and heavenly, He was seen; he was known; He was in space (as to His human body); He was not bounded by space (as to His divinity, compare St. John iii. 13). That our whole manhood having fallen under sin might be reformed by Him who was wholly man as well as GOD."

Apostasy. (A falling away; a desertion from a cause or from a general.) A defection from the true faith of CHRIST. In times of persecution this sin was rife among Christians from fear of bodily peril especially, as generally the act itself was often proposed in the mildest way: a few grains of incense offered to an idol, or to the image of the emperor, or a renunciation easily ambiguously made, and certified to by a magistrate. But there have been other apostates, such as was the Emperor Julian, or renegades to the Mohammedan Faith. It was legislated upon by the Church, and the penitents had to undergo a long discipline of probation, in some places for twelve years, before they could be restored. But when the state took up apostasy into its Civil Code, its enactments were intolerant. The apostate to paganism was not allowed to bequeath by will or to inherit. At one time he was to be dismissed from all posts of civil dignity. And if the apostasy of a testator could be established within five years after his death, his will was null and void.

Apostle. One who is sent; a title given to the Twelve disciples by our blessed LORD when He chose them to be His messengers to all the world. As for the special traits of the individual Apostles we must turn to the short sketches under their names. Here their office is dwelt upon. They are called Apostles by St. Matthew, only when their appointment is recorded, and by St. Mark, when they return from their mission. But St. Luke gives them this title, from their appointment, in six places, evidently showing that the full value of their title was appreciated later. In St. John's Gospel the name is not given at all, but the Twelve are called disciples. Our LORD considered them as one body. He gave them the practical training His presence and mission work afforded. He seems rather to have trusted to His having them with Him, and to His personal influence, than to His many instructions (St. John xiv. 9). His words, His parables, His works, His example, were His instruction more than the imparting of doctrine. Indeed, His doctrine being so much the expansion and the enforcement of the Old Testament, except the prediction concerning Himself and His Atonement and Resurrection He gave them no secret doctrines. Out of the Twelve there appear to have been chosen to serve Him more closely SS. Peter, James, and John. These were taken up into the Mount of Transfiguration, were with Him in the Garden, as well as selected at other special occasions. Still, He made no further distinctions between them, and it would seem that the Three stood so closely to Him, because of their own love to Him. They all, however, were dull to see what His purposes were, and, with all their training and their zeal and perseverance, still failed to comprehend Him aright. It was not till after His resurrection, and then by a special gift from Him, that they understood all the Scripture about Him. But their office began properly after His Resurrection. The commission that had been given (St. Matt. xvi. 18, 19; xviii. 18, 21) was by anticipation, but now it was given fully and finally, yet not at once, but during the forty days previous to His Ascension. The first part given was on that evening, in the upper chamber, when he met them: (a) "Peace be unto you. As my FATHER hath sent me, even so send (Apostleize) I you." It was a plenary commission, with equal but delegated powers. Then follows: (b) "He breathed on them, and said, Receive ye the HOLY GHOST: whose soever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whose soever sins ye retain, they are retained." This is recorded in St. John's Gospel xx. 21-23. There appears to have been a pause in the conveyance of their commission. For the forty days that He was going in and out among them He was "speaking of the things pertaining to the Kingdom of God" (Acts i. 8). But here we must place the giving of the second part of the commission in His appearing to the Eleven as they sat at meat (St. Mark xvi. 14-18). The mission is now given: (c) "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; and he that believeth not shall be damned." At this point, too, we may add St. Luke's record as parallel and explanatory of St. Mark's: "And that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in His Name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem. And ye are witnesses of these things" (St. Luke xxiv. 47, 48). In obedience to His command they meet Him in a mountain in Galilee, and then He claims His royal authority: "All power is given to ME in Heaven and in earth. Go ye, therefore, and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the Name of the FATHER, and of the SON, and of the HOLY GHOST; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you." And then He gives that solemn promise, now so strangely denied as possible, "And, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world. Amen" (St. Matt. xxviii. 19, 20). We see that the command to baptize is given twice, and the commission to absolve, which involves the effects of baptism, is given once with plenary and co-equal power as His own, and that this delegation rests upon the power given to Him, and He seals it with the gift of the HOLY GHOST for their official acts. St. Luke gives a note, too, in the Apostolic office, "And ye are witnesses of these things." The whole commission is given in perpetuity: "I am with you alway, even to the end of the world." We ascertain, then, that the Apostolic office was never to fail, and was to be a witness of Him and His Resurrection; that it was to convey to the repentant sinner the effect of His atonement, i.e., pardon, and forgiveness by baptism, and it was to use discipline; that its mission-field was the world.

The continuity of the office was shown by the election of Matthew (Acts i. 15-26), the condition being that the person elected must have been with the LORD JESUS from the beginning, that he might be a competent witness of the Resurrection. The co-equality in the office was shown by the co-equal gift of the HOLY GHOST to the Twelve, and in the fact that the College of the Apostles sent SS. Peter and John down to Samaria (Acts viii.), and that St. James presided at the Council of Jerusalem (Acts xv.), and that St. Paul admitted no superior to himself (Gal. i. 1). The perpetuity of the office was shown by the fact that Silvanus and Timothy and Epaphroditus and Titus were Apostles as well as Barnabas and Paul. Indeed, there were some who were false Apostles (2 Cor. xi. 13; Rev. ii. 2), which could not have been unless the office was widely spread. This we note was within Apostolic time. But as Timothy was an Apostle (comp. 1 Thess. i. 1 with ii. 6), he was led (2 Tim. ii. 1, 2) to commit to faithful men the commission that they might teach others also, a very direct command on the succession, which was of course implied in the directions about Bishops or Elders and Deacons. What, then, were the functions of the Apostle? He was primarily to Preach, and to Baptize, and to Confirm (Acts viii. and xix.; Heb. vi.), and to Discipline (cf. St. John xx. 23, with Acts viii. 20-23; 1 Cor. v. 1-5; 1 Tim. i. 18-20). Again, it is to be noted that not only did our LORD promise a perpetual presence with the holders of the office, but it was the only office He ordained, prayed for, and gave the HOLY GHOST to Himself, and sent it for them to use for the Church. They selected Elders in every Church, they ordained Deacons, but they alone were in the original sacred commission. This would be alone sufficient to prove its continuity did the New Testament give us no other facts. But in truth the whole work presupposes Apostolic authority. And continuance in the unity of the Apostles was from the first a proof of orthodoxy (Acts ii. 42; 2 Thess. ii. 15, iii. 4-9; 1 Cor. iv. 16-21; xi.; Gal. i.; Phil. iii. 17; 1 John i. 3; ii. 19; Rev. ii. 2, 3). In fact, Apostolic authority is so constantly presupposed that to quote any texts in proof is needless. All commands and directions are founded upon it. Now, the Apostolic office was to give real and true spiritual gifts, and to be the only appointed channel by which they were conveyed. Prophets and Teachers might be multiplied, but since Baptism and Absolution, and the Confirmation, and the Lord's Supper, and the Blessing of Peace are real and true gifts to be received and lived in, and are not conferred by merely preaching which opens the mind, or teaching which trains the disciples to receive; and since these gifts are only to be received by these officers, the Apostolic office must be perpetual. It was and it must continue to be the witness of the Incarnation and Resurrection (1 John throughout), and it is a sad fact, but one which follows from the principles inherent in the commission, that wherever it has been dropped by any sect, and there has been no continuing Apostolic Church near it to enforce these doctrines, the body so rejecting the Apostolic office has also rejected the Divinity of CHRIST.

Apostolic Fathers. Clement, the companion of St. Paul, and later Bishop of Rome (97 A.D.), Ignatius (116 A.D.), and Polycarp (167 A.D.), companions of St. John, wrote certain letters which have come down to us, and are of great value. Clement's letter to the Corinthians is valuable not only for its own merits, but chiefly for its quotations from the New Testament, being an unconscious witness of the authenticity and general reception of the books he cites. Ignatius wrote six Epistles to the Churches of Ephesus, Tralles, Rome, Magnesia, Philadelphia, and Smyrna, and one to Polycarp, which give incidental but positive information on Episcopacy, and upon Church government, and which quote the New Testament very freely, enabling us to establish the early circulation of parts of the New Testament. There is also a cotemporary account of his martyrdom. Polycarp wrote a letter to the Philadelphians, and there is also a cotemporary narrative of his martyrdom. These are most valuable records from those who were trained by the Apostles. There are, besides, the Shepherd of Hermas (identified by some with the Hermas of Rom. xvi. 14, but very doubtful), which was at one time very popular, the very doubtful (but very early written) Epistle of St. Barnabas, and some fragments of the works of Papias, Bishop of Hierapolis, and a disciple of St. John. These had been taught by the Apostles St. John and St. Paul; and their writings, especially since their testimony cannot be doubted as true, are valuable not so much on the subjects they discussed as upon the facts of Church government they assumed or alluded to, and of the genuineness of such of the New Testament Scriptures as they quoted incidentally, doing so without hesitation, as if appealing to an inspired authority equal to the Old Testament Scripture.

Apostolic Succession. The real meaning of this term is but little appreciated even by many otherwise well-informed Churchmen. It is supposed to be, as it really is, a consecration of a person to Episcopal authority and office by those who have themselves received it from others tracing their authority by successive ascent back to some one of the Apostles. But harsh deductions are drawn from it, and the Church is accused of judging and "unchurching" those who from some prejudice or other reject it. She does not do this. She has a duty to do in asserting her right to be a part of the Holy Catholic Church, and this is one of the visible elements of her divine organization. She judges none. That is God's prerogative. If they reject her claims to their fealty, it is not her fault. If there is any unchurching, they do it themselves. But this Law of Apostolic Succession in the Church is only what she must have as a self-perpetuating Body. Its principle underlies all acknowledged government. Unless the exercise of supreme authority be received from some acknowledged and revered source, this authority is but usurpation. And the formal admission to wield this authority by the proper persons thereto appointed constitutes the person so admitted an officer clothed with this authority. The President of the United States is elected, but he is not President and cannot assume the authority of his office till the oath of office is administered to him by the officer appointed by the Constitution. It must be so in every organization. The Church is CHRIST's organized kingdom. It cannot break a law which He has put as fundamental to all government. It must derive its authority from Him. Spiritually He is present. The HOLY GHOST abides in it, and it is sustained and fed by Him. As He withdraws His visible Presence it must have a self-perpetuating government. As it is divine and miraculous it must be founded in miracles. Our LORD took not His office upon Himself, but was sent (Apostleized), even as Aaron was called of God. It was founded in miracles. In fact, it is a proper law in God's dealings with men, that every dispensation or covenant He makes is founded in miracles, rests upon them. For the Patriarchs, the miracles to Abraham were vouchers. For the Jew, from Moses' time forth, the wonders in the land of Ham, in the field of Zoan, at the Red Sea, and in the Wilderness were enough. And the authority of the High-Priest rested upon the miraculous call and the wonderful power given to Aaron. So our LORD had a public commission given Him, and was endowed by His FATHER (as well as by inherent right as God's SON) to prove His doctrine by His miracles. And He sent His officers forth with that power. It was superadded, not essential. It was for proof, not for authority. The last High-Priest that entered within the veil was as much a High-Priest as was Aaron. But our LORD was sent, was His FATHER's "APOSTLE" (Heb. iii. 1). He chose twelve, whom He called Apostles (St. Luke vi. 13), and when He commissioned them anew after His Resurrection He admitted them to His own rank. "As my FATHER has made me an apostle, even so I send you" (St. John xx. 21). For this reason the distinction between the Apostolate and the Presbyterate is clearly preserved throughout the New Testament. Again, as this office involves our LORD's own office, He has promised an abiding perpetuating presence in it to the end of the world (St. Matt. xxviii. 20). He has Himself made unity with Him and His FATHER depend upon it. (I.) It is noticeable that He does not pray for unity till interceding first for the Apostles. He pleads, "Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also that believe on me through their word; that they all may be one, as Thou, FATHER, art in Me, and I in Thee, that they also may be one in us" (St. John xvii. 20, 21). When we remember the time of this prayer, the High-Priest sanctifying Himself as the one perfect victim, the unutterably solemn power of it will be felt. (II.) The Apostles claimed that fellowship with themselves was essential to the continuance of the members in the Church (Acts ii. 42; 1 John i. 1-7; ii. 19; 2 Thess. iii. 6, as in other like places). This authority resided in them to admit to their own rank upon the LORD's own commission. Indeed, they admitted several.—St. Matthias, St. Barnabas, St. Paul. We know that St. Paul numbered with himself in rank St. Timothy, and Titus, and Silvanus (vide 1 Thess. ii.; comp. with ii. 6). Indeed, if these steps of the transmission can be proven it is useless to deny the fact or to explain away the principle. But we see our LORD, our Apostle, from His Father; the Twelve, the Apostles, from our LORD; St. Matthias, and Barnabas, and Paul (Acts xiii. 1, 2) from the Twelve; St. Timothy, and Titus, and Silvanus from St. Paul. The question of the Angels of the Churches (Rev. ii. and iii.) needs no discussion here, since the acceptance of the principle in the New Testament is sufficiently established. It is absurd to suppose that St. Timothy or St. Titus would break the commandment they had received so solemnly from St. Paul. The question is authoritatively decided by the Ignatian Epistles, since they accept and carry forward this line of succession.

It is absurd to claim that the line has been broken. For (a) the earliest Canon of post-Apostolic times orders that the consecrators shall be three. The purpose being that the consecration shall be most public and notorious. (b) The intercommunion of the different Churches kept any one Church from being imposed upon. It is significant that this was tried in the times of the Apostles. False Apostles, cried St. Paul. Our LORD commends the Angel of the Church in Ephesus, "and hast tried them which say they are Apostles and are not, and hast found them liars" (Rev. ii. 2). The chain can no more be broken than the descents of an ever-increasing family be denied. We ask no Jew to prove his descent from Abraham. The principle of the succession is well shown by the following occurrence, which shall be set down in the words of the venerated narrator:

"A doctrine is sometimes better illustrated by a story than by a dogmatic treatise. The character of true repentance, and the possibility of free pardon for transgressions against Heaven, are better exhibited by the parable of the Prodigal Son than they would be by a homiletical treatise. Bearing this in mind, we are inclined to believe that an anecdote of parochial experience will satisfy, if not convince, multitudes, better than more formal statements respecting Apostolical successions.

"A rector, who had gone to a railroad depot to see a clerical brother start upon a journey, encountered a lady who, though a Presbyterian, had for years belonged to his church-choir. She was much pleased to see him, for she was going from home permanently and was glad to bid him farewell. She thanked him for his ministrations, and confessed that her mind had become softened about many Episcopal peculiarities; but one she had never been able to admit or tolerate. Of course, the natural question was, to what do you allude? Oh, to the well-known theory of an Apostolic succession in the ministry. Why, the answer was, you yourself believe in a whole family of Apostolic successions, and surely a single specimen in the ministry ought not to give you any trouble. Oh, no; she had no faith in anything of the kind. Well, let us see. Do you, or do you not, believe in the Apostolic succession of the Christian religion? Why, she had never heard of such an idea before. But, it was pressed upon her, if you do not, then you must admit the charge of infidels that Christianity is an invention or an imposture, for it must be traced to its sources to be true to its own pretensions. So she admitted the point and consented to the most comprehensive of all Apostolic successions whatever.

"Then she was asked about the Apostolic succession of the Christian Church,—the grand outward institution of Christianity. Was there ever a time, since the days of CHRIST and His Apostles, when there was not a Christian Church upon the earth? Had this Church ever died out and vanished? Oh, no; she could allow nothing of the kind. Then you believe in the Apostolic succession of the Christian Church? Rather timorously (for she began to have an inkling of the journey she was traveling) she admitted that she did.

"Now, exclaimed her somewhat amused querist, here comes a formidable matter: Do you, or do you not, believe in the Apostolic succession of the Christian Scriptures? Remember, and remember well, here confronts us one of those awful gaps with which your friends so often threaten us. We have no manuscripts of such Scriptures which go back of about the middle of the fourth century, that is, say 350 A.D. And the last writer of Christian Scripture may be dated at 100 A.D. Here, then, is a prodigious gap of two hundred and fifty years to be bridged over, and unless you will cross it under the guidance of history and ancient authors, unless you will take the testimony of that institution whose continuity you have acknowledged, you have no Bible. You have lost it in that dark abyss which has swallowed up (as you affirm) our pretensions to a ministry whose line has never been broken. It was an awful alternative, and she surrendered without conditions.

"Then the question was followed up by one about visible sacraments. If such things had no Apostolic succession we must abandon the celebration of old-fashioned sacraments and join the Quakers. Infant baptism came next; and if this could not be traced by its Apostolic succession, we must march for the camping-ground of Anabaptists.

"From outward institutions the questioner went on to doctrines. If the doctrine of the Trinity had no Apostolic succession, we must acknowledge this doctrine a failure or a misconception, make fellowship with actual heretics, and adopt Socinianism. If the doctrine of the fall and original sin had no Apostolic succession, we must justify Pelagianism and avow ourselves our own redeemers. She now foresaw her destiny quite plainly, and bowed to the rector's postulate, that with him she believed in a family of successions which were truly Apostolic.

"But now, said he, comes the crux of this debated matter. You believe in the Apostolic succession of a Christian ministry. Was there ever a time when there was not such a ministry upon earth? when its continuity was broken and its existence was to be again begun? Oh, no; by no means. Then at last you believe with me in the steady existence of an Apostolic ministry, be its inward constitution what it might, and the difference between us is about the nature of an exceedingly long chain,—whether it has three strands in it or only one. Take Solomon's assurance about the reliability of a threefold cord, and you will come over to my side cordially. The difference between us has dwindled down to an affair so small that for safety's sake you should capitulate without a qualm. And to help you do so gracefully, let me beg you to remember that there is almost the same unanimity in Christendom about Episcopacy which even Gibbon was constrained to admit there is about the doctrine of the Trinity, which, of course, as a governing doctrine concerning the Godhead, is the pivot on which doctrinal orthodoxy has for ages turned. 'The consubstantiality of the FATHER and the SON,' says the skeptical historian, 'was established by the Council of Nice, and has been unanimously received as a fundamental article of the Christian Faith, by the consent of the Greek, the Latin, the Oriental, and the Protestant Churches.' (Dec. and Fall, ch. xvii. 12mo. ed., vol. ii. p. 317, 318; and comp. p. 312 at top.) The unanimity of Christendom about Episcopacy is nearly as complete as its unanimity about the Trinity; and with the Trinity for doctrine and Episcopacy for discipline, Christendom might begin to be, as in the primitive ages, a united whole, an unbroken communion of Saints." (Rev. T. W. Coit, D.D.)

The succession of the English Church from St. Polycarp, from the unknown founder of the Roman line, and from St. James, the first Bishop of Jerusalem, is here given. As this must have been an interlacing of the Churches in the East, which were founded by St. Peter at Antioch, and St. Paul at Ephesus, as well as by St. John in Asia Minor, doubtless the direct line of the Patriarchs of Jerusalem was bound up with these successions by acting upon the Canon requiring the three consecrators. So the English Episcopate has probably twined into one "cord" more of the separate successions than any other communion.*

Etherius, with Virgilius of Arles, consecrated the Monk Augustine (whom Gregory had sent out to the Saxons in Britain) as Archbishop of Canterbury. The English succession is by Augustine, through Etherius and Virgilius to St. John. It runs on thus:

CANTERBURY.	A.D.	ROME.	A.D.

Vitalian being asked to aid the Saxons in selecting an Archbishop, selected Theodorus, a Greek of Tarsus, and consecrated him, and sent him to England. At this late point the Roman succession enters into the English line, which traced first to St. John.

Archbishop Moore, assisted by the Archbishop of York, and by the Bishops of Bath and Wells and of Peterborough, consecrated William White and Samuel Provoost, on February 4, 1787. Three years later he, with the Bishops of London and of Rochester, consecrated James Madison, on September 19, 1790. Already, Samuel Seabury had received consecration from the Bishops of Scotland, Robert Kilgour, Bishop of Aberdeen; Arthur Petrie, Bishop of Moray; and John Skinner, of Aberdeen, Primus of the Church of Scotland, on November 14, 1784.

The Scotch succession springs from the English succession, as Archbishop Sheldon, assisted by the Bishops of Carlisle, Worcester, and Llandaff; consecrated James Sharpe Archbishop of St. Andrew's; from them the consecrators of Bishop Seabury drew their authority.

The number of American Bishops from this beginning has become a total of one hundred and thirty-four.

The discussion on the Apostolic Succession has occupied so many pens that only a very few works can be mentioned here. In the English Church, Haddon on the Apostolic Succession is of authority, as also the older "Daubeny's Guide." In the American Church, many valuable tracts and works have been put forth, as Bishop Onderdonk's "Episcopacy tested by Scripture," Dr. Bowden's "Letters to Dr. Miller," Chapin's "Primitive Church," Bishop Kip's "Double Witness," Marshall's "Notes on Episcopacy." These are old works, but they contain the whole question, and are probably more accessible than other later ones. The lists of the succession above given have been compiled from Chapin's "Primitive Church" and Bishop Seymour's List in the "Churchman's Calendar" for 1866.

Appellate Court. In all our Dioceses, except the three in Illinois, the system of Church courts, for the trial of priests, deacons, and laymen, is incomplete, providing, for the most part, for only one formal trial. In nearly all, no trial can be entered upon unless the Bishop consents. In nearly all, the Bishop has so large an agency in the formation of the Court,—which is a Court appointed for the special case,—that it is possible to organize it to convict or to acquit, as he may prefer. In some Dioceses the Court is a permanent body, elected annually by the Convention. Where there is a definite party predominance in any such Diocesan Convention, it will naturally be embodied in the personnel of the Court, and any trial marked with the slightest partisan tinge would merely be decided like any other party vote. In neither case is any appeal provided. If injustice were done, there could be no possible remedy. Even if a Bishop should be so extreme as to lay himself open to trial and conviction for the mode in which he might have secured the deposition of an obnoxious clergyman, still, the punishment of the Bishop would not operate to restore the poor clergyman. For him there is no remedy. His oppressor might be deposed, but he himself would not be in the slightest degree relieved from the consequences of that oppression.

Several attempts to establish an Appellate Court by General Convention have failed, for various reasons. Every such attempt has shown the cumbrousness and practical difficulty of constructing any one Appellate Court, which can receive appeals from the whole American Church; and it is as well that they have failed, for they were not reasonably workable. In the Canon for the trial of a Bishop we find an important recognition of the true principle, in the establishment of a Board of Inquiry, whose members are taken from the Diocese concerned and the three adjoining Dioceses. The grouping of Dioceses conveniently situated is the true solution of the difficulty. The other principle involved is, that whereas the probability of injustice in the first instance is due to the predominance of the will of one man, the appeal should be to the judgment of more than one. Individual prejudice is more likely to be remedied by collective fairness.

The "grouping of Dioceses conveniently situated" is only another description of what is known in Ecclesiastical language as a Province. And the first Province to be fully organized in this country is also the first to give us a reasonable Court of Appeal. We refer to Illinois, whose three Dioceses of "Chicago," "Quincy," and "Springfield" are united in the "Province of Illinois." The scrupulous obstructiveness of the General Convention had decided that a Court of Appeals, under Article VI. of the Constitution, could be established only by the action of the Dioceses as such, and not by the action of the Province as a Province. Accordingly, the Federate Council acted only as an informal committee in preparing the draft of a Canon, which, with substantial identity, was afterwards adopted by each of the three Diocesan Conventions. The leading principles of this Canon are as follows:

1. The Bishops of the Province are the judges of the Court of Appeal. As the possible prejudice or passion of the Bishop of the Diocese from which the appeal comes may be the leading feature in the case, it would be manifestly a departure from our established ideas for the official action of one Bishop to be officially reviewed and corrected, except by his peers,—his brethren in the same order. Moreover, this is the primitive rule,—the Bishops of the Province being the universal Court of Appeal in the earlier ages. It is wisely provided, however, that the Bishop whose judgment is appealed from shall not preside in the Court during the trial of that case. In all other cases, the Bishop who presides in the Federate Council (the Metropolitan, as he was called in ancient days) presides also in the Appellate Court.

2. But there are few of our Bishops who have been trained as lawyers; and to one who has not had that training, there are many legal points which may fail to be appreciated by the unlegal mind. The Illinois Canon, therefore, provides that there shall be Assessors in the Court of Appeal,—each Diocesan Convention shall elect one Clerical and one Lay Assessor. It may be taken for granted that each Convention will select a clergyman who is known for his familiarity with the Canons, and a layman who is learned in the law of the land. As occasions may arise when there will not be entire harmony between a Bishop and the majority in his Convention, and as it is his right that he should have the advice of those in whom he has confidence, it is properly added that, besides the elected Assessors,—who may be depended upon to protect the rights of clergy and laity,—each Bishop may, if he see fit, appoint one clerical or lay Assessor, or both. This power will, doubtless, be very seldom exercised; but it is quite proper that it should be secured.

3. In other Courts of Appeal, with Assessors, it has been a contested point whether the members of the Court should be bound to decide in accordance with the advice of the Assessors, or should have power to decide otherwise. In Illinois, the responsibility is accurately divided in the Canon itself. As the Assessors are supposed to be superior in the knowledge to be expected of experts, they are to decide all interlocutory questions,—all those questions of historical or professional interpretation, admissibility of evidence, etc., in which men without special training are most likely to make mistakes. In this way they protect the dignity of the Bishops from the danger of making an unhappy exhibit of insufficient information. But when all preliminary questions are thus settled, and nothing remains but the final decision as to whether the appeal shall be granted, or refused, or a new trial ordered, then the dignity of the Bishops is further secured by giving to them alone the right to vote. But a further safeguard for the rights of clergy and laity is secured in the provision that each Bishop shall give, in writing, seriatim, the reasons for his decision. When it is known beforehand that every such opinion must run the gauntlet of open and public criticism, it is the more likely to be fair.

4. The Illinois Canon is seriously defective in one point. It allows of no appeal except from an adverse decision in a Diocesan Court. This would limit the usefulness of the Court to the lowest possible minimum. Not one-tenth part of the grievances that arise ever come before an Ecclesiastical Court at all: and thus nine-tenths of our practical troubles would be left just where they are now,—with no remedy whatsoever. An appeal should be allowed to every person claiming to be aggrieved by any action on the part of any of the constituted authorities of the Church in any Diocese of the Province. In the primitive Church, this was carried so far as to include every case of suspension from the communion or of excommunication. The principle was, indeed, early recognized that an act of discipline by one Bishop could not be revoked by another Bishop. The one under discipline could be restored only by his own Bishop. But every such act was open to revision by the Bishops of the Province. For instance, the 5th Canon of the great Council of Nicæa provides as follows:

"Concerning those, whether of the Clergy or of the Laity, who have been excommunicated by the Bishops in the several Provinces, let the provision of that Canon prevail which provides that persons who have been cast out by one Bishop are not to be readmitted by another. Nevertheless, inquiry should be made whether they have been excommunicated through captiousness, or contentiousness, or any such like ungracious disposition, in the Bishop. And, that this matter may have due investigation, it is decreed that, in every Province, Synods shall be held twice every year; in order that, all the Bishops of the Province being assembled together, such questions may by them be thoroughly examined; so that those who have confessedly offended against their Bishop may be seen to be, for just cause, excommunicated by all, until it shall seem fit to the common assembly of the Bishops to pronounce a milder sentence upon them," etc.

And the 6th Canon of Antioch (afterwards made œcumenical) provides in like manner:

"If any one has been excommunicated by his own Bishop, let him not be received by others until he has either been restored by his own Bishop, or until, when a Synod is held, he shall have appeared and made his defense, and, having convinced the Synod, shall have received a different sentence. And let this decree apply to the Laity, and to Presbyters and Deacons, and all who are in the Canon" (i.e., on the Sacerdotal List).

It is clear that if the exercise of the power of the keys—specifically given to each Bishop at his consecration—was thus open to appeal, and revision by other Bishops, there can be no official action of a Bishop secure from such revision. And if all the official acts of a Bishop are liable to revision and correction by his brethren, there are no inferior officers or organizations in the Church who can have the face to claim exemption.

The good example set by Illinois will, in course of time, it is to be hoped, be followed in other States of the Union, only with its imperfections remedied, so as to bring it into closer agreement with the example of the primitive Church, and with the requirements of justice and common sense. The true idea of the Episcopate is, not that each Bishop may be an irresponsible despot within his own territorial limits, liable to no correction until he is bad enough to be deposed, but that the entire order is One (Episcopatus est unus), in such wise that there is no official act of any Bishop which may not be submitted to the revision of his brethren. The strength of the whole order will thus rest in each act: while, on the other plan, the authority of the entire order will suffer from any manifestation of arbitrary caprice or infirmity on the part of any individual Bishop. Nothing short of the true system will realize St. Cyprian's description of the One Episcopate,—"cujus a singulis IN SOLIDUM pars tenetur."

REV. J. H. HOPKINS, D.D.

Archbishop. It at first probably meant what it now signifies,—Bishops over provinces, but themselves under Metropolitans or Patriarchs. About the time of the Council of Chalcedon, however, it came to mean the Patriarchs themselves. But later again it fell back to its original use, i.e., the Bishop over other Bishops in a Province. The co-equality of spiritual power of his suffragans, and the superiority position for the discipline of the Church in the Archbishop, were both strenuously set forth. The Archbishops of the Western Church for centuries were independent, but about 514 A.D. the Popes began giving the pall (vide PALL), and from that in about two hundred and fifty years succeeded in enforcing that the gift of the pall was imperative, and that the Archbishop should swear fealty to the Pope on receiving it. This was thrown off by the Anglican Communion. In the English Communion there are four Archbishops,—Canterbury, York, Armagh, and Dublin. In the American Church the presiding Bishop, who is the eldest consecrated Bishop, has many Archiepiscopal functions to perform. Through him must be made all official communications from foreign Churches. He presides in the House of Bishops, or convenes it for special meetings; either consecrates in person or appoints consecrators for a Bishop-elect; appoints the council of five Bishops to settle differences between a parish and the Diocesan; receives the resignation of a Bishop and communicates it to each of the Bishops having jurisdiction in the Church, and upon their advice accepts or refuses such resignation; and receives charges against, and arranges for the trial of, an accused Bishop.

Archdeacon. The Archdeacon was originally the presiding Deacon over the body of Deacons, either in a city or a Deanery, or a Diocese. Later, in the ninth century, the Archdeacon was in priests' orders. His functions were to look after the finances of the Church and the distribution of funds to the poor. He exercised a discipline over the Deacons and Presbyters under him in the Bishop's behalf, and he had a care over the property of the Church. He was the Bishop's business man, so to speak. In the East, when a See was vacant, he was one of the guardians of its rights and its property. The Diocese usually had several Archdeacons. In the English Church the Archdeacon looks after the condition of the church and of the parsonage, and is the proper person to order or to permit repairs. It is there an office of great weight, since the Archdeacon holds a court, at which cases of discipline of the laity are presented. The rights of the office vary much in the several Dioceses, but usually the Archdeacon visits for the Bishop the clergy, inspects the property, inducts parsons, receives the presentments of the Church-wardens, and holds a minor court.

The title has been revived in two of the Dioceses of the American Church,—Albany and Connecticut, but the office is probably identical with the title Dean of Convocation.

Archimandrite. (Gr. the leader of the fold.) The title of the ruler over several monasteries. It does not necessarily imply that the Archimandrite had several monasteries under him, but this was usually the case. The Hegumen was the chief over a single monastery, and consequently when several monasteries were under one rule he was subject to the Archimandrite. The Archimandrite was, of course, under the authority of the Bishop. It was a title which soon came into use after monastic bodies obtained some cohesion and lived by some acknowledged rule.

Architecture, Church. Prefatory.—Under this head an endeavor will be made to inquire into the nature and structure of the places of worship of the early Christians, their development from the upper room of the days of the Apostles, through the intervening centuries, to the magnificent structures of the Middle Ages, continuing thence to our own times. But a cursory glance can be given to the history of this subject in the limited space here allotted, the idea of this article being mainly to show what may be done in the way of improving the architecture and arrangement of our parish churches, adapting them not only to the wants of the congregation, but making them more houses of God, monuments and offerings of a grateful people to the great and unseen CREATOR of all things.

Early History.—What little is known of the places of worship of the early Christians is found in the patristic writings and among the writings of the early Christian historians, while much information is also obtainable from the early heathen writers of the age. In the earliest times, doubtless, there were no fixed edifices, services being held in the houses of Christians, sometimes, as we read in the Scriptures, in an upper room, as when Paul was stopping at Troas: "Upon the first day of the week, when the disciples came together to break bread (that is, to celebrate the Eucharist), Paul preached unto them, ready to depart on the morrow, and continued his speech until midnight. And there were many lights in the upper chamber, where they were gathered together. Now there sat in a window a certain young man named Eutychus, being fallen into a deep sleep, and as Paul was long preaching, he sunk down with sleep and fell down from the third loft and was taken up dead."

This is the most particular description of a house of worship that we find in the Scriptures. It will be noticed that this is an upper room, as was also that in which our SAVIOUR celebrated the Last Supper. These out-of-the-way places were doubtless selected because in those early days it was as much as a man's life was worth to proclaim himself a Christian. In Rome we find them worshiping in the houses of wealthy Christians, in underground chapels, and in other places where they were least liable to be disturbed.

Owing to the cruel persecutions to which the early Christians were subjected, both under the tyrant Nero, 64 A.D., and then under the Roman Emperor Domitian, 94 A.D., many have held that there were no structures set apart for the worship of God. Yet St. Paul says, "Have ye not houses to eat and drink in? or despise ye the Church of God?" Now it is shown that the ancient writers, St. Austin, St. Basil, St. Chrysostom, and St. Jerome, took this to mean the place set apart for Christian worship, and not the assembly of people. Then we know that the disciples often met together for prayer and worship after the death of our SAVIOUR.

In the second century, when the persecutions were still active against the Christians and it became necessary for them to band together, Ignatius writes to exhort them to meet together in one place, and in his Epistle to the Philadelphians says that at this time there was one altar in every church, and one Apostolic Bishop, or head, appointed with his Presbytery and Deacons. Some of the later Greek readings omit the word Church, but speak of the one altar, thus showing that there was a stated place of worship. Then history tells us of people turning their houses over to the Church in which to celebrate the divine offices of worship. We have record of forty churches in Rome at the date of the last persecution, and there were many in Africa.

As early as the middle of the third century Gregory of Neo Cæsarea writes describing the degrees or admission of penitents, according to the discipline of those days:

1st. Weepers (the first degree of penance) were without the porch of the oratory. There the mournful sinners stood and begged of all the faithful, as they went in, to pray for them.

2d. Hearers (the second degree) were within the porch, in the place called Narthex, where the penitent sinners might stand near the catechumens and hear the Scripture read and expounded, but were to go out before them.

3d. Prostrantes,—lying down along the church-pavement. These prostrate ones were admitted somewhat farther into the church and went out with the catechumens.

4th. Stantes,—staying with the people or congregation. These consistentes did not go out with the catechumens, but after they and the other penitents had left remained, and joined in prayer with the faithful.

5. Participators in the Sacraments.

About the beginning of the fourth century Constantine ascended the throne, and becoming fully convinced of the truth of the Christian religion, set about establishing it throughout his dominions, erecting churches everywhere. For some time before his reign, and even into it for twenty-five years, heathen temples were used to some extent for Christian worship, how much has never been determined. At this time, however (333 A.D.), Constantine ordered all the temples, altars, and images of the heathen to be destroyed, and in many instances these temples were demolished and their revenues confiscated. Some of the later emperors, however, instead of pulling down the temples, converted them to Christian uses. Honorius published in the Western Empire two laws forbidding the destruction of any more temples in the cities, as they might serve for ornament or public use, being once purged of their idols and altars. There can be no doubt of the antipathy of the Christians to the fine arts, because defiled by idolatrous uses, and that they destroyed everything that was beautiful that came in their way. Notwithstanding the later imperial decrees for the preservation of the heathen temples, nothing could induce the people to tolerate them or their contents, and it was only in a few out-of-the-way places, as at Palestine, they were allowed to remain. At Rome the only example that owes its preservation distinctively to the Christians is the Pantheon. They destroyed everything that they could lay their hands on, the more beautiful the quickest destroyed, it mattered not so long as it savored of the rites of the heathen Church. They worked, even as in later times the Puritans worked in England: whatever was beautiful, whatever pleased the eye, if it belonged to the earlier religion, must give way to the new.

We know that the Emperor Constantine gave orders, after a long search by the Empress Helena, which resulted in finding the Holy Sepulchre, that a church be erected over its site. The place had been desecrated by the pagans; they even had erected a statue of Venus over the place, and dedicated the spot to the heathen goddess. Constantine orders how the church shall be built, of what form, of what materials, and sets forth as to the decoration, etc. All in a most elaborate manner. There is even a plan of this Holy Sepulchre Church handed down by the Abbot Adamnan of Iona on his tablets, as he took it down from the description of Arculfus, a Gallican Bishop, who had visited the East. It was of "wonderful roundity," entered by four doors; it contained three aisles, and was surrounded by twelve columns; hanging in it were twelve lamps, burning day and night, emblems of the twelve Apostles.

Although the Church of the Holy Sepulchre was evidently round, it had other parts attached, and there is little evidence of this form being employed elsewhere to any great extent, the usual form being that of a parallelogram. Baptisteries, however, were generally built either round or polygonal. It is evident that the churches, of whatever form, had other buildings attached, both for secular and religious purposes,—such as libraries, houses for the clergy, schools, etc., much the same as in the later cathedrals and in many of the mission churches of today in London, and occasionally in America. The entrance was at the west end, the church being placed east and west, with the altar at the east. There are exceptions to this custom; no more, however, than to prove the rule, the habit being to face to the east, so in this way it became natural to orientate the churches. Entering the western door, and passing through the porch, a large open court was reached, surrounded by a colonnade. In the centre, this court contained a fountain, used to wash the hands and face, sometimes the feet. This, perhaps, is the origin of the custom now in vogue in Roman churches, though perverted, of having a stoup of holy water at the door. This open court, or atrium, was used for penitents of the first order, those who were not allowed to enter the church: later it was used as a place of burial, particularly for the wealthy and those of distinction. Passing through this quadrangle the narthex was reached. Entrance to this was had through three gates, the central usually the larger. There were, sometimes, several narthexes to a church, even as many as four. The narthex formed the first division of the church, and contained the catechumens and the hearers. Jews, infidels, and heretics were admitted here. In front came the third class of penitents.

The narthex was separated from the nave or church proper by a wooden screen, or railing. The nave was entered through several gates, often called royal or beautiful gates. Here were congregated the main body of worshipers, those in full communion and under no censure.

The sexes were usually separated during service, a practice that is yet in use in some of the modern ritualistic Churches. St. Cyril says, "Let men be with men and women with women in the church." Then in the Apostolical constitutions, "Let the door-keepers stand at the gate of the men, and the deaconesses at the gate of the women." The women were usually placed on the north side of the church. The Greeks now put them in the galleries.

Not only was this order observed, but the virgins, matrons, and widows were given distinct places; then came the order of penitents not allowed to partake of the Holy Eucharist, but permitted to stay in the church and witness the celebration. East of the nave came the choir, the place for the singers. This was separated from the former by a screen or low wall. Here was placed the ambo, or pulpit, from which the gospel and epistle were read. The sermon, as a rule, was preached by the Bishop from the altar-steps, although St. Chrysostom, the better to be heard of the people, preached from the ambo.

Extending from the choir eastward, was the sanctuary, corresponding to the holy of holies of Jews. The Latins called it the sacrum. Here were celebrated the Church's most sacred offices. The sacrum was always elevated above the choir, and was often separated from it by a rail or low screen called cancelli, hence the word chancel. This was to keep out the multitude. The Council of Laodicea forbade lay persons entering the sanctuary, while the Council of Trullo says, "That no layman whatsoever be permitted to enter the place of the altar, excepting only the Emperor, when he makes his oblation to the CREATOR, according to ancient custom."

The sacrum was usually semicircular in plan. In the centre was placed the altar, raised on several steps, and surmounted by a canopy supported by twelve columns, symbolical of the twelve Apostles. On the top of the canopy was a cross, while behind the altar was the Bishop's chair raised and facing west. Around the circumference of the apse were placed the seats for the priests. The early altars were of wood, but this material was not used long, as is evident from the decree of the Council of Ebone, that no altars should be consecrated except such as be of stone. Gregory Nyssen says, "This altar whereat we stand is by nature only common stone, nothing different from other stones, whereof our walls are made and pavements formed; but after it is consecrated, and dedicated to the services of God, it becomes a holy table, an immaculate altar, which may not promiscuously be touched by all, but only by the priests in the time of divine service." All of which goes to show the sacred feeling for the church, and especially its more sacred altar, held even in the very early days of the Church. The spaces between the columns of the canopy to the altar were hung with curtains or veils to conceal the altar. St. Chrysostom says, "When you see the veils withdrawn, then think you see heaven opened, and the angels descending from above." Hangings were placed in other parts of the church, sometimes richly worked in gold. They were placed between nave and chancel, and before doors, etc. The altar was covered with a linen cloth, emblem of purity. The sacred vessels were of various substances, usually of gold and silver, yet glass was used in the earlier times for chalices.

Often beside the altar in a recess on one side was a shelf to contain the offerings of bread and wine. On the opposite side from this was the priest's vestry.

Outside the main body of the church, and within an outer inclosure, were the various buildings connected with the church, such as the baptistery, which in those days was always a separate structure, the library, priests' houses, etc.

The interiors of these churches of the early Christians were, according to the writers of the time, quite elaborately decorated. The walls were often lined with marble, while the roofs were of mosaic or paneled, and covered with gold and color. The altars were inlaid with precious stones and gold and silver, while gates were set with silver and ivory, and columns were of rare marbles with capitals of bright gold.

It has been thought by some that the ancient Roman basilica, the seat of public justice of the time, suggested the form and arrangement of the Christian church. However true this may be, they certainly bore a close resemblance, and there are numerous instances of basilicæ being converted into churches. This plan of Trajan's Basilica will show how far the basilica was imitated in the arrangement of the Christian church (Fig. 1). The basilica was of the shape of a parallelogram, with a semicircular apse at one—sometimes at either—end.

Trajan's Basilica or Justice Hall, Rome, 98 A.D.

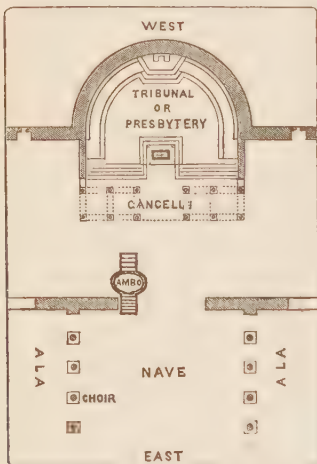

In the centre of the apse was the seat of the prætor, and below and about him those of the assessors and other officers. These were separated from the main body of the building by a screen of lattice-work called cancelli. In the main body sat the people, while between them and the higher officers of the court sat the advocates and notaries. The main building was divided by two rows of columns into three aisles. These columns supported an arcade carrying a wall containing latticed windows, forming a clear-story, the side aisles being lower. A better arrangement could not have been devised for a Christian church, and it is the form, with slight modifications, that is in use to this day throughout Western Christendom. However well adapted these heathen basilicæ were to the exigencies of Christian worship, they did not continue long in use. There is only one example remaining to us of a heathen basilica converted to a Christian church. A veneration for the graves of the martyrs and a distaste for edifices constructed for pagan uses caused, under Christian rule, the demolition of these ancient structures and their re-erection in other places made sacred by containing the remains of the martyrs. Here they were built again on much the same plan and on a yet grander scale. The martyrs were usually put to death outside the city walls, and were supposed to be buried on the spot of their execution, so that when the churches came to be erected on these spots they were very inconvenient of access, being so far from the centre of population.

A custom had grown up of worshipping underground in the catacombs among the graves of the martyrs, and this custom undoubtedly was the reason, when Christianity became legalized by Constantine, of the churches being set up in the same places, as instanced in Rome by Santa Agnese and San Lorenzo, and also at St. Peter's, which Constantine had placed near to the Circus of Nero, and whose altar was set over the remains of the Apostles. This custom of placing the churches without the city walls caused great inconvenience and was a matter of much moment in later times, when the incursions of northern barbarians prevented an attendance upon the churches and finally caused their desecration, and, in many instances, entire demolition.

The Basilica of St. Peter, however, contained certain additions and variations from the civil basilica. (Fig. 2.) It consisted of a five-aisled church, extending east and west. At the end of the five aisles was an aisle running north and south; east of this came the apse, giving the plan the form of a cross. There were forty-eight columns of precious marbles inclosing the large aisle, and the lateral aisles contained forty-eight columns likewise. There were an hundred other columns surrounding the various chapels and shrines. The walls were covered with paintings of religious subjects. The flat wooden ceiling was covered with gilt metal and Corinthian brass taken from the temples of Romulus and Jupiter Capitolinus. In this magnificent structure was one candelabrum that alone contained 1360 lights. Beside this there were more than a thousand other lights. All this magnificence in less than three centuries after the death of CHRIST! This structure withstood the varied fortunes of Rome for twelve hundred years, being respected by all its invaders, finally falling away with age. On its site rose another basilica, grander and more beautiful still, that glory of modern times. When the seat of the Roman Empire was removed to Byzantium, Constantine set about erecting a grand church there, probably modeled on St. Peter's. This did not last long. Another was built on its site and partially destroyed, rebuilt and destroyed again, meeting with many disasters in the mean time. Finally, the most famous architects were called from all parts of the known world by Justinian, and the erection began of the great Church of St. Sophia. This church, unlike those of Rome, formed a Greek cross in plan, each arm being alike, while the Western churches had a Latin cross for a plan. At the intersection of the arms of the cross rose a great dome of peculiar construction. During the revival of learning, communication was established between Greece and Italy, and this last and most magnificent basilica of the Eastern Empire greatly influenced the form and architecture of the new buildings. The Church of St. Mark, at Venice, of the tenth century, was copied in many particulars from St. Sophia, and this influence extended throughout Italy. The modern Church of St. Peter at Rome owes much to this importation of the dome from the East. As did the ancient Basilica of St. Peter's furnish the form for the ancient St. Sophia, so did the later St. Sophia supply much that influenced the modern St. Peter's.

Some writers have held that Constantine removed his seat of empire from Rome to the East to have more freedom in the establishment of his new religion, to throw off all the trammels of an earlier paganism, to start anew and fresh. One of his first objects, of course, was the erection of churches, and having no example anywhere about, the architects were left to their own resources. They undoubtedly drew some from Rome,—the idea of the round arch, maybe, and a partial use of the basilica plan. The Eastern architecture developed from these efforts, however, is a distinct style of its own and essentially a Christian architecture, notwithstanding its early Roman influence. It grew out of the exigencies of the time, having no contact with the earlier pagan styles, and spread over the entire Eastern Empire. This is the style generally known as Byzantine. Its plan is usually the shape of a Greek cross, the eastern end terminating in a semicircular apse: a plan that might be effectually used in the present day, and of which more will be said farther on.

Many say that this work at Byzantium was but a debasement of the Romanesque, itself debased from the Roman and the classics.

It may have been so; allow it so, and yet still we have much to admire; perhaps more in the utilities, than in the beauties, of this style, a style which spread throughout the East, and in the fifth and sixth centuries even to North Italy, where, at Ravenna, are several types. These, and the much later examples at Venice, made mention of above, are the purest types of the style in the West. The Lombards, however, were greatly influenced in their building by Byzantium; and through the trade with the East this style crept into France, where a whole line of unmistakably Byzantine churches stretch across the southwestern corner of the country. Its correlative, the Romanesque, abounds throughout Southern and Central France, running into Normandy and England, where it is represented by what is called the Norman style.

Both the Romanesque and Byzantine are distinguishable by the round arch, the latter also by the dome. To show the potency of the influence of the dome, essentially a Byzantine production, we have only to be reminded of the name given to the cathedral, even to our day, in many European countries. In Germany we have the Dom, in Italy the Duomo, and, although now the terms are indiscriminately applied to the principal church of a city, they came from the habit of this church being domical. Running from Italy north, and down through the Rhine towns, is a line of round-arched domical churches, evidently owing their inspiration to the East, where the Byzantine maintained its sway until the supremacy of the Ottomans summarily checked its farther spread.

The other essentially Christian style is that now usually denominated Gothic. It may be said to have sprung up simultaneously throughout Europe, while it is certain that no one nation can claim any priority of introduction. Its main characteristic, as now generally understood, is the pointed arch, although many writers have held that the term Gothic included all styles in use after the debasement of the classics and the decline of Roman architecture, including the Lombardic, Romanesque, Byzantine, and Norman.

But the word has now, generally, come to be confined to the pointed arch of the Middle Ages, and in general use throughout Christendom. To be sure, there is the Saracenic, also pointed, but this style is easily distinguished from the Gothic. There are many theories as to the origin of the pointed arch, yet, the divergence of opinion being so great, scarcely any two writers agreeing on any one theory, it will be sufficient here to instance a few of the theories put forth, and a favorite one is that of the form presented by the overhanging boughs of an avenue of trees. Then we have interlaced wicker-work, and the bending of two twigs or wands to meet at the top. Still more plausible is that of the intersected groin of the ceilings of early churches, which formed a pointed arch, while the round arch was observable elsewhere throughout the structure. It is certain, also, that the ancients knew of this shape, as is seen in some of their underground passages and tombs, yet they had not arrived at the correct method of construction of the arch. Although some of these theories might account for the origin and growth of the pointed arch in a certain locality, yet they could not be held to favor its general and rapid introduction into so many countries at once. Simultaneously, on the return, in the twelfth century, of the Crusaders from the East, this style began to appear, buildings springing up rapidly in all directions. This fact of its springing up at such a time, and so rapidly, has led to the theory of its derivation from the pointed Saracenic arch, and some prejudiced writers have, in their efforts to prevent its use, called it the Saracenic style. Allowing the fact of the adoption of the pointed arch of the East, how are we to account for the wide divergence in the styles? for, although the pointed arch is a principal characteristic of the Gothic, it is not the only one. There are the great idea of verticality; the clustered columns, with their light and slender shafts; the lofty spires and towers; the tracery; the mullions; the cross vaulting.

Fortunately for this Saracenic theory, it has the advantage of chronological correctness, while the simultaneity of the growth of Gothic is the main objection to the adoption of the other theories. Some derive the use of tracery from the perforated fret-work of the Arabians.

The origin of the term Gothic lies shrouded in as much mystery as the source of the style. That the Goths had nothing to do with the introduction of the style which bears their name is now generally accepted, and the use of this pagan name to designate an essentially Christian architecture has annoyed and puzzled many. Other names have been suggested, such as Christian, Pointed, English; but all of them are objectionable and misleading. The Byzantine and Lombardic are as much outgrowths of Christianity as the Gothic, while there are other pointed styles. As for the last term, surely England cannot lay claim to the architecture of the Christian world.

Many writers used the name Gothic as one of reproach, meaning thereby to stigmatize the style as barbarous, outlandish, and uncivilized. The style had its growth in, and belongs essentially to, those countries that had been overrun and inhabited by the Goths, and for this reason, perhaps, it is as appropriate as any.

The Gothic with which we in America have had most to do is that known as English, and this is divided into three distinct periods, with transitions from one period to another, where the character of the work is of necessity more or less mixed. These three periods are designated Early English, Decorated, and Perpendicular. This is confining the definition of the term Gothic to Pointed Gothic. Saxon and Norman are often counted in as being Gothic, although round-arched. The arch of the Early English is quite sharp, the openings being narrow and high, a complete subversion of the preceding low round-arched Norman, while the character of the work was simpler than in the succeeding styles, the wall-spaces greater, and there was little carving or decoration. The decorated work is characterized by a somewhat flatter arch and wider openings, profuse carvings and ornamentations, and, in short, is the style in which Gothic reached its height of grandeur and magnificence. The Perpendicular has quite flat-headed openings, very broad, with many divisions by vertical bars, called mullions. In this style the windows often are larger than the surrounding wall-space. It represents the decline of Gothic architecture, and is characterized by all kinds of depravities, while much of it is very beautiful.

Most of the prominent cathedrals and churches contain examples of all the different styles, from the Norman of William the Conqueror down. Sometimes one part is Norman, another Early English, and so on. Again, one sees the division of styles in the different stories, the lower arcade being Norman, the blind-story Early English, and the clear-story decorated, thus showing when the different parts were built or rebuilt. It is not within the province of this article to say which is the proper style for to-day, each having its own merits. Nothing, however, can be more beautiful than an English parish church built in the true spirit of Gothic work. And this English parish church is where ordinarily we should look for our model; not but what this nation and age may be capable of developing a style of church architecture of its own, without reverting to the Middle Ages for enlightenment, yet it has so far been unable to do so. Not only the church architecture, but the whole architecture of this country has been but a continuous series of tentative experiments in the endeavor to create an American style. Each architect and church committee has started out on his or its own independent line, sometimes copying, in so far as their knowledge or ignorance allowed, the architecture of an earlier age, sometimes reaching out in a blind, groping, pitiable way for that which they were unable to reach, yet thought they had consummated.

Seemingly the more intelligent solution of the problem would be to adapt our churches to the wants and needs of the people, keeping in mind the variations of climate and temperature, not letting the utilitarianism of the age run away with us. Employing the best talent, using the best materials, and building in the most substantial, churchly, and beautiful manner. With the thousands of churches built in this country since its foundation, there stands in the city of New York, at the head of Wall Street, a church erected a half-century ago, that, to this day, is the best example of a thoroughly-appointed, well-adapted, and beautiful parish church that we have. However conventional it may be, however unoriginal, however faulty in detail, designed as it was by a man who, when he first came to this country from England, worked at a carpenter's bench, it yet stands to remind us of the beauties of an English parish church, and of the folly of striving for something new when one simple edifice can show us more of beauty and of use in its little conventions than all the scores and hundreds and thousands of other churches strewn over our land, and devoted to the worship of God. The main idea of this age is to get a large, ugly, ungainly assembly-room that might be used for a barn, skating-rink, or railway-station, with as much or more purpose than that for which it is built, erected in a spirit and form unknown in any age or country but this, without even the merit of beauty or originality, an unintelligent, illiterate attempt at an adaptation of a style once the glory of the Christian world, a style yet capable of as perfect and beautiful an interpretation and exposition as was ever given it in the summit of its power. And yet they call this style Gothic! Better that architecture had been relegated to the master-workman of the Middle Age ere it became thus debased. One may travel from one end of this great land to the other, from ocean to ocean, from gulf to gulf, and see scarce a beggarly dozen of churches worthy of the name, either as to appropriateness of plan, beauty of structure, or simplicity or monumental grandeur. For not only should a church be arranged for the economies and decencies of public worship, but it should be for a monument, standing through all time to the glory of the Triune God. Built as of old, by loving and masterly hands, of the best of the earth, not cheaply nor niggardly, but, where poverty will allow no more, simply and substantially, then grandly, magnificently, and gloriously it must keep in mind the character of the cause it is to serve, the name it is to commemorate, the God it is to glorify. Then will we have a structure worthy its holy name, not crumbling to dust, but serving its purpose through generation and generation, through the ages and centuries, as have the churches of old, and that, with the care of dutiful hands, may stand for all time.

Who can see the work of the ancients and say that they built not well nor strongly? It is only work done in the times of the debasement of the arts and sciences that crumbled and fell away. The simplest form of the parish church in England consisted of a nave and chancel, both long and narrow. When an enlargement was needed an aisle was added, first on one side and then on the other. Sometimes, to obtain more room, resort was had to transepts, but these, as a rule, were confined to cathedrals. The form of plan thus obtained was that of a Latin cross. Occasionally the aisles were extended along the sides of the chancel. The churches almost invariably faced the east, as did those of the early times. The tower was placed in various positions, at the west end; in the centre, at junction of nave and transepts; on the south side, in which case it was usually near the west end; and, in short, in any place that seemed best adapted or, in the opinion of the architect, most becoming. There was usually a porch on the south side, near the west end. Entrances were had also at other places, as when the tower was at the west end, an entrance was given through it. Then there was the priest's door in one side of the chancel, opposite to the vestry. The vestry was usually on the north side of the chancel, and was the only place in the church in which a chimney was permissible. Just inside the main door of the church was placed the font, the most conspicuous object on entering, sometimes almost blocking the way, an all-time reminder that the only entrance to CHRIST'S Church was through baptism. It was invariably large enough for immersion of infants, and of a dignified and substantial character, not reminding one, as do some of the fonts often seen in our churches, of the vases of a flower-garden. Running up through the church was one wide, central alley or passage, with open benches on each side, while near the walls, on either side, were other alleys, giving easy access to the benches. At the head of the central alley, at the chancel steps, was the desk or stool for saying the Litany at; while the pulpit was placed at one side, either at the north or south. The chancel was raised several steps, and divided from the nave often by a screen, called the rood-screen, from its being directly under the rood-beam and holy-rood placed thereon. This rood-beam was a heavy piece of timber extending across the chancel, on which was placed a cross or crucifix, with figures of St. John and the Virgin on either side. Sometimes a stone or wooden gallery extended across the chancel to carry the rood, and was called a rood-loft. Just within the chancel were the seats or stalls for the clergy and singers. These stalls ran north and south, facing each other, and were equally divided on the two sides. The end stalls, at the west, were returned and faced the altar. Here the service was said or sung, and here the lectern stood, on which was placed the Bible. A wide passage extended between the stalls leading to the sanctuary or sacra-rium. This was raised again, above the chancel, by one or more steps, and separated from it by a rail. Within this rail, and usually against the east wall, was placed the altar, which was raised on at least three steps; in a very large church the number was increased, that the altar might not be obscured. The top step, called the foot-pace, was wider than the others, in order that the priest might the better stand to celebrate the Eucharist. The altar was usually of stone, the top slab of which was incised with five crosses, one in the middle and one at each end, emblematic of the five wounds of CHRIST. Back of the altar, or on it, and raised slightly above it, was a shelf, called the retable, on which were placed the cross and candle-sticks.

The east end of the churches was usually square, although occasionally polygonal or round; the apsidal form, however, being confined principally to the Continent. If this apse form was used the altar was not placed against the east wall, as then it lost its dignity, but was set forward, usually to the chord of the apse, where it was often left exposed on all four sides, with a canopy over it, or was placed against an elaborate stone screen called the reredos. Even when it came against the wall it usually had this screen back of it. Within the chancel-rail on one side, generally the south, were placed seats for the clergy, generally three, called sedilia. Sometimes on the same side, sometimes on the other, was set the credence, a recessed shelf in the wall to contain the unconsecrated bread and wine. Here was often placed the piscina, in which the priest washed his hands before the celebration. With the exception of the latter, the above arrangement is that now used and generally accepted throughout the Anglican and American churches; the universality of the adoption and use depending much upon the knowledge of the clergy or laity having in charge the erection of churches, often upon their individual ideas as to the utility or importance of such customs, and sometimes, perhaps frequently, upon a curious prejudice as to the superstitions liable to be engendered by their use, and this because they were or are used and observed by that branch of the Church under the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Rome. The enlightenment of this age is a sufficient guard against the introduction of the superstitions of a period five centuries past. The Church decrees that everything be done decently and in order, and in pursuance of this the house of worship should be arranged decently and orderly.

In the erection of a church the plan, perhaps, is the first thing to consider. The simplest and best form for a small church is that of nave and chancel, both as narrow and long as may be consistent with economy of space and practicability of hearing and seating. The narrower and higher the church the better the effect, both architecturally and ecclesiastically. In the simplest and smallest churches the nave and chancel may be under one roof, and even of the same width, the division being marked by an arch or screen of open-work. Often in the country a very small church only is needed; this may have low, rough stone walls, and be built on the line of picturesqueness of effect, rather than that of grandeur and sublimity. The outline of all country churches had better be studied on this line of picturesqueness.

Next to the simple form of nave and chancel comes the church with the side aisles; these separated from the nave by a row of columns on either side. These columns or piers should be of brick or stone, and carry an arcaded masonry wall called the clear-story wall. This wall should extend higher than the outer, or aisle walls, and be pierced with windows to light the nave. Much objection is made in this country to having side aisles, since the columns obstruct a clear view of the chancel. This may be obviated by making the aisles narrow, or by a judicious distribution of the seating, so that there need be no trouble on this score. Another method of enlarging the church is by transepts; this, however, should be resorted to only in large churches, as the form really belongs to the cathedral. Deep transepts are very objectionable, as they throw the people off to one side, often entirely out of view of the chancel. The better way to do if transepts are needed is to adopt the Byzantine plan of a Greek cross. Here the nave and transepts may be made wide, and the chancel large, and not so deep as by the English plan. In this way the entire congregation is thrown nearer together and nearer the chancel. But never use the Greek plan without its inseparable great round arch and Byzantine detail. For nothing looks more incongruous than to see Gothic, which is essentially an architecture of height and vertical lines, used where the main character of the work must of necessity be low and broad, and the lines more or less horizontal, often on account of the lack of sufficient funds to make the building of the necessary height. For the effect of all ecclesiastical architecture is increased by great verticality. Byzantine or Romanesque may be made as lofty as you like, but if a broad church is needed, the round arch is much easier adapted than the pointed.

Materials.—The materials of the edifice should be either brick or stone, or both. Avoid the use of wood as much as possible, except for temporary structures, or perhaps for small mission chapels on the frontier. Even then a more substantial material should be used if obtainable. Very pretty and inexpensive churches may be erected out of the round boulders of the fields, such as our ancestors in some of the more sterile and rocky parts of the country gathered into stone walls to fence their lands. The walls should always show the rock face, and be usually what is called rubble-work, laid in mortar, and showing as rough and massy a face as possible. The window-openings may be of the same stone, squared and dressed, or of a better stone wrought and moulded. Buttresses should be placed about the walls wherever necessary, but no particular regularity should be observed in their distribution. If the funds will afford it, build a tower, or tower and spire. If not, let your money be expended in making what you do attempt substantial and lasting. If it is desirable or necessary to use wood, a very pretty effect may be got, with an idea of solidity, by using rubble-stone for the foundations, which may be extended up to the line of the window-sills, the structure above being of wood. Instead, however, of battenning or clapboarding the wooden part, it may be covered with shingles, which should be stained, not painted, thus showing the natural grain of the wood. The inside, even, may be treated in this way with wonderful effect. Always have everything simple and real, not tawdry, sham, or finical. It will be found, no matter what the climate, that if the church is built of masonry with thick walls, the temperature will be much more even, and more easily kept so, than if the building is of wood. In the South it will be found necessary to have the windows large, and to extend them nearly to the floor for air and ventilation.

A good way, perhaps, to go about the erection of a church is to build a little at a time, as the early builders did; say the chancel first, which may be used as a chapel; then the nave; then the tower; and if an enlargement is needed, aisles may be added. Never try to put up a large church with insufficient funds.

Red or yellow bricks, either pressed or common, may be used, and in city churches of a simple character, especially those for mission purposes, brick may seem the more appropriate material. Most of the new churches throughout London are of brick, and very beautiful they are, too. Many new churches in the east of London are usually of red brick in a very severe round-arched style. What strikes an observer mostly in these churches is their simplicity, appropriateness, and solidity. They are invariably lined on the inside with bricks, and often have vaulted ceilings of the same. They consist of nave and chancel, with usually two, sometimes four, side aisles. By the side of the chancel is a morning chapel, in which is held the week-day or early morning service, at which few people are likely to be present. The church is usually seated with chairs, sometimes with open benches, pews never, and floored with tiles, which are sometimes of clay, encaustic, or even wood. This last material has the advantage of not being cold and damp.

As consonant with the simple, lasting monumental character of your church, always have the material of the interior, as well as the exterior, of the walls substantial, either brick or stone, never plaster. For this latter is liable to drop off in time, or to get spotted with water, or frozen, and has, withal, a very unsubstantial look for a church, while to plaster you must put flooring strips and laths on the walls, thus making the fire risk much greater. If you want to plaster the ceilings to obtain an evenness of temperature, endeavor to have them ceiled over afterwards in wood, or paneled. It is pleasing to see the idea of the monumental character of a church gaining ground in this country, especially in the East, where many, if not the most, of the churches erected in the last few years, in the larger towns at least, have their interior walls of a substantial material, usually brick.

Furniture.—The altar and font, perhaps the pulpit, should be of stone, and the lectern of brass, while the other furniture is of wood, always substantial, and designed in keeping with the church. The most of the furniture obtained at the ecclesiastical furnishers', so called, is but a mongrel Gothic, clumsy and poorly designed. The brass-work is sometimes better. It is more desirable, however, where the funds will allow, to have the furniture, including brass-work, designed and made to order. Your architect will advise you, and if he is an able one,—you should have none other,—let him design, or oversee the designing of, everything that is connected with the church, even to the stained-glass windows and the gas-fixtures, and attend to the selection of carpets, rugs, etc. He will not usually undertake the designing of stained-glass work, unless of a simple character, but will advise you where to look, or will obtain designs for you.

There has been of late years some excellent stained-glass work done in this country. It is mostly, however, of a different character from the ancient stained glass, and consequently from that produced by the best makers in London and Munich of to-day. In small churches that cannot afford figure-work, a very pleasing effect can be got by using cathedral glass, and at a very small expense. It is not advisable to have a window in the east end over the altar, precedent to the contrary notwithstanding, for unless it is made very dark indeed, it is sure to throw an unpleasant glare in the faces of the congregation, and to obscure almost entirely the altar and things about it. The better way is to place a window on one side only, which may be made as large as needed, thus obtaining a sufficiency of light without the confusion resulting from the multifarious rays of conflicting lights. Then it is not well to have too much light in a church,—a glare is exceedingly unpleasant and confusing to many worshippers. Almost as bad is the lack of light found in some churches. This latter fact is not always owing to small or insufficient windows, but often to the fact of the church being so wide that the light from the low windows will not strike across. This can be obviated by building the church with a nave and aisles, and getting most of the light from the clear-story windows. The clear-story may be as high as you like, the higher the better. Windows in the west end are permissible, but they should not be too bright or large, else the clergy will experience the same annoyance that an east window causes the congregation.

The altar should be of stone and a fixture in the church, resting on a stone foundation. It should be of the form of a tomb, at least six feet long, and be two and a half feet wide and three feet and three inches high. It should be placed against the east wall in a square chancel, while in an apsidal one it should be set forward, even to the chord, if the room can be afforded. It should always be raised on at least three steps,—three will answer for all ordinary purposes,—the top one being wider than the other. The sanctuary-rail should be of brass if possible; if not, a round wooden rail is sufficient, set on simple standards of metal as open as possible. A rail is not at all necessary, except to keep out the multitude. A cord will answer for the gate, unless a metal rail is used, when a smaller metal pipe may be made to slide into the other. This is better than a cumbersome gate that is continually getting out of order. Near the altar should be a credence to hold the elements before the service, and against the south wall should be two or three, usually three, seats, or sedilia, for the clergy. The chancel should contain the stalls or benches for the clergy and choir, consisting of two or three long benches on each side, running longitudinally; the front ones being low for the choir and the back ones high for the clergy. The organist also should sit here with his key-board, and face the same way as the choir, the organ being placed in a recess or gallery on either side, or at the west end. On a line between the nave and chancel should be placed the lectern, which ought to be of brass and in the shape of an eagle. A simple wooden lectern is often used in small churches; a very neat one may be made of metal to fold up, and have a canvas or cloth book-rest. The pulpit may be placed on the north or south side of the church, and be of wood or stone. The lectern must be on the opposite side from the pulpit. The pulpit should be in the nave, and as near the people as possible, even among them. The prayer should never be said or sung at the lectern, as is sometimes done, but in the stalls, or at a prayer-desk, and facing north or south, not west. At the head of the main alley or passage may be a small desk at which to say the Litany. Often dividing the chancel from the nave is an open screen of wood or metal called the rood-screen. St. Stephen's, Providence, has a very fine new wooden one; while the Church of the Advent, Boston, has an iron one of considerable height, and St. Stephen's, Lynn, Mass., is, I believe, to have one of brass.

If the church is a free or mission church in a town, it is better to seat with chairs, otherwise plain open benches may be used. They should be two feet and ten inches apart from back to back, while they are often made three feet, and even more, as at Trinity Church, Boston. Twenty inches in width may be allowed for each person. The main alley can be from four to six feet wide, and the side ones three to four feet. The font should be of stone and placed near the main entrance. It must be on a solid foundation, and be large enough for immersion. It ought to be raised on two or three steps, so that the clergyman may be seen while administering the rite of baptism. Whether the floor is of wood or not, it is better to have a line of matting down the alleys than to carpet the whole church, while rugs and mats may be used for the pews. This last, however, is more a matter of convenience and comfort, and is often determined by the climate and by the methods of heating used.

Sunday-School Chapels.—A Sunday-school chapel is often attached to a church, and it is always better to have it so; a separate building being far more preferable than to use the basement of the main structure.

Heating and Ventilation.—Great care should be taken in the matter of heating and ventilation, especially in the North, where it is very seldom that the temperature of a church in winter is at all satisfactory. Heat-sion of clergy to come out from the church to meet them. This sheltered gate was thence called lich-gate or corpse-gate. This custom might be revived, the gate serving as a shelter from the weather at all times, besides being a picturesque ornament to the church-yard.

GLOSSARY.

ABACUS. The upper part of the capital of a column or pier.

ABBAY. A term for a collection of conventual buildings, consisting of a church and other structures, presided over by an abbot or abbess.

ABUTMENT. The solid part of a wall or pier from which an arch springs or abuts.

AISLE. The wings at the sides of a church, separated from the nave by columns or piers, and roofed lower than the main body of the church. It is an architectural division of the structure, and not a passage or alley between the pews, as often used.

ALMERY. A recess in the wall near the altar used to contain the sacred vessels.

ALMONRY, or AUMERY. A room where alms were distributed to the poor.

ALTAR. An elevated tomb-like structure for the celebration of the Eucharist, placed at the eastern end of the church, made at first of wood, but the Council of Epone, in France (509 A.D.), commanded that altars be made of stone.

ALURE. An alley or passage in a wall, as in the clear-story of a church.

AMBO. A kind of pulpit in the early church, originally a reading-desk.

AMBULATORY. A passage to walk in, such as cloisters.

ANTE-CHAPEL. A small chapel, forming the entrance to another.

APSE. The semicircular or polygonal termination to the chancel or aisles of a church, very little used in England, but common on the Continent.

ARCADE. A row or range of arches supported on piers or columns, either against a wall or detached.

ARCH. A construction of masonry spanning an opening, and so constructed that the stones or bricks by mutual pressure will support each other. The lower part is called the springing, the sides the haunches, and the top the crown. (Fig. 3.)

ASHLAR. Squared stones used for the facing of walls. The ashlar-line is that of the face of the building.

BALDACHINO. A canopy, supported on shafts, standing over the altar.

BAPTISTERY. A separate building or an addition to the church to contain the font for the rite of baptism.

BASE. The moulded lower part of a column or shaft.

BASILICA. A building used by the Greeks and Romans for public purposes, as for a justice-hall, hall of exchange, etc.

ing by furnaces is probably the most desirable way. The whole basement may be made a hot-air chamber, letting the air up in a multitude of places under the pews. In this way, by a judicious arrangement of the openings for the fresh warm air and of outlets for the foul air, a reasonably perfect system may be obtained. It is difficult to put forth any one system for all cases. Each problem should be worked out for itself and to meet the exigencies of the occasion.

Lich-Gates.—A pleasant sight about churches, especially in the country, is the well-kept church-yard,—the God's acre,—where lie all the dead of the parish. At the entrance to this church-yard it was a goodly custom to erect a shelter over the gate-way, under which the mourners might stop and rest the corpse while waiting for the proces-

- BAY. The compartment of an arcade, or space or division between any two columns or piers.
- BELFRY. Usually applied to the ringing-loft of a church. Properly, a detached campanile containing bells.
- BELL-GABLE, BELL-COT. A gable or cot in small churches and chapels that have no tower, to contain one or more bells, usually placed at the west end. When placed over the chancel arch it is called sanctus bell-cot.
- BLIND-STORY, or TRIPORIUM. A term applied to the space between the lower arcade of the wall and the clear-story.
- BUTTRESS. A pier of masonry projecting from a wall and used to strengthen it.
- CANOPY. An ornamental projection or covering over niches, doors, windows, seats, and altars.
- CAP, or CAPITAL. The upper part of a column, pier, or pilaster; usually elaborately carved.
- CATHEDRAL. The principal church of a diocese, where the Bishop has his seat. (Fig. 4.)

FIG. 4.

Saxon Cathedral, Canterbury, 950 A.D.

- CHALICE. The cup used for the wine at the celebration of the Eucharist, at first made of wood and glass, then of gold and silver.
- CHANCEL. The eastern end of a church, where the clergy and the choir are placed, and where the services are performed.
- CHANTRY. A small chapel built out from a church, and often containing the tomb of the founder.
- CHAPEL. A small building used in place of a church in a large parish; a building attached to a church or forming part of an institution, and used for the services of the church.
- CHAPTER-HOUSE. The place of assembly for the chapter, or deans and canons, of a cathedral. The rooms are of various shapes, usually polygonal.
- CHOIR. That part of a cathedral where the choir sits and where the service is sung. In a parish church this place is called the chancel, the term choir being confined to cathedrals; it was separated from the rest of the church by a screen.
- CLEAR-STORY, or CLERE-STORY. An upper story or row of windows in a church above the blind-story. It is in the wall separating nave and aisle, which is usually called the clear-story wall.

- CLOISTER. A covered ambulatory or walk about a quadrangle in a collegiate or monastic structure.
- COLUMN. A vertical cylindrical shaft used to support a superincumbent weight. A clustered column is a collection of small slender shafts banded together.
- COPING. The top or covering course of a wall, usually of stone, and weathered to throw off the rain-water.
- CORBEL. A projecting stone or piece of timber jutting out from a wall and used as a support.
- CRESCENCE. A small table or recess in the wall near the altar, on which the bread and wine were placed before they were consecrated.
- CROSS. The symbol of the Christian religion. The Greek cross has each of its arms alike, while the Latin has the lower arm longer than the others; this latter is the usual form of cross seen.
- CRYPT. A vaulted apartment under a church or other building. In a church it is generally under the chancel.
- CUSP. The point of meeting of the foliations of tracery as in a trefoil, where the three projecting points of meeting of the foils are called cusp.
- DIAPER-WORK. A form of decorating of flat surfaces, such as walls, panels, etc., with a geometrical pattern, consisting of squares, lozenges, or other forms, filled with a flower or rosette design. The name is derived from a kind of cloth worked in similar patterns made at Ypres, Belgium, hence the name, Drap D'Ypres.
- DOVE. A cupola or inverted cup on the top of a building. The term is derived from the name given the Italian cathedral, "Il duomo," which usually had a dome.
- DORSAL, or DOSSEL. The hangings behind the altar.
- FALDSTOOL, or FOLDING-STOOL. A seat made to fold up like a camp-chair, and of wood or metal, carried about by a Bishop when away from his own church, a term erroneously applied to the Litany stool.
- FINIAL. The ornament in which a spire, gable, pinnacle, or canopy terminates, consisting generally in a flower or bunch of flowers.
- FLËCHE. The small spire over the intersection of nave and transepts containing the sanctus bell.
- FONT. The vessel used in the rite of baptism. It should be of stone, and of sufficient size to allow a child to be immersed.
- FRITHSTOOL, or FREEDSTOOL. A seat placed near the altar, the last refuge for those who claimed the privilege of sanctuary. The seat of peace.
- FRONTAL. The hanging of the front of the altar.
- GABLE. The triangular-shaped upper part of a wall formed by the termination of a roof against it.
- GALILEE. A chapel or porch at the western entrance to a church. Sometimes a part of the west end of the church, separated from the rest, and not considered so sacred as the rest of the edifice. Used chiefly for penitents not yet admitted to the body of the church.
- GARGOYLE. An ornamental termination to a gutter or water-spout used to carry the water clear of the building. It is usually a grotesque, and supposed to be named from the gurgling sound made by the water passing through it.
- GRILLE. The ornamental iron-work screen inclosing a chapel, tomb, or an opening, such as a window.

- GROIN. The style of vaulting formed by the intersection of two vaults; a ceiling of this form is called a groined ceiling.
- GROTESQUES. The light and fanciful ornaments used by the ancients; also gargoyles, corbels, and other ornaments carved in curious and grotesque forms are often thus called.
- HAMMER-BEAM. A horizontal timber resting on the top of the wall and projecting into the church, forming part of a truss, and often carved; hence the name hammer-beam truss.
- JAMB. The sides of a door or window-opening.
- JOINTS. The interstices between the stones or bricks in masonry are called joints.
- LADY-CHAPEL. A chapel placed to the eastward of the altar in large churches and dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, called Our Lady.
- LANCET. A long, narrow window or opening with a narrow, pointed arch.
- LANTERN. A term given to the light construction forming the top of a tower or dome, usually of a polygonal form; occasionally it is placed on a roof, and is used for purposes of light and air.
- LECTERN. A movable desk of wood or metal used to hold the Bible, often made of brass in the form of an eagle, the Bible resting on the back of the eagle.
- LICH-GATE. A covered gate-way at the entrance to a church-yard or cemetery, where the mourners rested the corpse while waiting for the clergy.
- LOUVRE. An open structure on a roof, usually for ventilation, and consisting of a small lantern or cupola, the openings filled with slats or louvre boards.
- MINSTER. A large church attached to an ecclesiastical establishment. If the fraternity be presided over by a Bishop it is called a Cathedral; if by an abbot, an Abbey; if by a prior, a Priory.
- MISERERE. A projection on the under side of seats in the stalls of large churches. These seats were made to turn up during the long services, which were performed standing, and the misereres were projected enough to form a partial seat. They were elaborately carved in various grotesque forms.
- MONASTERY. A group of buildings used for the habitation of an order of monks.
- MOSAIC-WORK. Flat ornamental work formed by inlaying small pieces of stone, glass, enamel, or marble of various colors. Floors, walls, and ceilings are done in this manner.
- MULLION. A vertical division of a window into two or more parts.
- NARTHEX. The porch forming the entrance to the early Christian basilica.
- NAVE. The main body or division of a church, so called from its fancied resemblance to a ship. On either side are the aisles, and at the east end is the chancel.
- ORATORY. A small room or chapel attached usually to a private house and for individual or family devotions.
- PAGE, or FOOT-PAGE. A broad step in front of the altar.
- PATEN. A small plate or salver used in the celebration of the Eucharist; it was formed to fit the chalice as a cover.
- PIER. That portion of a wall between windows or other openings, or a massive erection standing alone and used to support arches, etc.
- PILLARS. The round or polygonal piers or columns that support the main arches of a building.
- PINNACLE. A small turret or tall ornament, tapering to the top and usually elaborately carved, forming terminations to buttresses, corners, etc.
- PISCINA. A small basin, either recessed in the wall, near the altar, or projecting from it, and used to carry off the water used in ablutions before the mass.
- POPPY-HEADS. The finials, or ornaments, at the top of bench or stall ends.
- PORCH. A covered shelter at the entrance to the church. Sometimes the lower story of the tower forms the porch. It is usually placed on the south side near the west end.
- PULPIT. An elevated platform or desk from which sermons are preached. Sometimes of stone, but usually of wood, and polygonal or round in shape: placed at either the north or south side of nave near entrance to chancel.
- REFECTORY. The dining-hall of a monastery or convent. It contained a desk or pulpit, from which one of the members read to the others during meals.
- RELIQUARY. A small box, chest, or casket to contain relics.
- REREDOS. The screen or other ornamental work at the back of the altar, either against the wall or detached.
- RETABLE. A raised shelf at the back of the altar, on which are placed the cross, vases, and candlesticks.
- RIDGE. The apex of the roof running the length of the building.
- ROOF. The crucifix placed in the rood-loft, with figures of the Virgin Mary and St. John on either side.
- ROOD-BEAM, or ROOD-LOFT. A heavy beam or gallery extending across the chancel at the junction with the nave, on which was placed the rood; underneath was often placed a screen or low wall, called rood-screen or rood-wall. These screens are made quite light and open.
- ROOD-TOWER, ROOD STEEPLE. A name sometimes given to the great tower at the intersection of nave and transepts.
- ROSE-WINDOW. A name given to a window of circular form filled with tracery; if the tracery is in the form of spokes it is called a wheel-window.
- SACRARIUM. The inclosed space about the altar.
- SACRISTY. A room attached to a church in which the priests robed, and in which the sacred vessels, vestments, etc., were kept.
- SANCTUARY. The eastern end of the chancel, in which the altar is placed; called also sacarium.
- SANCTUS BELL-COT. A small gable or other structure on the roof, to contain a small bell called the sanctus-bell, which was used during various parts of the service, especially at the words "sanctus, sanctus, sanctus;" placed usually over the chancel arch; sometimes it is in a small spire called a flèche.
- SEDILIA. Three seats placed near the altar, and against or recessed in one of the walls; used during parts of the service by the priest and his attendants, the deacon and subdeacon.
- SEPULCHRE, THE EASTER. A recess, generally in the north wall of a Roman church, to contain the cross from Good-Friday to Easter.
- SHAFTS. Slender columns, either standing alone or attached to walls, buttresses, etc.
- SHRINE. A chest or box to contain relics; sometimes in the form of a church; often they were covered with jewels.
- SILL, CILL. The horizontal stone forming the bottom of window-openings. In a wooden - building the first timber put on the foundations and extending around the building.

- SOFFIT. A ceiling; a term used only to designate subordinate parts and members of a building, as the ceiling or soffit, or an arch, doorway, stairway, cornice, etc.
- SPAN. The width of an arch between the walls; also the width of a roof.
- SPIRE. A sharply-pointed termination given to towers, and rising to a great height, forming the roof to the tower; usually built of masonry in the best work, sometimes of wood, and covered with shingles, tiles, or slates.
- STALL. A fixed seat, partially inclosed, for the use of clergy and choir. The stalls are situated in the chancel or choir.
- STANDARD. The term applied to the upright ends of stalls or benches.
- STEEPLE. A general term used to include the whole structure of tower, belfry, and spire.
- STOUP. A small vessel placed at the entrance to a Roman church to contain holy water.
- SUPER ALTAR. A small portable stone altar.
- TABERNACLE. A small cell or niche in which some holy or precious thing is placed; applied to the receptacle over the altar where the pix is placed; also a niche where an image may be placed.
- TESSELLATED PAVEMENT. A pavement formed of small cubes of stone, marble, pottery, etc., of from an inch to a half-inch square, like dice.
- TOWER. The large masonry structure used to mark the position of a church, usually square, sometimes round or polygonal; occasionally topped out with a flat roof, oftener, however, with a tall spire.
- TRACERY. The ornamental filling in of circular windows, window-heads, and panels formed by the ramifications of the mullions. It should be of stone, and not of wood, as it often is.
- TRANSEPT. That portion of a church that crosses transversely between nave and choir, extending beyond the nave on either side, and forming the arms of a cross.
- TRANSOM. The horizontal cross-bars of wood or stone that divide a window or doorway in height, in contradistinction to mullions that run vertically.
- TREFOIL. A panel, window, or window-head formed by cusping in the shape of a three-leaved flower; quatrefoil is four-leaved; cinquefoil, five-leaved; multifoil, many-leaved.
- TRITORIUM, or BLIND-STORY. The space of wall between the lower arcade and the clear-story.
- TURRET. A small tower, usually round or octagonal; generally placed at corners of buildings or larger towers.
- TYMPANUM. A name given to the space above the opening of a doorway, formed by the square head of the door and the form of the arch above it; often elaborately carved, or filled with mosaic.
- VAULT. The arched ceiling of a roof; where the vaults intersect the ceiling is said to be groined.
- VESICA PISCIS. An oval-shaped ornament pointed at both ends; used for panels, windows, etc. It is the common form of the aureole, or glory, by which the representations of the persons of the Holy Trinity were surrounded in the Middle Ages. The name was given by Albert Durer.
- VESTRY. Vide SACRISTY.

ION LEWIS, Chicago.

Ark of the Covenant. The coffer or chest of shittim or acacia wood, in which were placed the Tables of the Law. It was also called the Testimony. According to Heb. ix. 4, the pot of manna and Aaron's rod were within it. It was two and a half cubits long and one and a half cubits deep, and the same measurement in width. It was overlaid with gold within and without, and its lid was surrounded with a crown of gold. Four golden rings, one at each corner, were placed for the staves of acacia wood by which it was to be carried, and which were always to remain in place. It was the consecrated depository for the Tables of the Law—God's Testimony to His people. It therefore contained the stone tables, hewn by Moses, and written on by God for a Testimony before His people. It occupied the chief place in the Holy of Holies, and it was set before the mercy-seat, which was overshadowed by the cherubim. In the journeyings of the children it was always to be borne by the Kohathites, when the priests had covered it with the veil and pall of badger-skins. Upon the tent where the Testimony rested, the cloud, the glory of the LORD, hovered. It led the way in the three days of the first journey after leaving Sinai, and it was placed in the front of the advancing hosts with a solemn proclamation by Moses (Num. x. 33-36; cf. Ps. lxxviii. 1). Its march was marked by the blast from two silver trumpets. It was never seen but by the High-Priest, for none could look upon it and live. It was thus in the central place in the Jewish worship, and was a perpetual witness of God's covenant with His people. So Isaiah appeals to it: "To the Law (i.e., the whole Levitical Law) and to the Testimony" (i.e., the covenant in the Ark). (Is. viii. 20.) It excluded idolatry in the tabernacle, however much the heart of the people leaned to that sin.

Again, when Joshua was about to cross the Jordan, the Ark led the way, two thousand cubits in advance of the people (Josh. iii., iv.), and it was borne in front in the solemn processions about Jericho. It was at Gilgal, then removed to Shiloh, till the time of Samuel. It was taken by the Philistines when Hophni and Phinehas sacrilegiously carried it to the battle of Aphek, who kept it seven months. It was then returned (1 Sam. vi.), and remained at Kirjath Jearim twenty years, till it was left by David at the house of Obed Edom (1 Chron. xiii.); finally, it was carried to Jerusalem and placed in the tent David had prepared for it. Thence it was borne to the Temple by Solomon.

Arkansas and Indian Territory. This Diocese was organized in 1871 A.D. The population of the State is 802,564. Bishop Polk (born April 10, 1806 A.D.) was "consecrated Missionary Bishop of Arkansas and the Indian Territory south of 36° 30', with provisional charge of Alabama, Mississippi, and the republic of Texas, December 9, 1838 A.D. At the General Convention held in Philadelphia, October 6 to 19, 1841 A.D., Bishop Polk was nominated by the House of Bishops to the Episcopate of Louisiana, agreeably to the request of that Diocese that the General Convention should elect its Bishop, in which action the House of Deputies unanimously concurred. Died June 14, 1864 A.D.

"Second Bishop, the Rt. Rev. George Washington Freeman, D.D. Born June 13, 1789 A.D. Consecrated Missionary Bishop of Arkansas and the Indian Territory south of 36½°, with supervision of the Church in Texas, October 26, 1844 A.D. Died April 29, 1858 A.D.

"Third Bishop, the Rt. Rev. Henry Champlain Lay, S.T.D., LL.D. Born December 6, 1813 A.D. Consecrated Missionary Bishop of Arkansas and the Indian Territory, October 23, 1859 A.D. Translated to Easton, 1869 A.D.

"Present Bishop, the Rt. Rev. Henry Niles Pierce, D.D., LL.D. Residence, Little Rock. Born in Pawtucket, Rhode Island, October 19, 1820 A.D. Graduated at Brown University 1842 A.D. Ordered Deacon April 23, 1843 A.D. Ordained Priest January 3, 1849 A.D. He was successively rector of St. John's, Mobile, Ala., St. Paul's, Springfield, Ill. (1850-70 A.D.). Received degree of D.D. from University of Alabama, and that of LL.D. from the College of William and Mary, Virginia, 1869 A.D. Consecrated Missionary Bishop of Arkansas and the Indian Territory in Mobile, Ala., January 25, 1870 A.D., by the Rt. Rev. Wm. M. Green, D.D., Rt. Rev. Henry J. Whitehouse, D.D., LL.D., D.C.L., Rt. Rev. R. H. Wilmer, D.D., Rt. Rev. C. J. Quintard, S.T.D., LL.D., Rt. Rev. Joseph P. B. Wilmer, D.D., Rt. Rev. J. F. Young, S.T.D. Writings: Occasional Sermons, Essays, Addresses, and Poems." (Living Church Annual, 1884.)

Bishop Freeman was rector of Immanuel Church, Newcastle, Del., before his elevation to the Episcopate, hence William T. Read, Esq., of New Castle, presented resolutions concerning his death in the Delaware Convention of 1858 A.D. They declare that "the Church has lost one of her brightest ornaments, a chief pastor eminently qualified for the exalted and responsible station to which the Church called him with considerable unanimity, and who discharged its duties with diligence, ability, uprightness, and zeal, directed by sound judgment, and animated by ardent love of God and man."

In 1835 A.D., Rev. Francis L. Hawks, D.D., was chosen by the General Convention as Missionary Bishop, to have jurisdiction in Louisiana and the Territories of Arkansas and Florida. He declined the position.

When Bishop Polk was elected by the General Convention of 1841 A.D. "to the Diocesan Episcopate of Louisiana, he resigned his previous charge, and Bishop Otey, of Tennessee, was made acting Bishop of Arkansas, etc. This state of things continued until 1844 A.D." when Bishop Freeman was elected. Bishop Freeman was also to have jurisdiction in Texas, as well as the Indian Territory.

Bishop Lay reported to the General Convention of 1868 A.D. concerning Arkansas and the Indian Territory, that in the preceding three years he had licensed 6 lay-readers. There was 1 candidate for holy orders, and there were 8 Presbyters canonically resident, and 1 without a cure. There were 16 parishes, 5 churches, and 1 parsonage. Baptisms, 466; confirmations, 254; communicants, 605; Sunday-school teachers, 57; scholars, 520.

EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS.

"Academic.—St. John's Associate Mission School, Fayetteville, Ark., C. A. Leverett, Principal. Went into operation the 1st of October, 1868 A.D."

Bishop Pierce's first annual report to the Board of Missions, in October, 1870 A.D., stated that 103 had received confirmation, and there had been 52 baptisms. The Bishop had traveled 5414 miles. "Two parishes were self-supporting, Little Rock and Helena." The Bishop was consecrated in January of this year.

Bishop Pierce reports to the Board of Missions in 1883 A.D. that he has been busily at work in his jurisdiction for the past four years, "having in that period allowed himself little or no time for simple recreation." He speaks with interest of a visit to the missions in the western part of the Indian Territory, under Rev. F. B. Wicks. Mr. Wicks was a rector in the State of New York, who took some Indian lads to educate, and afterwards entered on this missionary work. Progress has been made "in planting the Church among the Cheyennes, Arapahoes, Kiowas, and Comanches." The labors of Mr. Wicks have been aided by the help of the Cheyenne Deacon, Rev. David P. Okahatee. The Bishop confirmed at the Cheyenne school-house fifteen persons, all Cheyennes. They were young men and women, appearing very intelligent. The Bishop says that "they form a grand nucleus for a large work among these Indians." He adds, "I do not think that I was ever more deeply impressed with any religious services than I was by the baptism of three young men by Mr. Wicks on the Wednesday night previous to their confirmation, Sunday, October 5. There was a large congregation of Indians and whites present, and few eyes were seen in which no tear-drop glistened." At the Kiowa and Comanche school-house, Anadarko, Mr. Wicks baptized six Indian young men, and the Bishop confirmed twelve persons. At Anadarko the Kiowa Deacon, Rev. Paul C. Zotom, has assisted Mr. Wicks, and Mr. George W. Hunt, the superintendent of the Kiowa and Comanche school, has also given him valuable aid. Mr. Hunt has become a candidate for orders. Steps have been taken looking to the erection of a church at Anadarko. At Fort Sill the Bishop confirmed two persons, one of them being the wife of the commandant, Col. G. V. Hendry. The Bishop was pleased with the success of the plans of Mr. Wicks and his influence among the Indians, and thinks that the mission needs to be enlarged and developed under such wise leadership.

In Arkansas the Bishop reports a new church being pushed towards completion at Van Buren, and a new church soon to be commenced at Marianna. The Bishop is exceedingly anxious to establish a central mission and clergy-house, with a Board of Clergy at Little Rock. He has worked for years, steadily but gradually, "towards the establishment of this cathedral and clergy-house." He says, "I am now, and have been since the middle of June last, trying to raise the requisite funds. My success has not been up to this time great, and yet not discouraging. With $2000 in addition to what is now secured, I can begin to build this fall, and have much of my scheme in operation during the coming year. I consider this work one of so much importance and so vital to the Church in Arkansas that I shall place it second to nothing else till it is done. May God put it into the hearts of Churchmen everywhere to help me! The sum I ask is so little, that I ought not to be obliged to take months to raise it." He reports 88 confirmations, 1 ordination to the priesthood; number of miles traveled, 6201. In addition to the confirmations in Arkansas, 29 have been confirmed in the Indian Territory.

REV. S. F. HOTCHKIN.

Arles. Of the numerous ecclesiastical conventions called Councils of Arles, the first only need be considered in any fullness. About the beginning of the fourth century, on occasions of violent persecution, much weakness had been exhibited by Christians, as well as much fortitude and zeal, which latter was sometimes carried to foolish fanaticism; and there had arisen, chiefly in Africa, two classes in the Church; one, of those inclined to treat forgivingly and leniently such as had fallen when sorely tried by persecution, and to discourage fanaticism which provoked persecution; the other, of those who thought they ought to take a severer view, and exclude the lapsed, often styled traitors, from Church privileges and communion, at least until the hour of death. The antagonism of these two parties took more definite form, and became open and violent, on the election of Cæcilian to the See of Carthage (311 A.D.), and a rival, Majorinus, was elected and consecrated to the same See, on the ground that Cæcilian's consecration was not valid, having been given by a traitor. The Emperor Constantine, who became master of the West about this time, gave some attention to these disputes, and authorized a meeting of Bishops at Rome to compose them (313 A.D.). Cæcilian was present at this conference, as was also the opposite party, headed by a certain Donatus; not, however, that one from whom the party shortly afterwards was named. The decision was in favor of Cæcilian, but Donatus and his brethren were not satisfied, and they applied to the Emperor for another hearing. This application issued in the Council of Arles, a general Council of the West assembled at Arlate, a city near the mouth of the Rhone (August 1, 314 A.D.). It is said as many as two hundred Bishops met at this time, among whom were three from Britain,—Eborius of York, Restitutius of London, and Adelfius of Lincoln. The result of the deliberations was again in favor of Cæcilian and the more moderate party, and a number of Canons were passed in the hope of ending the dissensions. Among other things it was decided that clergymen who were duly convicted as traitors should be deposed; that false accusers should be excommunicated until near death; that ordination by traitors, if otherwise unexceptionable, should be valid; that persons baptized by heretics in the Name of the Father, etc., and in the right form, should not be rebaptized, but received into the Church by imposition of hands; and that Easter should be observed on Sunday.

Articles, the XXXIX. "Articles of Religion" were an invention, in Western Europe, of the sixteenth century. The Eastern Church retains yet the Catholic practice of fifteen hundred years, and is satisfied with the Creed as the one formula of faith, with the Liturgy as the rule of worship, and with Canons for discipline. The latter tend to preserve good morals and promote the order of the Church. The second nourishes growth in grace, wisdom, and soundness of faith. The first maintains the primary facts respecting FATHER, SON, and HOLY GHOST, which are necessary to be believed in order to be saved. They are so necessary because salvation is a fact, and must, therefore, rest on facts. The only facts which make a sure foundation are those set forth in the formulas of the Creed. Though the Creed has two forms, one called the Apostles', and the other the Nicene, the latter is only an expansion of the former, containing no merely human opinions or explanations, but merely such enlargements of the old statements of facts as were known to have been accepted and taught from the beginning in all the Churches of Apostolic foundation and upgrowth.

In the sixteenth century, however, the resistance to the Bishop of Rome, which led to the convulsions of the Reformation, was accompanied by a fierce reaction against the mediæval theology. Indeed, the encroachments of the Pope upon the rights of the national Churches in Western Europe, and his usurpations of power based upon his uncatholic claims of "supremacy," had long proceeded, pari passu, with the development of novel and, therefore, erroneous theological doctrines. Practical corruptions followed from erroneous teaching, and induced an active, indignant, and sometimes violent resistance. The whole Church, in the West, had become so bound in the chains of a tyrannous papal rule, and so held captive by a powerful, well-organized, and minutely-divided ecclesiasticism, that when the inevitable reaction came, and the indestructible dignity of personal man—made in God's image, and responsible directly to Him—was reasserted and defended, the rebound, like its occasion, became extreme.

Not only were the rights of man as man, free by nature and godlike, an impelling force under the Reformation, but the supremacy of Truth, as the Word of God, was naturally set forth as the only sure test of His will and ways. A general intellectual renaissance had prepared the way for a theological, as well as moral and religious revival. The theological revival led, of course, to doctrinal controversies. These disturbed the quiet of both Church and State. The rulers, in both Church and State, endeavored to check disorder. The Reformers were in earnest, and began to show something more than a mere spirit of endurance. They were not all ecclesiastics. Princes favored the Reformation. Both Pope and Emperor tried in vain to stamp out the movement. Huss and Jerome had been silenced, but Luther, Zwingle, Calvin, and the English Convocation were, both jointly and severally, too strong to be repressed, and too numerous to be confined.

Open controversy was, therefore, the only resort, and out of this controversy grew the invention of "Articles of Religion." Generally, though not always, especially at first, Articles of Religion were distinguished from the Articles of the Faith. The latter were contained in the Creed. The former, while claimed to be accordant with and based upon the Creed, treated largely the contemporary questions in dispute.

A body of Articles of Religion was presented by Luther, Melancthon, and their associates to the Germanic Diet at Augsburg, June 23, 1530 A.D., and is called "the Augsburg Confession." On October 8, 1529 A.D., a body of seventeen articles, known as the "Schwabach Articles," had been presented to a joint meeting of the followers of Luther and of Zwingle at Marburg, but were not accepted by the latter. Indeed, this conference seems to have settled the fact that Luther and Zwingle could not agree. The latter insisted that every point should be settled solely upon the express words of Holy Scripture, while the former claimed that the Church had at least some weight of authority as interpreter of Holy Scripture. Luther, therefore, wished to retain all existing doctrines and practices which were not against the express words of Holy Scripture. On this point they separated, and the German Reformers proceeded alone.

The first part of "The Augsburg Confession" consisted of XXII. Articles; the last of which "concludes . . . by declaring that there is nothing in the doctrine of the Lutheran body which differs either from the Scriptures or the ancient Church." (Hardwicke.)

The English Church 1534 A.D., by distinct convocational enactment, rejected the supremacy of the Pope. This was the first decisive act which involved the English Church in the flood of the Reformation. Naturally the Continental Reformers were conferred with; and a strong effort was made, in which both Henry VIII. and Cranmer joined, to induce Lutherans, and especially Melancthon, to meet and confer with the English Convocation. 1536 A.D. a series of English "Articles of Religion" were drawn up, but not actually authorized and set forth. The hands of both Gardiner and Cranmer appear in them, with not a little of the dash of Henry VIII. Meanwhile, the Smalcaldic League had organized in Germany a political as well as religious resistance to papal usurpations; and efforts were made to attach Henry VIII. to it. He and his Bishops were not, however, willing to adopt the Augsburg Confession. Embassies were interchanged, and conferences followed; until some time in the summer of 1538 A.D. a body of XIII. Articles were agreed upon. They were (1) of the Unity of God and Trinity of persons, (2) of Original Sin, (3) of the two natures of CHRIST, (4) of Justification, (5) of the Church, (6) of Baptism, (7) of the Eucharist, (8) of Penitence, (9) of use of Sacraments, (10) of Ministers of the Church, (11) of Ecclesiastical Rites, (12) of Things-Civil, (13) of Resurrection of the Body and Last Judgment.

These Articles, though showing the influence of the Augsburg Confession, were full also of signs of those views which distinguished the English Reformation from that on the Continent.

The death of Henry VIII., 1547 A.D., placed the crown upon the head of the boy Edward VI. The Duke of Somerset—the Protector of King and realm—was a correspondent of Calvin. Both King and Protector were in close intimacy with Cranmer, who is regarded as the chief compiler and constructor of the XLII. Articles. These, though "agreed by the Bishops and other learned men in the Synod of London, 1552 A.D.," were set forth June 19, 1553 A.D., by "a mandate in the name of the King directed to the officials of the Archbishop of Canterbury, requiring them to see that the New Formulary should be subscribed;" i.e., by all the clergy, school-masters, and members of the university on admission to degrees. This was not, however, carried generally into effect.

The reign of Mary Tudor restored papal authority, and though nothing official was done with the XLII. Articles, they remained so in abeyance, that on the ascension to the throne of Elizabeth—November 17, 1558 A.D.,—they were not held to be of authority.

Indeed (1559 A.D.), "Archbishop Parker, with the sanction of the other Metropolitan and the rest of the English prelates," set forth XI. Articles of Religion; "and the clergy were required to make a public profession of it;" and it was "appointed to be taught and holden of all parsons, vicars, and curates, as 'well in testification of their common consent in the said doctrine, to the stopping of the mouths of them that go about to slander the ministers of the Church for diversity of judgment, as necessary for the instruction of their people.'" (Hardwicke.)

The XLII. Articles were, however, taken up and discussed by both houses of Convocation 1562 A.D. They were a remodeling of those set forth ten years before under Edward VI. Four were stricken out and several altered, but subscription to them was not at first required, although they were used sometimes as tests of orthodoxy. Now and then "men suspected of heterodoxy were called upon to subscribe as equivalent to recantation." The XXXIX. Articles were set forth by authority of Queen, Convocation, and Parliament 1571 A.D., and subscription to them was required by a Canon of the Convocation, assembled at that period, and by a contemporary enactment of the civil legislature." (Hardwicke.)

After the death of Luther, 1546 A.D., Calvin, who was then about thirty-seven years old, began to be felt as a power among the Continental Reformers. Geneva, in Switzerland, was his home, but his writings spread abroad. He was particularly noted for advocating, what is freely talked about though never clearly defined, viz., the "right of private judgment." This, at least, indicates the full evolution of one of the germinal forces of the Reformation, viz., the dignified position under God and before man of the free person. With a not unusual inconsistency Calvin added to this the theology of Predestination. These two incompatible propositions—human freedom and absolute decrees—worked strangely together, and exerted, indeed, still exert, a vast influence upon the Reformation and its development. English divines, and especially Whitgift, were captivated by Calvinism, and endeavored to get a series of Calvinistic articles established by authority. They put forth the Lambeth Articles, nine in number, which were "approved by John (Whitgift), Archbishop of Canterbury, Richard, Bishop of London, and other theologians, at Lambeth, November 20, 1595 A.D." The first reads: "God from eternity has predestinated some to life, and reprobated others to death." The fourth: "They who are not predestined to salvation, necessarily on account of their own sins, are damned." The ninth: "It is not put in the will or power of every man to be saved."

XIX. Articles of Religion, containing one hundred and five paragraphs, "were agreed upon by the Archbishops and Bishops and the rest of the Clergie of Ireland in the Convocation holden at Dublin 1615 A.D., for the avoiding of diversities of opinion, and the establishing of consent touching true Religion." They were not Calvinistic, but were strongly anti-Romish; and closed with a severe denunciation and decree of silence and deprivation of office against whoever, "after due admonition, doe not conforme himselfe and cease to disturbe the peace of the Church."

Calvinism was rampant in England under Elizabeth. Presbyterianism became, both in Church and State, an aggressive force soon to be exceeded by Puritanism. The later was equally Calvinistic with, and more violent than, the former.

The Calvinists in France and Switzerland had drawn up several bodies of articles of religion, called Confessions.

When James I., 1603 A.D., came to the English throne he disappointed the Presbyterians by siding with the Church of England. He dabbled in theology, and was well disposed towards a reconciliation, if possible, with Calvinism. He sent "a private deputation of divines to the national Synod of Dort," 1619 A.D., but without avail. This Synod drew up the final Calvinistic confession, and manifested the irrepressible antagonism of that doctrine to the Catholic faith, as set forth in the formulas of worship in the Church of England. The "XXXIX. Articles of Religion" still carried the firm rejection, by the Church of England, both of the dogmas of Calvin and the usurpations of Rome. Neither were the peculiar tenets of Arminius, who held the opposite pole to Calvinism, sanctioned by the Articles. Though drawn in the prevalent theological language of the times, they were an earnest effort to express the peculiarly catholic position of the Church of England. Necessarily, with dangers on every hand, they had to be more or less negative in spirit and form. In denying errors they may not have escaped, in every case, the inevitable tendency towards overstatement.

The ferment in Western Europe stirred even the Roman Church to her depths. She was compelled to respond to the Reformation. Pope Paul III. convened the Council of Trent, 1545 A.D. It continued through his reign and that of Julius III., and came to a close December 3-4, 1563 A.D., under Pius IV. It made no concessions, but rather the contrary. It petrified many of the Roman corruptions, added new articles to the Faith, and confirmed that principle of "Development" which has now at last culminated in setting forth, as "Articles of Faith," the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin, and the Infallibility of the Pope.

James I. died 1625 A.D., and was succeeded by his son Charles I., who was beheaded January 30, 1648 A.D. The preceding year the Assembly of Divines in Westminster set forth the well-known "Westminster Confession," which is the authorized exponent of Presbyterian doctrine. The XXXIX. Articles, however, remained, and still continue with authority in the Church of England.

The Church in America did not at first adopt the XXXIX. Articles. They were not referred to even in the Preface to the American Prayer-Book, last paragraph but one, where it is stated "that this Church is far from intending to depart from the Church of England in any essential point of doctrine, discipline, or worship." This declaration had direct reference, as the context shows, only "to those alterations in the Liturgy which became necessary . . . in consequence of the Revolution." That it did not refer specifically to the XXXIX. Articles will appear in the proceedings of Convention, 1792 A.D., 1799 A.D., as referred to below.

The first action taken in the American Church on Articles of Religion was in General Convention, 1789 A.D., as follows: The House of Bishops, consisting of Seabury and White, "originated and sent to the House of Clerical and Lay Deputies . . . a proposed ratification of the Thirty-nine Articles, with an exception in regard to the Thirty-sixth and Thirty-seventh Articles." This was on the last day of the session. In the House of Deputies the "proposed ratification" was, "with the concurrence of the House of Bishops, referred to a future Convention."

At the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of North America, 1792 A.D., the matter was considered in the House of Deputies, but postponed "because the Churches in some of the States are not represented in this Convention and others only partially." The General Convention held 1795 A.D. again postponed the matter. At the Special General Convention, held in Philadelphia 1799 A.D., on Thursday, June 13, the Rev. Ashbel Baldwin, from Connecticut, moved in the House of Deputies, that "the House resolve itself into a committee of the whole to take into consideration the propriety of framing articles of religion." This was agreed to, and when the committee rose, "the chairman of the committee, Wm. Walter, D.D., of Massachusetts, reported the following resolution, viz.:

"Resolved, That the Articles of our faith and religion, as founded on the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, are sufficiently declared in our Creeds and Liturgy as set forth in the Book of Common Prayer established for the use of this Church, and that further articles do not appear necessary."

"This resolution was disagreed to by the House."

On Saturday, June 15, "A resolution was proposed by Mr. Bisset,—Rev. John Bisset, of New York,—that the Convention now proceed to the framing of articles of religion for this Church." "The question was taken by yeas and nays," and "carried in the affirmative. Clergy: yea, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey, Delaware, 5; nay, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Virginia, 3. Laity: yea, Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, 3; nay, Virginia, 1." The committee was "chosen," and consisted of seven members, one from each State except Rhode Island.

On Tuesday, June 18, "The chairman of the Committee on the Articles reported seventeen articles of Religion, which were read. Whereupon, on motion of Mr. Bisset,

"Resolved, unanimously, That on account of the advanced period of the present session, and the thinness of the Convention, the consideration of the Articles now reported and read be postponed, and that the Secretary transcribe the Articles into the journal of this Convention, to lie over for the consideration of the next General Convention."

The XVII. Articles are printed in full in an appendix.

The House of Bishops do not appear to have taken action upon the subject. Its members present were Bishops White, Provost, and Bass. Bishop Provost was absent first and last day. Bishop Bass was absent on the first day. Session continued from Tuesday, June 11, to Tuesday, June 18, inclusive, except Sunday.

The General Convention, 1801 A.D., was opened in St. Michael's Church, Trenton, N. J., September 9, a sufficient quorum not appearing on the 8th, the day of call. The House of Bishops, consisting of Bishops White, Pennsylvania, Claggett, Maryland, and Jarvis, Connecticut, on Wednesday, September 9, "agreed on a form and manner of setting forth the Articles of Religion, and agreed that the same be sent to the House of Clerical and Lay Deputies for their concurrence."

It will thus be seen that the Bishops ignored, of course, the XVII. Articles, which had only passed in a committee of the lower house, and took the initiative in action. The Articles sent by them were the XXXIX. of the English Church, with such alterations as adapted them to the American Church. It will be observed that they call them "The Articles of Religion."

Conference between the houses and several action resulted in setting forth the so-called XXXIX. Articles, as now printed in the Prayer-Book, entitled "Articles of Religion as established by the Bishops, the Clergy, and the Laity of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America, in Convention, on the 12th day of September, in the year of our Lord 1801."

In Article VIII. all reference to the Athanasian Creed is left out. Article XXI. is omitted "because it is partly of local and civil nature, and is provided for as to the remaining parts of it in other Articles." Article XXXV. has a note modifying its recommendation. of the Homilies. Article

XXXVI. "Of Consecration of Bishops and Ministers," is made to commend and defend "The book of Consecration of Bishops, and ordering of Priests and Deacons, as set forth by the General Convention of this Church in 1792." "Article XXXVII. to be omitted, and the following substituted in its place: 'Of the power of the Civil Magistrate.'"

Thus the American Church has thirty-eight Articles of Religion "set forth" by the General Convention 1801 A.D., and since acquiesced in.

"In the Church of England, the 36th Canon requires the candidate (for orders) after reference, first, to the royal supremacy; second, to the Book of Common Prayer with the Ordinal; and, third, to the XXXIX. Articles, to signify his assent as follows: I, N. N., do willingly and ex animo subscribe to those three Articles above mentioned, and to all things that are contained in them."

In the American Church, Article VII. of the Constitution requires, "Nor shall any person be ordained until he shall have subscribed the following declaration: 'I do believe the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments to be the Word of God, and to contain all things necessary to salvation; and I do solemnly engage to conform to the doctrines and worship of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States.'"

The authority of the "XXXIX. Articles" extends specifically to the clergy, and is set forth in the above forms of subscription. The laity, as such, even in England, are not bound to their terms, though some laymen—e.g., members of the universities—have to subscribe them. In America the laity are only bound by the Creeds. They profess belief in the Apostles' Creed at baptism, and usually recite the Nicene Creed in the Liturgy proper, or, as it is designated in the Prayer-Book, "The Order for the Administration of the LORD's Supper, or Holy Communion." Their profession of faith, in the Holy Catholic Church, subjects the American laity to such Canons of Discipline as are or may be established by the American Church.

Ascension. The article of the Creed declares that our LORD ascended into heaven. A creed properly states only facts to be believed. A Christian creed states the facts of the Christian religion. Therefore a fact linking the Resurrection with His continuous mediatorial acts and His gift of the HOLY GHOST could not be omitted. But this fact, so briefly stated in the Creed, must also be vouched for in the inspired record. Therefore we have recorded by St. John that CHRIST foretold his Ascension (ch. xvi. 5; xx. 17), that He did ascend openly before His Apostles, by St. Mark (ch. xvi. 19), by St. Luke (ch. xxiv. 51;

Acts i. 9-11). He was seen at His place in heaven by St. Stephen. His ascension was taught and inferences drawn from it by St. Paul (Eph. iv. 8-16; Col. ii. 15; 1 Tim. iii. 16), by St. Peter, who was also an eye-witness (1 Pet. iii. 22). Therefore it was in His very and true Body and Soul, now immortally conjoined to His Divinity, by which He hath entered into the Holiest. The Ascension was necessary for us, since He could not otherwise send to His Apostles, and therefore to His Church, and consequently to us, the gift of the HOLY GHOST, nor those gifts which he received for men that the LORD GOD might dwell among us. It was necessary that He might take up His mediatorial work. It was necessary that our affections might ascend to Him (Col. iii. 1-4). These main facts are thus grandly summed up by Bishop Pearson: "Upon these considerations we may easily conclude what every Christian is obliged to confess in these words of our Creed, He ascended into heaven; for thereby he is understood to express thus much. I am fully persuaded that the only begotten and eternal SON of GOD, after He rose from the dead, did, with the same soul and body with which He rose, by a true and local translation, convey Himself from the earth on which He lived, through all the regions of the air, through all the celestial orbs, until He came unto the heaven of heavens, the most glorious Presence of the majesty of GOD; and thus I believe in JESUS CHRIST WHO ASCENDED INTO HEAVEN." (Pearson on the Creed.)

Ascetics. (Vide HERMITS.) The name ascetic is derived from the Greek word "asketikos," which means "exercised." Asceticism has been said to be a temperament, rather than a law of Christian life. The idea of the ancient ascetics was that solitude, extreme fasting, and self-denial, and hardening of the body and keeping it under, and bringing it into subjection (1 Cor. ix. 27), brought the spirit into better condition for constant contemplation of Divine things.

This style of life is first met with in the heathen world, and doubtless many good men among them have thus sought GOD according to their light. The East Indians, the Mohammedans, and the ancient Egyptian priests all practiced asceticism. The Therapeutæ (Worshippers) of Egypt, who endeavored to mingle the teachings of Moses and Plato, belonged to this school.

Among the Jews the Essenes were noted ascetics, and in the days of St. John the Baptist they were leading in their mountain valleys a life similar to his. Those who strive to trace the history of such communities see a forerunner of them in the prophet Elijah. Daniel the prophet, in his mourning, ate no pleasant bread (Dan. x. 3). In the Apocrypha, when Esdras prepares himself for his visions, he goes, according to commandment, into the field Ardath, "and did eat of the herbs of the field, and," he adds, "the meat of the same satisfied me"

(2 Esdras ix. 26). Anna, the prophetess, "served God with fastings and prayers night and day" (St. Luke ii. 36, 37).

The ascetic is older than the monk, and the term is a more general one. In the beginning he lived alone, or he could live in the busy city, distinguished by his zeal; the communities were an after-thought.

Egypt, "the mother of wonders," was the natural home of asceticism. The Eastern mind is naturally given to reflection. A warm climate allows men to live much in the open air, and the magnificent clear starlight nights of the East "declare the glory of God" to the silent watcher. About the close of the fourth century the mountains and deserts of Egypt were full of Christian brethren, whose self-denying lives astonished the world. The dwellers in the Roman empire, which was then rotting in vice, were allured to these seats of piety, and St. Jerome and others visited them. Noble Roman women gave up their property, and, tired of the effeminate, faithless life of the capital, sought the Egyptian desert. The question which met all was whether pleasure or virtue was the aim of life. From the Thebaid asceticism has spread over the world, and for centuries it was a mighty power among men.

The Essene by his mountain spring with his incessant washings was a type of all who have followed him. The Carthusians, with their rule to eat no flesh and keep perpetual silence and never go abroad, and the monks of La Trappe, who were to observe silence and dig their own graves, are lineal descendants of the ascetic Jew and the Egyptian Christian. The dark forests of Mount Athos contain the monasteries which gave Bishops to the Eastern Church, and thus its doctrine and worship were determined by men who knew not the education of public life.

Hallam, in the "Middle Ages," draws attention to the fact that the fasting and watching and hard lot of monks and hermits must lead men to conclude that they are living in hope of a better world in the future. The reality of heaven was a constant impulse in their life. "Jerusalem the Golden" is the composition of a monk. The worthlessness and uncertainty of earthly things led their minds above. The fasting, continued often for days, subdued the body to the spirit. If heaven was a reality, hell was also one. No wonder that the worn-out watcher heard the cries of devils in the night-birds' notes or in the yells of wild beasts among ruins. The sinfulness of sin on the one hand and the nearness of God on the other were constantly before the mind of the ascetic as he watched under the sky or tilled his little field.

A weariness of life, and a preparation for death, were the great stimulants to those who led so solitary and denying a life. Contemplation and prayer were the business of life. The Holy Scriptures were the guide, and those early ascetics who could not read committed them to memory.

In a busy age, when men must be in the world, and yet not of the world, it is well sometimes to look upon the lives of men who gave up all for CHRIST, and who, with all their imperfections, were the salt of the earth in a godless age.

REV. S. F. HOTCHKIN.

Assurance of Faith. The word assurance, in the first verse of St. Luke's Gospel and in St. Paul's Epistles, is a metaphor taken from the onward sweep of a ship before a favoring breeze. St. Luke means to say that outward historical facts have given us a full persuasion of the truth of what spiritual facts we teach in the Gospel. St. Paul means the same thing when writing to his converts (1 Thess. i. 5; Heb. vi. 11; x. 22; and Rom. iv. 21; xiv. 5). It is the conviction that comes from those proofs (as the gifts of sacramental life by the HOLY GHOST, cf. the texts cited), which He chooses to put before us as sufficient, and our action upon that conviction. It cannot refer to the inward conviction from emotion or excitement. The word assurance is used in connection either with historic proofs or with the power of the HOLY GHOST, shown by miracles or in connection with the sacraments, or with Abraham's faith (Rom. iv. 21), who had already outward demonstration of God's power. Therefore Hooker was right when he taught that the proofs of faith were not so strong as the assurance of the senses, from the certainty of evidence depending upon the proofs adduced; but there arises from this a certainty of adherence, which, itself, causes the heart to "cleave and stick to that which it doth believe. The reason is this: the faith of a Christian doth apprehend the words of the law, the promises of God not only as true but as good; and therefore even then when the evidence which he hath of the truth is so small that it grieveth him to feel his weakness in assenting thereto, yet is there in him such a sure adherence unto that which he doth but faintly and fearfully believe, that his spirit having once truly tasted the heavenly sweetness thereof, all the world is not able quite and clean to remove him from it, but he striveth with himself to hope against all reason of believing, being settled with holy Job upon this immovable resolution, 'Though God kill me I will not give over trusting in Him.' For why? this lesson remaineth forever imprinted in him, 'It is good for me to cleave unto God.'" (Hooker, Serm. i., p. 585, Keble's ed.) This, however, is very different from the presumptuous assurance of pardon sometimes taught by sectaries, but which has no warrant of Holy Scripture. Even St. Paul felt the need of constant active work for his Christian life (cf. 1 Cor. ix. 27, with 2 Tim. iv. 8).

Athanasian Creed. Vide CREEDS and QUICQUE VULT.

Atheism, from a and θεος, is the denial of the existence of a personal GOD. It thus includes pantheism, which teaches that everything is GOD. Atheism must be carefully distinguished from skepticism, which simply doubts, and from infidelity, which is the rejection of an organized faith or form of religion. Nor does it include the godlessness of savage tribes, if there be such, whose intellectual development is too low to form a conception of GOD. Avowed and consistent atheism is exceedingly rare, and is always individual, no sect or system having ever been willing to establish itself upon this basis. Even the positivism of Comte stops short of avowed atheism, content with holding the futility of all speculation beyond the data of positive experience. The charge of atheism has always been most abhorrent to those, even, who might be practical atheists. Among the Greeks and Romans it was punished with death, those convicted of it being regarded by the law as hostes humani generis,—enemies to the human race. A little thought will reveal the grounds of this universal repugnance. First, it is the deliberate rejection of the suggestions of consciousness, no argument being ever required to establish a belief in GOD, while atheism is always the result of some process of thought. Then the mind naturally recoils from what is contrary to reason, and atheism is so because it necessitates the recognition of effect without cause, of design without a designer, of law without a lawgiver, and of life without a source. A slight elaboration of the last two points may be sufficient for illustration. One of the first results of observation and experience is the necessary recognition of laws by which natural processes are governed, and which man can neither understand nor control. The recurrence of the seasons, the germination of seed, the reproduction of plants and animals each after its kind, with many more instances which will readily occur, are seen to be regular, systematic, and permanent. Man finds them necessary to his life, while he can neither alter nor restrain them, but he may rely upon them, and does rely upon them, with the absolute certainty of not being disappointed. Reason tells him that there must be a Mind greater than his to conceive laws which he cannot comprehend, and a Power greater than his to enforce them. This Mind and this Power he always finds greater than the grasp of his mind and power, and this supreme intelligent force is GOD. Again, man recognizes the fact and the phenomena of life, but finds no origin for them within his experience. But reason demands an origin, which must necessarily be beyond his experience. He finds, too, in close connection with life the phenomenon of death, and soon discovers that it is abnormal. There ought to be no death; by the very nature of life the machines which it quickens should be permanent. But they are not so, and that systematically. Reason demands for this a controlling Will which restrains, as it originates, the phenomena of life. That originating and controlling will is GOD. Thus the rejecting of the existence of GOD is contrary to reason, and, therefore, abhorrent to human intellect. We sometimes meet the phrase "scientific atheism," but there can be no such thing as scientific atheism, because nothing could be more unscientific than to deny the existence of that which is undemonstrable. But the existence of a personal GOD is undemonstrable by science because science deals necessarily with finite data and causes; but finite causes must lead to finite results, and GOD is of necessity infinite. Hence science can neither prove nor disprove the existence of GOD, because it must work with data which cannot lead beyond human experience, while GOD is beyond human experience. But to assume that which we cannot know is contrary to science, and therefore there can be no scientific atheism. Finally, atheism is repugnant to reason because it is illogical, logic being the perfection of the processes of reason. For logic is essentially the necessary sequence of cause and effect, and therefore to deny to any effect an antecedent cause is illogical. But the human mind must necessarily confine its processes to sequences, beginning within its own experience, and the ultimate attainment of human experience is always manifestly an effect. But atheism denies any antecedent cause beyond the possible attainment of human experience, and therefore atheism is illogical, and consequently repugnant to reason. Thus we may readily account for the abhorrence always manifested by individuals to the charge of atheism. But it is equally repugnant to morality, and consequently to the welfare of society, because it destroys the strongest and highest incentive to the control and restraint of those natural appetites and passions which in their unbridled indulgence are hostile to the interests of society. The first element of social order and welfare is the restriction of individual liberty for the common good, and the restraint within permitted limits of those dispositions and desires which are common to all animal nature. But the fear of human punishment and the desire of the good of others have never been found sufficient to accomplish these ends, unless aided and supported by a sense of responsibility and accountability unto a higher Power, whose vigilance cannot be escaped and whose authority cannot be defied, or whose love and kindness excites to reverence and obedience. But atheism destroys alike this fear and this reverence, and by removing all sense of danger beyond this life, or of compensating reward hereafter, directly fosters the commission of acts contrary to the common welfare. Hence society has ever regarded atheism as hostile to its best interests and subversive of its fundamental principles, and has punished it as a crime or made it a bar to social privileges and respect. The refusal to accept the oath of an atheist in a court of justice is a brand of disgrace, and the assertion of a distrust by his fellow-citizens, from which every man must shrink with horror. It is a powerful proof of the healthy tone of public sentiment upon this vital matter, that there is probably not a single society in the country organized for mutual benefits of any kind into which an avowed atheist could obtain admission.

Among those who have been classed as atheists are the Peripatetic and Epicurean philosophers of ancient times, and Hobbes, Hume, Kant, Spinoza, Blount, Vanini, and others in the modern period. We must remember, however, how inaccurate was the language and how intolerant the views of theological writers only a few years ago. Few, if any, of those named can be properly called atheists under the exact terminology and discriminating classifications of more recent philosophy, though most of them, wandering in the misty regions of metaphysical speculation, have trodden dangerously near to the fatal verge, and there are few minds strong enough to follow their teachings with safety.

REV. ROBERT WILSON, D.D.

Atonement. This word, as applied to the great work of CHRIST, has been used in two senses, differing according to the view taken of the Person of CHRIST and of His relation to the process of man's salvation. Those who deny the divinity of our LORD JESUS CHRIST commonly regard the Atonement as a mere restoration of friendly feeling between two alienated parties. It is, to use their own favorite etymology, an "at-one-ment,"—a reconciliation of the CREATOR and creature to each other. From this point of view, inasmuch as the CREATOR cannot be supposed to have contributed to the alienation,—and is not supposed to have raised any barrier to the restoration of the original amicable relations between Himself and His creature,—inasmuch, therefore, as both the original departure and the continued separation are exclusively on the part of the creature, the Atonement is regarded as a process not for reconciling the CREATOR to the creature, or the law to the offender, but only for reconciling the creature to the CREATOR. According to this view the work of CHRIST is reduced to the exercise of a mere persuasory influence upon the creature. First, persuading him to desire reconciliation, and then persuading him to take the steps of moral and spiritual reform necessary for the restoration of harmony. But in all this there is nothing of the nature of expiation or of satisfaction rendered for the offense.

But the Holy Catholic Church, while including this persuasory process in her idea of the Atonement, and understanding the language of St. Paul (2 Cor. v. 20) as expressing it, has, from the first, included much more. She holds that the fitness of things, their accurate adjustment, the eternal principles of justice and truth, and the permanent well-being of the universe demand that where law has been broken some adequate satisfaction for the offense shall be rendered, especially where a penalty has been attached beforehand to the infraction and made known to those under its authority.

1st. It is contrary to justice, to the essential fitness of things, and to the dignity of all law that the infraction of any law should have no evil consequences for the infringer; that the results of disobedience should be to him the same as those of obedience. Law is something more than a mere indication or suggestion of action. It is an obligatory rule of action, imposing respect for itself upon all; not only binding the person governed but existing as an authority in the universe, the maintenance of which becomes of universal obligation and interest. To be law in this sense it must be an enforced rule of action.

2d. The controlling power of law,—its value as an effective regulator of action is sacrificed when disobedience goes unpunished. Wherefore, when law is violated, its regulating efficiency, which is impaired by the violation, must be restored by some expiatory penalty. It is for the benefit of all for whom law is made, the law-breaker himself included, that the law shall not be rendered ineffective and contemptible by permitting its infraction with impunity.

This becomes more evident when the nature of Sin is considered: 1st. "Sin is transgression of Law." 2d. Sin is always the responsible act of a free agent. No being is responsible for what he cannot help. Therefore sinfulness is our common inherited nature. But Sin itself involves freedom of action,—action performed not by compulsion—however induced through the persuasive influence of motives,—but not the less free because the result of such persuasion. Hence the rationale and the importance of offsetting all temptation to law-breaking by corresponding penalty. This is an absolutely rational arrangement, and one of universal application,—in all worlds and forms of responsible existence,—one adapted to the nature of free agents, who, because they are free, must therefore be able to break the law, and who are therefore to be hindered from doing so not by compulsion, but by the persuasory power of motives. These motives may be of different sorts. They may be found in the love of the right, or in the love of the law-maker. But these motives may be legitimately and effectively supported by another, viz., the apprehension of the evil consequences of breaking the law. The attachment of a penalty to law-breaking is therefore more than a measure of justice. It is a positive measure of mercy, since it supplies an additional protection of the universe against the disturbing influences of temptation and sin by protecting the free agent against himself. It is, therefore, also as much a measure of mercy for the law-breaker as for the law-keeper.

But in order that a penalty may have any useful effect its enforcement must be assured. This is—equally as the other, and for the same reasons—a measure of true mercy as well as of justice,—and for all—for the law-breaker as well as for the law-keeper. And all that might be said of the protective power of an enforced penalty in the case of a first offense would apply to all subsequent offenses. The rationale is the same.

But where a particular penalty has been beforehand attached to the breach of a law the veracity of the law-maker is also involved in its enforcement. It is of course conceivable that the terms of the penalty may be that the law-breaker shall only be liable to certain consequences. But whatever the actual terms of the penalty, the veracity of the law-maker requires that those terms be enforced. A positive threat is only a promise in another form. And it is a promise not only to the possible law-breaker, made with the merciful intent to deter him from the crime, but it is a promise to the rest of the universe also, whose peace is more or less endangered by any infraction of law. The actual enforcement of the penalty becomes, therefore, an obligation of justice, of mercy, and of veracity.

When man was placed in probation he was told that if he sinned he should die. It was a promise on the part of the Divine Law-maker, and, as made by Divine wisdom, one which must be held to have been in just proportion to the offense. Having been made, its fulfillment was required by the principles of absolute justice,—by the interests of the universe, those of the law-breaking race included, and by the veracity of the Creator.

It was necessary, therefore, from all these points of view, that man's offense should be punished by the actual infliction, in some way, of the promised penalty. And it must be observed that the penalty promised was a positive and punitive one. There was something more than a mere separation from GOD as a simple effect or resulting fact,—a fact which could be neutralized or extinguished by another simple fact, viz., by a mere bringing together again of the separated parties,—an at-one-ment. The penalty was not only consequential, but was also positively primitive, and was therefore something more than the offender could himself remove by simply returning. The offender could not reinstate himself. He must needs be reinstated. But inasmuch as it was due to absolute justice, as well as to the interests of the universe, that no reinstatement should take effect which should leave the sin unpunished or the broken influence of the law unrepaired or uncompensated, some adequate compensation, or satisfaction, or expiation was necessary, that the law-breaking might be properly offset or balanced, and the shattered influence of the law itself repaired. Could the human law-breaker make this expiation for himself either by subsequent obedience or by suffering? He could not do this by subsequent obedience, inasmuch as there was still due from him to his CREATOR a perpetually perfect service. All that he could do, therefore, at the best, would be not to break the law again. There could be no room or possibility for a superabundant or superfluous service or obedience. But not to offend again would offer no satisfaction for the breach already committed; nothing but suffering in such case could answer the purpose of expiation; and had the offender risen from his first fault to a continuously perfect obedience thereafter, it is conceivable that by his sufferings justice could have been satisfied and the law vindicated, and its influence sustained. But, unfortunately for him, his sin not only subjected him to punishment, but brought in a deprivation of his nature. So that from the first he has gone on increasing in place of diminishing the fatal record against himself. Manifestly, therefore, he, being a continuous offender, could make no expiation for himself, either by obedience or by suffering.

At the same time it was not consistent with justice that the penalty should be borne by one absolutely unconnected with the offense. Besides which, the penalty having been denounced specifically upon the offender himself, the veracity of the Law-maker was pledged for its infliction upon him. How, then, could expiation be made, or the reinstatement of the offender accomplished, if neither one himself an offender, nor one unconnected with the offense, could make it?

Just here an important fact must be noticed. Adam represented the race of man, and his act was a representative act. His offense was a race-offense, and so the penalty was a race-penalty. That this is so is evident from two facts, not to speak of others:

1st. The whole race, as a race, have inherited the taint of Adam's sin. The case is not one of a multitude of individual sinners, but one of a race or stock of sinners, in whom the sinfulness in the stock is congenital. There is absolutely never an exception.

2d. The penalty of mortality is equally universal and congenital. There is no exception in respect to it. It is, therefore, a race-punishment.

But here again another fact must be borne in mind, viz., that the human family is, after all, in a very real sense, only one continuous person. As the branches of a tree are a part of the one tree, and as, no matter how long the life of the tree, its continuity is preserved, so that it is, after all, but one and the same tree, and its latest branches are only a continuation of the wood which was in it as a sapling a hundred years before, so with the human stock. It has not been a series of successive creations; it has been but one continuous, uninterrupted individual, at least so far as body and brain are concerned, and so far as we may hold that mental and moral qualities are inherited, we may include the mind with the body in this statement (the will is perhaps the only separable part of the man). The child begins by being a living part of its parents before it sets out on its own independent career of will. There has never been a break or an interval in this human continuity, and so, in point of fact, there has been literally but one ever-developing, continuous human being. Its many branches, however separated after a time from the parent stem, are in their start as identical with the original stock as are the branches of a tree with its trunk.

This great, continuous, self-involving human being, now as many years old as have elapsed since the creation, sinned as a whole, was sentenced as a whole, and as a whole now lies under the penalty of the law. In this fact we find the beginning of the solution of our difficulty. To complete it another fact is necessary.

The Most High God, the Son, by causing Himself to be born of the Virgin Mary, entered into the human race and became a part of the same. Having thus become part of the human stock, He could, in His human nature, rightfully represent that stock in any transaction with Divine Justice. Punishment inflicted upon Him in His human nature would be punishment inflicted upon the human race. And as the pain inflicted upon any part of a human body is inflicted upon that body as a whole, so the penalty inflicted upon an individual of a race is inflicted upon the race. Thus, one person might become proxy for his race to the avenging law.

Yet a continuously sinful member of the race could not thus stand as proxy, seeing that he would have his own offenses to answer for. But one who had incurred no individual penalty might thus, by suffering, atone—according to his measure—for the offense of his race, so that in him his race might be punished.

But could any one person adequately atone for a whole race? Could the majesty of the law be thus sufficiently vindicated, the necessities of justice be maintained, the veracity of the law-maker be preserved, and the interests of the universe be sufficiently guarded?

When in human warfare a body of men having become liable to punishment certain of their number are selected as representatives of the rest, the punishment of a leader is accounted the equivalent of that of many private individuals. Natural reason accepts this as a principle. But God, the Son, by taking humanity did not put off His own Divinity. And so in standing proxy to justice for the human race, His value as an example or substitute for others was infinitely multiplied. By how much a Divine victim was of more value than a human one by so much the more did His suffering exceed in value that of any merely human victim in supplying a suitable satisfaction to the broken law and in restoring the power of the law as a preventive of future disobedience. Being a part of the human stock, the sentence of the law against that stock was literally executed in Him, and the veracity of the Law-giver was maintained. Being Divine, as well as human, i.e., a Divine man, He could adequately represent any number of individuals in that race. Thus was solved the riddle. Eternal justice, the true honor and dignity of law, its availability as a barrier against sin, and the truth of God were made consistent with man's salvation.

Atonement, then, in the sense in which it is applied by the Holy Catholic Church to the work of CHRIST, is the expiation offered in the Person of the Divine man whereby He put Himself in the place of the rest of the condemned human race and suffered in its stead. As man, He paid the penalty adjudged against man; as God, He gave value to the substitution of Himself for the whole race.

Thus the Atonement, while including the idea of reconciliation or "at-one-ment," and indeed involving all the subsequent processes of reconciliation whereby the offender is brought to a better mind and into harmony again with the Divine will, yet contains also the principle of a satisfaction rendered for the breach of the law; and so a ransom paid for the deliverance of the offender.

In this sense the ancient sacrifices were measures of atonement. They were satisfactions or ransoms rendered, and being antetypes of the Atonement of CHRIST, imperfect themselves, they were said to effect an atonement through Him for those who offered them. Thus (to select one out of many passages) in Lev. iv. 35, it is said with respect to any one of the people who should sin and bring a sacrifice, "The priest shall make an atonement for his sin that he hath committed, and it shall be forgiven him." And so of the sacrifice of our LORD JESUS CHRIST, it is said (Rom. v. 11), "By Him we have received the atonement." That His Atonement was not a mere process of reconciliation, but an expiation by suffering, is evident from Eph. i. 7, et al.: "In whom we have redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of sins."

Correspondent to this view of the Atonement was the language of the Fathers. St. Clement of Rome (a contemporary of the Apostles), 1 Epist. vii. : "Let us look steadfastly to the blood of CHRIST. . . shed for our salvation." Epist. St. Barnabas (a very early document), ch. v. : "The remission of sins which is effected by His blood of sprinkling." Ignatius ad Smyrn., vi. : "If they believe not in the blood of CHRIST (they) shall incur condemnation." Epist. ad Diognetum, ix. : "He (God) took on Him the burden of our iniquities ; He gave His SON to be a ransom for us." Justin Martyr, Dial. Tryph., lxiii., speaks of CHRIST as "delivered over to death by God for the transgressions of the people."

The above are only a few specimens of the vast mass of patristic testimony to the doctrine held by the Holy Catholic Church upon this subject and confirmatory of the view we have presented.

Attributes of God. Those characteristics by which we can recognize Him and His dealing with us. "His property is always to have Mercy ;" Justice is another ; Love is more properly Himself. Holiness, Compassion, Omnipotence, Omnipresence, are attributes. In short, in the Divine nature, since we cannot comprehend it in itself, we can only recognize attributes. These may be grouped into those relating to His nature absolutely, and those displayed towards us. Of the first we may recite His Omnipotence, His Omniscience, His Omnipresence, His Wisdom, His Truth. Of the second, we may recite His Justice, His Mercy, His Love, His Compassion. These are evidently part of the Divine Essence. They coexist in Him and are inseparable from Him, but they are all cognizable by us, and in our own unaided speculations concerning the Divine nature are forced upon our recognition because there is some faint counterpart in our own human nature. They are so many cords to draw us to the Divine nature. Yet while they coexist and are inseparable from His Essence, it is something more, as our soul is an essence known to us by our capacities, yet it is something more. Therefore these several attributes that inhere in the very nature of God and belong to any conception we can form of Him yet do not describe His full nature.

Attrition. An attempt by the schoolmen to give an analysis of repentance led to a too curious and untenable series of subdivisions. Attrition is defined to be the first step towards repentance. It is akin to the worldly sorrow which worketh death ; not a sorrow that arises from a hatred of sin, but a sorrow from the consequences of the act. It is a step towards true repentance which yet may never be attained. As a preliminary part to the series of acts in the heart of the sinner leading to a true hearty repentance, the distinction is useful enough for the theologian, but it is a very dangerous suggestion to the imperfectly taught layman, more especially since the Council of Trent (Sess. xiv. c. 4, de pœnit.) taught that contrition, confession, and satisfaction were sufficient, making contrition consist in the terrors of a stricken conscience, and a faith that the sins of the penitent are forgiven by CHRIST. It is evident that this is but a partial statement made more fully and accurately elsewhere, but certainly (as this is a canon complete in itself) very mistakenly here, since the other teaching would be lowered to this, not this lifted up to meet the truer definition.

Autocephali. Those Metropolitans who were not under a Patriarch were called Autocephali. Such were the Archbishop of Cyprus by the express recognition of the General Council of Ephesus, 431 A.D., and the Archbishops of Bulgaria and Georgia. The British Archbishop of Caerleon-upon-Usk was also autocephalous.

Ave Maria. The salutation of the Angel Gabriel to the Virgin Mary at the Annunciation (St. Luke i. 28). The words of the angel were simply "Hail! thou that art highly favored, the LORD is with thee. Blessed art thou among women." The modern Roman invocation following the Vulgate reads, "Hail Mary ! full of grace," then adds from the salutation of St. Elizabeth, "blessed art thou among women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb." The first part came into use about 1196 A.D., as is seen from the injunctions of Odo, Bishop of Paris, at that date. Its universal use was ordered by Urban IV. (1261 A.D.), together with the addition of Elizabeth's salutation. Later yet a precatory, "Holy Mary, mother of God, pray for us now and at the hour of our death," was added and ordered to be used, in the Breviary of Pius V. (1566 A.D.). The first clause was in use in England, but not the second, till nearly the date of the Reformation, and the precatory addition never. And in the "Institution of a Christian Man," 1530 A.D., the preachers were enjoined to teach that it was no prayer, but that it was a laud and thanksgiving for our LORD's birth, with a remembrance that the Virgin humbly submitted and believed.

Azyme. (Unleavened bread.) The controversy between the Greek and Roman Churches upon the use by the latter of unleavened bread in the Eucharist. The earliest use was that of unleavened bread, and was so for several centuries (vide OBLATIONS), but the Roman Church gradually fell into the use of leavened bread after the close of the ninth century. The Greek Church has always used leavened bread. When, then, the various causes of division came to a focus about 1054 A.D., this use of unleavened bread became a bitter part of the furious disputes which raged over the differences and wrongs of the two Churches, and it continued to be a serious subject of controversy for a long time. (Vide Neale's Introduction to the History of the Eastern Church, vol. ii.; Scudamore's Notitia Eucharistica, pp. 749-65.)

Baal. (Lord.) The name of a deity worshipped among the Semitic peoples of Syria and Mesopotamia. It is identified with the Babylonian Bel. The Baal-worship into which the Israelites fell when "they joined themselves to Baal-poor" when tempted by the Moabites, clung to them till late in their history. The minor prophets are full of references to it, and, in fact, they were only cured of it when finally all idolatrous tendencies were crushed out by the Babylonian captivity.

Balaam. The famous prophet who blessed Israel (Num. xxiii. and xxiv.). The whole history of his contact with Israel is recorded in these two chapters, with a necessary slight reference to him in a later chapter. He appears from the first as a prophet of God, and so acts and is so entitled in the Bible. It is not the place here to enter into the question how much knowledge of God the heathen really had, and how far He chose to have Himself witnessed to among them. For any knowledge given to them would be perverted into polytheistic teaching. The history of Balaam is short, but very instructive. Balak, the king of Moab, sends for him to come to curse the passing hosts of Israel, "for I wot that he whom thou blestest is blessed, and he whom thou cursest is cursed." It is not necessary to suppose that the rewards of divination in the hands of the elders of Moab were any other than the usual and courteous gifts from a prince to a prophet (cf. 1 Sam. ix. 7-9). Balaam, desirous to go, still inquired of God whether he could go. The Lord forbade him, "for thou shalt not curse the people, for they are blessed." The princes returned to Balak with the message, but Balak, unwilling to let the prophet put him off, as he thought, sent other and more honorable ambassadors. Balaam still professed utter inability to act without permission from the Lord. The permission was conditional,—"if the men come to call thee." Of this call nothing is said, only, "Balaam rose up early in the morning and saddled his ass and went with the princes of Moab." His willful conduct brought upon him the terrible rebuke,—the dumb ass, speaking with man's voice, forbade the madness of the prophet. Doubtless the bribe of political honors held out to Balaam was really irresistible, and was, as we know, yielded to, but he was at least nominally obedient to the inspiration of God. Despite Balak's entreaty he blessed the people, adding his prophecy of the Messiah, "There shall come a star out of Jacob and a sceptre shall rise out of Israel." It is not necessary to suppose that he could understand how far his prophecy reached; that he thought it only political is clear from the next verses: its spiritual truth was beyond his ken. After this Balaam returned home, but with the Midianite princes—who were leagued with Balak (Num. xxii. 4-7)—he plotted the licentious feast into which Israel fell, and for which Moses inflicted a fearful vengeance. Balaam himself thus helped to bring on a momentary fulfillment of his prophecy, "He shall smite the corners of Moab and destroy all the children of Sheth." He fell in the battle that broke the power of the Midianites (Num. xxxi. 1-10). His is a very fascinating history. A prophet of God though a heathen, using this influence for temporal good among his people, ambitious, self-willed, vain of his political sagacity, his was a character of mingled clay and gold, and was strong and weak in proportion. Not above the ideas of his day in his surroundings, though as prophet of the One God holding the clue to higher principles, he probably deemed his counsel to the Midianites a stroke of real policy, and did not at all enter into the peculiar purposes of God in the separation of Israel from among the Gentiles. This was far beyond all he had ever learned of God's merciful dealings with men. Sharing the political views of his tribe, he fell from the pure height into a sin that brought him under the edge of the sword. He is a type of a large human nature touching many sides and appealing to our sympathies. In many respects, too, he typifies the character which, rising above demagogism, yet does not rank above the trickery of the politician when it has the opportunity to become a statesman.

But as one of those permitted to prophesy, no matter how obscurely, yet to prophesy of CHRIST, and to leave this prophecy among his people, which finally should bring the wise men to the cradle of the Star of Jacob, Balaam claims of us a special attention. It was not necessary that he should understand the full reach of his prophecy, but assuredly he understood much of its political bearing, and, therefore, it added to his responsibility in his after-action. To us it is a proof that God did not leave Himself without witness among the Gentiles.

Bands. A part of the clerical dress that has now almost entirely fallen into disuse. It is a remnant of the ancient amice. In reality it is a part of the full dress for lawyers, as well as clergymen in the English Church, but there, as well as here, it is hardly ever to be seen.

Banners are of late origin. In the Bible the "banner" appears to have been merely a pole with some device upon it, as a rallying-point for the squadron (or worked into the sail of the ship if used at sea). It was not a flag, whatever standards were used. Rabbinical writers state that the standards for the four divisions of the tribes upon their march (Numb. ii.) were, for Judah, a lion; for Reuben, a man; for Ephraim, an ox; for Dan, an eagle. But this is mere tradition; compare, however, the Vision of Ezekiel (ch. x.) and of the Revelation (ch. iv.). But the banner, as a flag, belongs rather to the age of Chivalry, and is a heraldic standard, and so it passed into Church usage. There is no authorization for its use in our services. In the Sunday-school celebrations it appears to be quite appropriate, and certainly most unobjectionable. Banners were formerly a part of the accustomed ornaments of the altar, and were suspended over it.

Banns; Banns of Marriage. The word "bann" comes from the Low Latin, signifying to proclaim an edict; hence the edict or proclamation itself, and thence, in the Church, a proclamation of marriage between parties then and there named. The publication of banns of marriage is not required in this country, though the custom is in many places still carried out.

The form in England is as follows: After the second lesson, at morning prayer (or if there be no morning prayer at evening prayer), for three several Sundays previous, "the curate shall say, after the accustomed manner, I publish the banns of marriage between M. of — and N. of —. If any of you know cause or just impediment why these two persons should not be joined together in holy matrimony, ye are to declare it. This is the first (second, or third) time of asking." But now marriages may also be celebrated without either banns or license upon production of the superintendent registrar's certificate.

Baptism. One of the two great sacraments "generally necessary to salvation," "ordained by CHRIST Himself" (vide SACRAMENT) as a means of initiation into His Church, and "a sign of regeneration or new birth" (Article of Religion XXVII.); whereby we are made "members of CHRIST, children of God, and heirs of the Kingdom of Heaven" (Catechism).

In considering baptism we shall set forth (A) The history of the sacrament; (B) the outward sign and manner of administration; (C) The Covenant: (1) the inward grace, (2) the conditions required of those who come; (D) by whom and to whom it is to be administered.

(A) THE HISTORY.—The washing with water as an emblem of purity was of very ancient origin and of general use. It is specially to be found among Eastern nations. Classical writers, both Greek and Latin, frequently allude to it as a means of purification before offering sacrifices, and of removing ceremonial uncleanness. (See Smith's Bible Dictionary.)

In the Mosaic Ritual washing or bathing in water is constantly prescribed as a means of ceremonial purification. Numerous such commands are found in the Pentateuch, both for the priests and the people. Thus, before going into the sanctuary the priests were to wash their hands and their feet, "that they died not" (Ex. xxx. 20). For this purpose, and also for washing the vessels and things used in the sacrifices, Moses was ordered to place a laver of brass between the altar and the tabernacle. Solomon made ten lavers and "a molten sea" to be put before the Temple (2 Chron. iv. 1-6). It is these divers washings that are referred to in Mark vii. 4, and Heb. ix. 10; in both places the Greek word being "Baptisms."

That the deep spiritual signification of the ceremony was understood appears from many passages of the Old Testament: "Wash me thoroughly from mine iniquity and cleanse me from my sin" (Ps. li. 2); "I will wash mine hands in innocency, O Lord, and so will I go to Thine altar" (Ps. xxvi. 6); "Wash thine heart from wickedness" (Jer. iv. 14).

Jewish writers of a later date tell us that proselytes from the heathen received a baptism as well as circumcision as a sign of the putting away of the old life and admission into the new as God's people.

It is evident that the idea of spiritual purification was in the minds of the Jews connected with washing or baptism. And thus we can understand the readiness with which they came to John "preaching the baptism of repentance for remission of sins;" and that they at first saw in him the promised MESSIAH, who was to bring remission of sins. And when he denied this, they naturally asked, "Why baptizest thou, then?" His answer pointed to the higher baptism of which his was the preparation, the baptism of water and of the SPIRIT.

When the CHRIST instituted baptism as the great sacrament of forgiveness of sins, and initiation into His Church, He only adapted an old custom well known to the Jews and other people; though in so doing He gave it a wider use and deeper meaning. It does not appear that the CHRIST Himself ever baptized, but His disciples did; the character of this rite is not described. After His resurrection the commission given to the Apostles is clear: "Go ye therefore and teach (make disciples of) all nations, baptizing them" (Matt. xxviii. 19). And it is very certain that the disciples understood that this rite was the "outward visible sign" of remission of sins and reception into the Church, CHRIST'S Body. For whenever men, convinced by their preaching that JESUS was the SON of GOD, the MESSIAS, asked, "What shall we do?" the uniform answer was, "Repent and be baptized for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the HOLY GHOST" (Acts ii. 38. See also Acts viii. 12, 36; x. 47; xxii. 16). Thus baptism took the place of circumcision as the means of entering into covenant with God, and as all who were circumcised were called Israelites, so all baptized persons were called Christians. Nor had any a right to assume the name until admitted into the Church by baptism.

It is unnecessary to show further that from the Apostolic times baptism has been regarded by the Church as essential. However they may differ as to its meaning and modes of administration, all "who profess and call themselves Christian" agree in this.

(B) THE OUTWARD SIGN AND MANNER OF ADMINISTRATION.—The Catechism teaches that "the outward visible sign or form in baptism" is "water, wherein the person is baptized, In the Name of the FATHER, and of the SON, and of the HOLY GHOST." Two things, then, are to be considered, the WATER and the WORD.

(1) That WATER is an essential part of baptism we learn from the words of our LORD to Nicodemus: "Except a man be born of water, and of the SPIRIT, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God" (St. John iii. 5). So also St. Peter after that the HOLY GHOST had fallen upon Cornelius and those with him, said, "Can any man forbid water, that these should not be baptized?" (Acts x. 47). And the testimony of the Church is so clear as to the fact, and it is one so universally admitted, that it is unnecessary to take up space with quotations from the Fathers.

But while there is no doubt as to the use of water in this sacrament, there is a difference of opinion and custom as to the mode of administration; whether it should be by sprinkling, or pouring, or immersion.

As regards sprinkling, though it may be regarded as valid, yet it is irregular, there being no authority for its use. The rubric in the office in the American Prayer-Book orders that the minister taking the child "shall dip it in the water discreetly, or shall pour water upon it." In the English office there are two rubrics, the first ordering dipping in the water discreetly and warily, "provided that the sponsors shall certify that the child may well endure it." Another adds, "but if they certify that the child is weak, it shall suffice to pour water upon it." The same direction is given for the baptism of adults. Thus our Church allows as valid and regular either "dipping" or "pouring," giving precedence to the former. Blunt says (Annotated Prayer-Book): "There can be no question that affusion, if thoroughly performed, is amply sufficient for the due administration of the sacrament of baptism. In such a climate as ours, with such habits as those of modern times, and all its consequences considered, the dipping of infants could seldom be seemly, and would often be attended with danger. The 'weakness' of the rubric may justly be assumed as the normal condition of infants brought up under such conditions."

Thus pouring the water has come to be with us the usual form of administration. But great care should be taken that water be poured freely over the head of the child or person from the hollow of the minister's hand, so that there may be no possible doubt of the actual contact of the water with the person. To insure this no covering should be retained on the head at that time.

Trine Immersion,—i.e., the dipping or the pouring of the water at the naming of each Person of the Trinity, making three times,—though not ordered by the rubric, is a very ancient custom, worthy to be observed as teaching the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, and rendering more certain the contact with the water.

Total Immersion.—As regards this, which some hold to be essential to baptism, we have seen that the Church does not require it. Is she right in allowing this discretion? There appears little doubt that the usual custom of the early Church was to lead the candidate into the water and there dip him three times while repeating the prescribed formula. And it is urged that St. Paul alludes to this in the well-known text, "Therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death" (Rom. vi. 4). Too much stress has been laid upon an argument drawn from a figurative passage, from which, if the whole be thus taken literally, we might also prove that we ought to be crucified as he was. Doubtless there is here an allusion to the usual manner of baptizing, but scarcely intended as making it essential. From old drawings in the catacombs at Rome, it appears that the candidate was led into the water, and he standing there, the water was poured over his head. But even if total immersion generally obtained in the early Church, it never was considered essential. What was called clinic baptism, or the baptism of the sick and weak, was by pouring, so also where water was scarce, as in prison or in the desert, and these were held so valid that Canons were passed forbidding the rebaptizing of such.

If we turn to the New Testament, we find that in many of the instances there recorded immersion would have been highly improbable if not impossible. How could the three thousand baptized on the day of Pentecost, or the five thousand afterwards added, have been immersed in Jerusalem? Nor is it probable that the jailer of Philippi could have been immersed in the prison. The word baptized does not always mean immersion; "the baptizing of tables" (Mark vii. 4), and the "divers baptizings" of the law, were really washings. The Israelites "were baptized upon Moses in the cloud and in the sea" (1 Cor. x. 2). Yet they went over dry-shod; the Egyptians, indeed, were immersed. St. Peter also declares baptism to be the "figure" of (literally, antitype, i.e., "that which corresponds to and was figured by") the salvation of Noah in the Ark by water (1 Peter iii. 21). Yet Noah was borne upon the water, and rained upon from heaven; he was not immersed, as were the unbelievers. Great stress has been laid upon the account of the baptism of the eunuch (Acts viii. 38): "And they went down both into the water, both Philip and the eunuch; and he baptized him. And when they were come up out of the water," etc. But this really proves nothing, except, indeed, the necessity of water. For, first, the Greek words translated "into" and "out of" (eis and ek), mean also the place towards which and from which there is motion; second, one may "go down into" and "come up out of" a water without immersing the whole body; and, third, if total immersion be meant, then must Philip the minister as well as the eunuch have been immersed, for it reads, "they went down both into the water," which proves too much. Most probably both standing in the water, Philip taking up thereof in his hand or in a vessel, baptized by pouring over the head of the eunuch.

We assert, then, that Scripture and the Church prescribe nothing as to the precise manner of administering the water of baptism. It is therefore one of those ceremonies and rites which may be changed by particular Churches "according to the diversity of countries, times, and men's manners, so that nothing be ordained against God's Word" (Art. XXXIV.).

(2) THE FORM OF WORDS.—About this there can be no dispute. The dipping in or the pouring on of water must be accompanied by the words prescribed by our LORD: "In the Name of the FATHER, and of the SON, and of the HOLY GHOST." Without these no baptism is valid, "for these are essential parts of baptism." (See rubric at end of "Private Baptism of Children.")

But what is meant by "Baptizing in the Name"? Not only by the authority of, as His ministers, though this is meant, but also and especially "into the name," as it should be translated. For "the name" was put for the thing itself: thus, "His name shall be called JESUS (SAVIOUR), for He shall save;" "They shall call His name EMMANUEL," for He is "God with us." The sacred name FATHER, SON, and HOLY GHOST is put upon the baptized, as that of JEOVAH was upon the children of Israel (Num. vi. 27), whereby they were made a holy, peculiar people. Thus to be baptized into "the name" means into the Holy Trinity, for "the name" of old meant God Himself, as in the revelation to Moses from the burning bush the name I AM, is God. Therefore the Hebrews always spoke with the deepest reverence of THE NAME. It was not "to be taken in vain;" "Incense was to be offered to it;" "In it men were to trust." The Old Testament is full of such expressions, by which we learn that "The Name" is God Himself, or, rather, the revelation of God. To know God's name is to know Him; to do anything by or in His name is to do it by or in Him. So also in the New Testament we read: "Hallowed be Thy Name;" "His name, through faith in His name, hath made this man strong;" "At the name of JESUS every knee should bow." And numerous texts can be quoted where the name of JESUS is put for Himself.

Therefore, when He whose name is EMMANUEL, "God with us," is about to send forth His messengers to deliver men from bondage to sin and death, of which that of Egypt was the type, He speaks to them from the risen body, dead, yet alive, seeing no corruption, of which the Bush was the emblem, and gives them His new name to be put upon His people, as He did of old to Moses,—a new name expressing the fuller revelation of Himself, "FATHER, SON, and HOLY GHOST," not three names, but one, for He says not into the names, but into the Name expressing the unity of the Godhead in the Trinity of the Persons. This Holy Name is to be said over them, and into union with this Holy Trinity they are by baptism received.

This, we remark in passing, is also in brief the creed of the Church, as taught in our Catechism. For all Confessions of Faith are enlargements or developments or explanations of this divinely-given formula. With what reverence and awe should it be regarded!

(c) THE COVENANT.—As under the old dispensation God made a covenant with His people whereby they were made His, circumcision being the outward sign and seal thereof, so has He made the new covenant in JESUS (Hebrews xii. 24), whereof baptism is the outward sign and pledge. This was foretold by the prophet Ezekiel: "Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean; from all your filthiness and from all your idols will I cleanse you. A new heart also will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you, and I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh, and I will give you an heart of flesh" (Ezek. xxxvi. 25, 26).

In this covenant there are the two parties, God and man. What God offers is entirely a free gift or grace from Him; He annexes to its reception such conditions as He may please, but they are in no way of the nature of an equivalent; man cannot purchase them; so St. Paul writes, "By grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves it is the gift of God; not of works, lest any man should boast" (Eph. ii. 8). We are thus led to consider, first, God's part, and, second, man's part in the covenant made in baptism.

(1) THE INWARD GRACE OF BAPTISM.—The Catechism defines this to be "a death unto sin, and a new birth unto righteousness; for, being by nature born in sin, and the children of wrath, we are hereby made the children of grace." And the child is taught that in baptism it "was made a member of CHRIST, the child of God, and an inheritor of the kingdom of heaven." This is called REGENERATION (which see); according to our LORD'S Word, "Ye must be born again." "Except a man be born of water and of the SPIRIT, he cannot enter into the kingdom of GOD."

GOD gives in baptism, 1st. Remission of sins; as St. Peter said to the multitude asking, "What shall we do?" "Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of JESUS CHRIST for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the HOLY GHOST" (Acts ii. 38); as also it was said unto Saul, "Arise and be baptized, and wash away thy sins" (Acts xxii. 16).

2d. Membership in His Church, the Body of CHRIST: "For by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body;" "Now ye are the body of CHRIST, and members in particular" (1 Cor. xii. 13, 27); "His body's sake, which is the Church" (Col. i. 24).

3d. Adoption as His children, and with this the gift of the HOLY SPIRIT and heirship of heaven: "For ye are all the children of GOD by faith in CHRIST JESUS, for as many of you as have been baptized into CHRIST have put on CHRIST;" "And because ye are sons, GOD hath sent forth the SPIRIT of His SON into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father. . . . And if a son, then an heir of GOD through CHRIST" (Gal. iii. 27; iv. 6, 7).

The Church, then, for her teaching has most certain warrant of Holy Scripture. Following this, in the baptismal service, she bids us pray GOD to "sanctify this water to the mystical washing away of sin." The sponsors are exhorted to pray for the person now to be baptized, "That our LORD JESUS CHRIST would vouchsafe to receive him, to release him from sin, to sanctify him with the HOLY GHOST, and to give him the Kingdom of Heaven and everlasting life." And the newly-baptized is spoken of as "regenerate and grafted into the body of CHRIST'S Church." The XXVII. Article of Religion declares that "Baptism . . . is also a sign of regeneration, or new birth, whereby they that receive baptism rightly are grafted into the Church, the promises of forgiveness of sin and of our adoption to be the sons of GOD by the HOLY GHOST are visibly signed and sealed." (Vide REGENERATION for further proofs.)

(2) THE CONDITIONS REQUIRED IN THOSE WHO COME TO BE BAPTIZED.—Though the benefits of baptism are entirely a free gift from GOD, yet has He seen fit to prescribe certain conditions with which man must comply before he can claim the promises. These are in the Catechism declared to be "Repentance, whereby they forsake sin; and faith, whereby they steadfastly believe the promises of GOD made to them in that sacrament;" or, as it is set forth in the questions asked at the baptism, Renunciation of sin, belief in the Articles of the Christian Faith, and an honest purpose throughout life to keep GOD'S Commandments. Repentance and Faith have been called the hands stretched forth to take hold of GOD'S gifts. But even these are of Him, "for it is GOD that worketh in us both to will and to do." With the grace of baptism He gives the capacity for these, just as in the natural birth He gives the various faculties of mind and body. It is man's part to realize this and use the spiritual life and power thus given him "to work out his salvation." (Vide further in REGENERATION.)

(D) THE MINISTER AND SUBJECTS OF BAPTISM—Lay Baptism.—Ordinarily this sacrament is to be administered by one in holy orders, for it was in the original commission given to the Apostles that they should baptize. In the Acts of the Apostles we read of Philip the Deacon baptizing the Samaritans and the eunuch of Ethiopia. It certainly would seem right that the act of receiving into CHRIST'S Church should be by one duly commissioned as an ambassador for CHRIST. The Prayer-Book requires that it shall be by a minister; a deacon may act in the absence of the priest. Notwithstanding this, the universal tradition and practice of the Church from the earliest ages has allowed the validity of lay baptism in cases of necessity, a rebaptism never being required for such persons. The question was fully discussed in the Church of Carthage, with the above conclusion. And, therefore, in our own Church, lay baptism is recognized by general custom, though there is no authority for it in the Prayer-Book, unless it be implied in the rubric appended to the "Office for Private Baptism," which limits the essentials of baptism to "water, in the Name," etc., but says nothing of the necessity of a lawful minister; the rubric in the service itself, however, requires "a lawful minister." It is well here to notice, as an historical fact, that in the first Prayer-Book, that of 1549 A.D., the rubric directed that "when great need shall compel them so to do," "one of them present" shall baptize the child. In 1603 A.D., after the Hampton Conference, to meet the prejudices of the Puritans (!), the words "lawful minister" were substituted for "one of them," and in the revision of 1662 A.D. the rubric took its present form. There is in this allowance of lay baptism, a departure from the strictness of the Church as regards orders; but universal custom seems to sanction it; some writers take the ground that any irregularity or defect in such baptism is made good by confirmation. Others hold that there is a priesthood in every Christian sufficient to make his act valid; these making a distinction between that which he has the power to do and that which he has the right to do.

Adult Baptism.—There is a special service provided for the baptism of those of riper years. The persons are required to answer for themselves, the sponsors being "their chosen witnesses." The rubric directs that "due care be taken for their examination, whether they be sufficiently instructed in the Principles of the Christian Religion; and that they be exhorted to prepare themselves with Prayer and Fasting for the receiving of this holy sacrament." There is also a rubric that "It is expedient that every person thus baptized should be confirmed by the Bishop so soon after his baptism as conveniently may be, that so he may be admitted to the Holy Communion."

Infant Baptism.—Though there is no direct command in the New Testament to baptize infants, yet the inference that it was done by the Apostles is so strong as to amount to proof. Baptism took the place of circumcision. Infants were circumcised, and so received into the old covenant; the Apostles naturally, unless forbidden, would baptize infants and receive them into the new covenant. So far from being forbidden, we read that the only time JESUS was "much displeased" was when the disciples rebuked those who brought to Him young children, saying, "Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not; for of such is the kingdom of God." If infants are of the kingdom, surely they may receive that rite which admits into the kingdom (St. Mark x. 13). St. Peter, commanding the Jews to be baptized, adds: "For the promise is unto you, and to your children" (Acts ii. 39). St. Paul on several occasions baptized whole households; there must have been children in some if not all of these.

But when we take the testimony of the Universal Church from the beginning, the proof is overwhelming. We have not space for quotations, suffice it to say "that all testimony of writers down to the twelfth century affirms its use," and "there is not one saying, quotation, or example that makes against it."

But we have seen that repentance and faith are required of those who come to baptism, and it is argued that as infants are incapable of these they should not be baptized. But for this the Church provides by requiring sureties or sponsors, who promise these both in the child's name. Their duty it is to see that it be taught, so soon as it be able to learn, what has been done for it, and to urge it at the proper time to fulfill the same by taking upon itself the baptismal obligations, so that it may also enter upon the full baptismal privileges, just as the law allows children to hold property, but requires guardians to act for the minor until it comes of age, assumes full possession, and acts for itself.

Public Infant Baptism should be administered in church, either at Morning or Evening Prayer, immediately after the second lesson, both because it is an act in which the congregation are to take part, and also "for the better instructing of the People in the grounds of Infant Baptism." Nor ought baptism to be deferred till long after birth, as is too much the custom. The rubric says, not "longer than the first or second Sunday." It may not always be possible to comply with this, but there should be no unnecessary delay.

Private Infant Baptism is only allowed for "great cause and necessity;" a shortened form is provided to be used in such case. Though this be a lawful and sufficient baptism, still, if the child live, "it is expedient that it be brought into the Church," that "the Congregation may be certified of the true form of Baptism, and it be received publicly as one of the flock of true Christian People."

Baptism (Holy), Office of. The services in our Prayer-Book for the administration of baptism are taken almost word for word from those in the English book. The important changes are that permission is given for shortening the service for infant baptism in case it is used in the same church more than once a month, and that the sign of the cross may be omitted if the omission be specially desired, "although the Church knows no worthy cause of scruple concerning the same." The form of the service for infant baptism is not closely connected with that of ancient rituals, the reason being in great part, doubtless, because the Reformers thought it necessary to introduce exhortations, and to make the service a means of instruction to the congregation; and for this latter reason it is ordered that it shall be used in the midst of either Morning or Evening Prayer. Since 1552 A.D. the whole of the service has been said at the font; the book of 1549 A.D. ordered the first part, as far as the address to the godfathers and godmothers, to be said at the church-door and the rest at the font. This first part seems to correspond to the ancient form of making a catechumen, consisting of a call to prayer, a petition for God's blessing on the child, a short Gospel, followed by a comment and exhortation based upon it, and a prayer which includes a thanksgiving. The minister then passes to the second part of the service, which is the special preparation for the sacrament. The sponsors are exhorted as to the meaning of the act, and are asked to answer in the child's name. The questions call for a renunciation (on which in early days great stress was laid), a profession of faith, an expression of desire for baptism, and a promise of obedience. Two of the answers in our service differ from those in the English book: the first, by the addition of all after the words "I renounce them all"; and the last, by the addition of the words "by God's help." Then follow four short prayers for spiritual blessings, and a prayer for the blessing of the water. These prayers (or those which correspond to them) are not in the service of 1549 A.D., but will be found at the end of the form for private baptism, with a direction that when the water in the font is changed, which shall be once a month at the least, they shall be used before any child is baptized in it. Since 1552 A.D., the water has been put anew in the font at each baptism; this has been directed by rubric since 1662 A.D. The third part of the service consists of the baptism itself, which our Church allows to be either by immersion or by affusion (no permission is given for aspersion), and the making of the sign of the cross upon the child's forehead. Then in the fourth part the people are bidden to prayer, the LORD's Prayer is used as the rightful utterance of the child of GOD, and it is followed by thanksgiving and prayer, and by exhortations to the sponsors to remember and to fulfill their duties to the child, and to see that in due time it is brought to the Bishop for confirmation. It does not belong to this article to speak of the doctrine of Baptism; but the historical fact may be stated that this last call to prayer and the prayer itself, both of which declare that the child is regenerate, were not in the first book of Edward VI. (1549 A.D.), but were inserted in his second book in 1552 A.D.

The service for private baptism, containing also a form for publicly receiving into the Church such as have been privately baptized, calls for no special notice. But with reference to the conditional form of baptism, which is placed at the end of the service, it may be of interest to quote two rubrics from the Prayer-Book which was set forth by Bishop Torry, of St. Andrew's, in 1848 A.D., as embodying a custom in the Scotch Church: "From the unhappy multiplicity of religious sects in this country, cases frequently occur in which persons, from conscientious motives, express a desire to separate themselves from such sects, and to unite themselves to the Church. In all such instances, when the applicants for admission into the Church, after due instruction, shall express a doubt of the validity of the Baptism which they have received from the Minister of the sect to which they formerly belonged, the clergyman to whom the application is made shall baptize the person in the hypothetical form prescribed in this office. In cases where such doubt does not exist, it shall suffice to receive the person into the Church in this manner: he first kneeling down, the Minister shall take him by the hand and say, We receive this person," etc. The former of these two rubrics was taken from the 17th of the former Canons of the Scotch Church; its substance, with the direction for the use of the hypothetical form of words, is in the 34th of the present Canons, § 4.

The English Church needed no office for the ministration of baptism to such as are of riper years until after the Great Rebellion. Then, in part because it was hoped that there would be great numbers of converts among the natives of America, and still more because so many had grown up unbaptized at home, a service was prepared (it is said by Bishop Griffith, of St. Asaph) and inserted in the book of 1662 A.D., from which it has passed into our own. Its outline is the same as that for infant baptism, and the changes which were made will readily explain themselves.

Baptistery. The building or chamber set apart for the celebration of the sacrament of baptism. It was usually attached to the larger, or cathedral church, since the administration of the rite was usual there only. A spacious building was necessary, as the sacrament was administered by immersion, either simply or accompanied by aspersion. As many as three thousand were baptized on Easter-eve when St. Chrysostom was arrested, and many, both men and women, who had not yet received the sacrament, were dispersed. The oldest baptistery now in existence, at Ravenna, is older than 425-430 A.D. It is octagonal, about forty feet in diameter, with two niches, or apses. It has two stories. The font, which is in the centre and octagonal, has a semicircular indentation in the side, where the priest can stand to immerse without descending into the water. The walls are decorated with figures in low relief in stucco, but the dome is covered with mosaics; the central portion representing the baptism of our LORD. Baptisteries of later date are found in various parts of Europe, but as adult baptisms fell into disuse, the baptistery was not needed, and the font was transferred to the church. There it has happened that the canopy under which the font was placed was so enlarged and enriched as to be supported upon its own pillars, and so be almost a baptistery within the church. Examples of this occur in England.

Barnabas. (Son of prophecy or exhortation (Rev. Vers.); not so correctly in A.V., "of consolation.") A Levite by descent, a Cypriote by birth, and by some (Clem. Alex., Strom. ii. 176) said to be one of the seventy, was one of the earliest prominent members of the infant Church (Acts iv. 36). His real name, Joseph (or Joses), has been overshadowed by the name given him by the Apostles. His act of giving the price of a field which he had sold to the Church is the first notice we have of him. He takes Saul after his conversion (Acts ix. 27) to the Apostles as though there had been a previous friendship between them. When he saw the growth of the Gentile Church at Antioch he sought Saul at Tarsus and brought him there, as if knowing Saul's special mission to the Gentiles. With Saul he carried the relief the Church at Antioch sent to Jerusalem upon occasion of the famine (Acts xi. 30). Upon their return they were set apart by direction of the HOLY GHOST for their first missionary journey (Acts xiii., xiv.), which was first to Cyprus (where Saul took the name of Paul), and into Asia Minor as far as Derbe, in Lycaonia. Returning to Perga, they sailed to the port of Seleucia, and so returned home to Antioch. They were associated together in the struggle against the Judaizers in the question of circumcision, and were sent from the Council of Jerusalem with honor back to Antioch. When the second missionary journey was proposed, they disagreed as to the propriety of taking his nephew, John Mark, with them. "The contention was so sharp that they parted asunder." Since the brethren commended St. Paul to the grace of God, it has been inferred that Barnabas was in the wrong. This is the last notice in the Acts. St. Paul speaks of him in Gal. ii. St. Barnabas was emphatically a good man and full of the HOLY GHOST, but does not seem to have had that energetic determination that was so marked in St. Paul. He was impressed by St. Peter even when intimately associated with St. Paul (Gal. ii. 13). What his after-career was is not authentically told us. One tradition sends him to Milan, a later one gave him martyrdom upon his second visit to Cyprus.

An epistle under his name is extant. It has been held authentic by very many able scholars, but is not now admitted as genuine. However, it is a very ancient Christian writing, probably of the earlier part of the second century. It was evidently the work of a very devout but narrow Christian, who neither grasped the beauty of allegorical interpretation nor the true breadth of Christianity. It is a valuable writing, not for its contents, but for the inferences that may be drawn from it. (Feast-day, June 11.)

Bartholomew. Of him we have nothing but the name in the lists of the Apostles. In St. Matt. x. 5, we have Philip and Bartholomew the sixth in the list. In St. Mark iii. 18, with Philip, he is the sixth; as, too, in St. Luke vi. 14. If he is the same as Nathaniel, as some have thought with a great deal of plausibility, we have some clue to his character,—an Israelite indeed in whom is no guile. The arguments relied on are, briefly, (a) The call of St. Bartholomew is not recorded, while the address to Nathaniel is nearly equivalent. (b) The synoptists who mention Bartholomew do not allude to Nathaniel, while St. John does not name Bartholomew, but does Nathaniel. (c) Bar-tholmai is the same as Bar-Jona, St. Peter's other name, or Barnabas, and may be an appellative or a surname, as in the other two cases. But the concurrent tradition of the early Church is utterly silent upon this identification. Any certain tradition, too, about his career is wanting. It is supposed that he evangelized Northern India, leaving there a Hebrew copy of St. Matthew's Gospel, which afterwards was found by Pantænus, the great Alexandrian catechist (190 A.D.); that having once escaped crucifixion through the remorse of his persecutor, he was afterwards flayed alive by King Astyages, at Albanopolis, upon the Caspian Sea. But there is nothing to lead us to suppose that there is any substructure of fact for the tradition. It is only another example of the rule "principles, not men," which marks God's work in the world, while yet these principles are only for man's salvation. (Feast-day, August 24.)

Baruch. (Blessed.) The son of Neriah, and friend and amanuensis of Jeremiah (Jer. xxxii. 12; xxxvi. 10 sq.), was of courtly family. His brother Seriah held office under King Zedekiah. He was accused of urging Jeremiah in favor of the Chaldeans. Josephus says he was imprisoned with the prophet, but was permitted, after the fall of Jerusalem, by Nebuchadnezzar, to remain with Jeremiah, and was forced with him to go down to Egypt. This is the last certain information we have of him. He was a man of courage, as is shown by his steadfast adherence to Jeremiah, and by his acting as his amanuensis. The book attributed to him is apocryphal, though it was received by some of the Fathers, as Athanasius, Cyril of Jerusalem, and Nicephorus. Dr. Ginsburg's conjecture that it was written by some devout Jew about the middle of the second century before CHRIST is probably correct, but the value he puts upon it is as probably exaggerated. It is but a cento of passages from the prayer of Daniel (Dan. ix.), from Deut. xxviii., and from phrases to be found in the prophets, especially Isaiah. The first three chapters may be a translation from some Hebrew imitator, and the last two an addition by the translator, as has been conjectured. But beyond recording the hopes of the Jews under the Seleucidæ or the Ptolomies it is valueless.

Basin; for receiving the alms and other devotions of the congregation in the pro-anaphoral portion of the Communion service. The rubric runs:

"Whilst these sentences are in reading the Deacons, Church-wardens, or other fit persons appointed for that purpose, shall receive the Alms for the Poor and other Devotions of the people in a decent Basin to be provided by the Parish for that purpose; and reverently bring it to the Priest, who shall humbly present and place it upon the Holy Table."

Bath-kol. (Daughter of a voice.) Really, a sort of divination among the later Jews. It was pretended that after the inspiration of the prophets ceased devout men were guided by a voice (Bath-kol); in fact, they put such a construction upon the first words they accidentally heard, after devoutly asking for instruction. To give an instance:

"R. Iochanan and R. Simeon ben Lachish desiring to see the face of R. Samuel, a Babylonish doctor, said, Let us follow the hearing of Bath-kol. Traveling, therefore, near a school, they heard the voice of a boy reading these words out of the first book of Samuel: 'And Samuel died.' From thence the two Rabbis inferred that their friend Samuel was dead; and, indeed, Samuel of Babylon was just dead."

Beatific Vision. "As for me, I will behold Thy face in righteousness: and I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with Thy likeness" (Ps. xvii. 15). "Beloved, now are we the sons of GOD, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that, when He shall appear, we shall be like Him; for we shall see Him as He is" (1 John iii. 2). These texts (and many others) contain the fullness of the doctrine of the highest and final state of blessedness. There is the blessedness of knowledge of GOD, the blessedness of a full Faith, the blessedness of seeing and hearing Him by every means vouchsafed to us here, but beside there will be the blessed joy of seeing Him face to face in holiness in His glory. It is not to be in this life. It was denied to Moses, St. John, and St. Paul; both declare "no man can see God." But in the hereafter we shall see Him face to face. "His servants shall serve Him, and they shall see His face; and His name shall be in their foreheads" (Rev. xxii. 3, 4). But the full glory of the vision of GOD will be, undoubtedly, after the Resurrection.

Beatification. The declaration by the Pope that such or such a holy person, whose life was notably holy and accompanied by miracles, is in eternal bliss, and in consequence permits religious honor to be paid him. In beatification the Pope does not judicially determine the state of the saint, but only so far as to free the religious honors paid to him from the charge of superstition. But in canonization the Pope does determine officially, ex cathedra, the condition of the new saint.

Bel and the Dragon,—Apocrypha. The Greek translations of Daniel contain additions to the original text. The most important are in the Apocrypha, and are the Song of the Three Holy Children, the History of Susanna, and the History of Bel and the Dragon. Bel and the Dragon is placed at the end of Daniel, and in the Septuagint is headed "Part of the prophecy of Habakkuk." There is no evidence that the additions ever formed a part of the Hebrew text. It is surmised that the translator of Daniel may have wrought up current traditions in these additions. The story of the Dragon appears like a "strange exaggeration" of the deliverance of Daniel from the lions (Dan. vi.). The story has received "embellishments in later times." It need not be regarded as a mere fable, but it was shaped for a moral purpose. While Calmet and the Port Royalists strive to trace the history in this work, it may be as well to consider rather its design, "to render idolatry ridiculous, and to exalt the true God." The idol Bel is represented as the object of the king's adoration, while Daniel is a worshiper of "the living God" (v. 5). The king speaks to him of the food which Bel eats, and Daniel declares that the idol is but brass and clay. A contest is brought on between Daniel and the idol priests, and when he shows their duplicity to the king they are slain, and Daniel destroys Bel and his temple. Then follows the killing of the Dragon by Daniel's skill, and the story of the den of lions, with an addition concerning Habakkuk's aid in feeding Daniel.

Bells, The. They are mentioned in the Bible as a part of the High-Priest's dress, fringing the lower edge of his robe, and by their tinkling the people might know when he went into the Holy Place, and when he came out, "that he die not." But in Christian times bells are used to summon the faithful to the services. The earliest bells in use were very small ones,—hand-bells, in fact,—and, trusting to the shape of several that still remain, shaped very much like our cow-bells. In times of persecution a messenger used to summon the congregation; in quiet times a Deacon announced the hours of service. Bells or their equivalents or substitutes were used after Christianity was formally recognized by the state. The oldest use of bells is attributed, but probably wrongly, to Paulinus, Bishop of Nola, in Campania (409 A.D.), but he does not speak of bells at all in his description of his Church. They soon became generally used in the West, and were of considerable size. Charlemagne (800 A.D.) encouraged the founding of bells, and employed skillful founders. Of these, Tancho, of St. Gall, was the chief, who cast a large bell for the great church at Aachen (Aix). He asked for one hundred pounds of silver as alloy for the copper, from which we may infer that the bells may have weighed four or five hundred pounds. In the East bells were introduced from Venice, and were becoming general (865 A.D.), till the Turks, through superstition, forbade their use. So now the summons to service is given by hammering upon a board suspended from a rope or chain (Vide SEMANTRON) or held by the centre in the hand. It was usually twelve feet long and from a foot to a foot and a half wide, and was reduced in the centre to a width sufficient to let it be grasped by the hand. It was struck with a hammer or mallet. Sometimes the semantron is made of iron or of brass.

Turketul, Abbot of Crowland (870 A.D.), gave seven bells to his monastery, probably the first peal in England. Kinsius of York (1051-61 A.D.) gave the Church of St. John, at Beverley, two great bells.

From the time that Church utensils were first used there was always some act of dedication of them to sacred and hallowed use. Forms for the benediction of bells are found in the later MSS. Sacramentarium of Gregory, and probably date from the time of Alcuin (790 A.D.). Upon many church-bells was placed the Latin doggerel,—

Laudo Deum verum, Plebem voco, congrego clerum, Defunctos ploro, Pestem fugo, Festa decoro.

A peal is of seven or more bells; a chime of three or more. For rules for ringing chimes and peals any hand-book on bells may be consulted.

For churches in the country the bell should be selected, if possible, with reference to the position of the church; if upon an eminence or on a plain, a bell of the lowest tone that can be heard the farthest (and it should be heard at least three miles) is the proper one to choose. From E to A should be the general range of the note.

Bema. The name of the Bishop's throne in the primitive Church, or, possibly, the whole apse itself. The Bishop's throne was anciently placed in the centre against the wall, and the sedilia for the Presbyters were ranged on either hand, while in the centre of the apse the altar was placed.

Benatura. A holy water stoup.

Benedicite. (The Song of the Three Children.) A hymn found in the Septuagint version of the book of Daniel, and also in the Apocrypha, but not occurring in the Hebrew Scripture. It is said to have been sung by Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah after their miraculous deliverance from the fiery furnace, as recorded in Daniel iii. It resembles very much the 148th Psalm, and is said by many to be only an expansion of it. It was probably used in the Jewish synagogue worship, and so passed into early Christian usage. It was certainly in use in the days of St. Athanasius (325-60 A.D.). St. Chrysostom (425 A.D.) calls it "that admirable and marvelous song, which from that day to this has been sung everywhere throughout the world, and shall yet be sung by future generations." It was incorporated into the offices, common to both the English and Gallican Churches, and from thence it passed into its present place in the Prayer-Book of 1549 A.D., which it has kept ever since. In that Prayer-Book this rubric was prefixed to the Te Deum:

"After the first lesson shall follow Te Deum laudamus in English daily throughout the year except in Lent, all the which time in the place of Te Deum shall be used Benedicite omnia Opera Domini Domino in English, as followeth." (In the first Prayer-Book the hymn ran thus:

"O ALL ye works of the LORD speak good of the LORD: praise Him and set Him up forever."

In the second Prayer-Book (1552 A.D.) it was changed to the present form.) In 1552 this restriction was removed. However, the rule is often followed now, but it would be well to use it when Gen. i. is read. It has been commented on in a devotional tone by several recent writers, for which it is admirably adapted, bringing forth, as it can be well made to do, the glory of GOD in all His works.

Benediction. The act of blessing and the form of blessing. "And without all contradiction the less is blessed of the better" (Heb. vii. 7). In Patriarchal days the blessing of the children was a most sacred and important act. Abraham had his children blessed of GOD. Isaac was deceived into giving Jacob the greater blessing, but would not alter it. Jacob left a solemn prophetic blessing of his twelve sons. In the later history, Moses had given him the form of blessing the people, a form the Church has incorporated into her Office of Visitation of the Sick. It was a solemn threefold utterance of THE NAME, which was then put upon the children of Israel: "The LORD bless thee and keep thee. The LORD make His Face shine upon thee and be gracious unto thee. The LORD lift up His countenance upon thee and give thee peace. And they shall put MY NAME upon the children of Israel and I will bless them."

In all lands and in all times the reception of a benediction has always been highly valued, and this formal putting of GOD's blessing upon His people is of the highest importance. In the Prayer-Book there are six formulas of benediction and three prayers for special benediction. The first is the mutual benediction of both priest and people in the versicles: "The LORD be with you, R. and with thy spirit." The second is the benediction taken from 2 Cor. xiii. 14: "The grace of our LORD JESUS CHRIST and the love of GOD and the fellowship of the HOLY GHOST be with us all evermore," in which the variation of "us" for "you," though apparently slight when compared with the same benediction in St. James's Liturgy, hints at the possibility that St. Paul may have quoted from the Liturgy, and that our own use came not from the form in the New Testament, but from this ancient Liturgy. This blessing closes both Morning and Evening Prayer and the Burial service. The third form is the beautiful one formed by the English Church from an old Anglo-Saxon form and a benediction by St. Paul. The first part is from Phil. iv. 6, 7: "The peace of GOD which passeth all understanding shall keep your hearts and minds through JESUS CHRIST," but enlarged. The second part is also enlarged from this blessing in Leofric's Exeter Pontifical: "The blessing of GOD the FATHER, and of the SON, and of the HOLY GHOST, and the peace of the LORD be ever with you." This is used at the Holy Communion, at ordination, and at the consecration of a church. The latter part was also placed by the Caroline revisers (1662 A.D.) after the Confirmation Office. The fourth form is the one divinely commanded to be put upon the Holy People, and was incorporated into the Office for the Visitation of the Sick. The fifth form is the blessing (taken from Heb. xiii. 20, 21) in the Office of Institution. There is no alteration in this form. The sixth form is the one at the close of the Marriage service. It is modeled upon the one in the English Office, but differs from it materially. The English form is this: "ALMIGHTY GOD, who at the beginning did create our first parents, Adam and Eve, and did sanctify and join them together in marriage; Pour upon you the riches of His grace, sanctify and bless you, that ye may please Him both in body and soul, and live together in holy love unto your lives' end. Amen." Our American form is: "GOD the FATHER, GOD the SON, GOD the HOLY GHOST bless, preserve, and keep you. The LORD mercifully with His favor look upon you and fill you with all spiritual benediction and grace, that ye may so live together in this life that in the world to come ye may have life everlasting. Amen."

The three prayers of benediction are, first, the Invocation in the Holy Communion: "And we most humbly beseech Thee, O merciful Father, to hear us; and of Thy almighty goodness vouchsafe to bless and sanctify with Thy Word and Holy Spirit these Thy gifts and creatures of bread and wine." The second is the prayer for the blessing of the water in the Baptismal Office. The third is properly a series of prayers in the Form of Consecration of a Church or Chapel. The first being the prayer "O Eternal God," and the Collects following; the second, after the sentence of consecration is read, the prayer, "Blessed be Thy Name, O LORD," etc.; and after the Morning Prayer and Communion service the last prayer, "Blessed be Thy Name, O LORD GOD," etc. Of course the service closes with The Peace of God.

The acts of blessing are oft repeated, sometimes daily, as, for instance, grace at meat. In the primitive Church many forms of benediction were used; as of the utensils and furniture of a church, as well as of persons.

It were well if a little thought were spent upon the value and solemnity of benedictions, chiefly those given to us at the Church's services, but also on less solemn occasions. To have His name put upon us is no light thing, but of itself a rich and abiding gift, unless we cast it from us. Then as the acts of God's officer are not mere forms, but true and effectual actions, we receive of GOD true and effectual blessing as we fit ourselves for it and give due heed to it.

Benedictus. The second of the two hymns after the second lesson at Morning Prayer. It is the hymn of Zacharias, the father of St. John Baptist, at his son's circumcision. The English places it first, and recites it at length; but the American Church places it second, and recites but four verses. If the tone of the hymn be noted carefully, it will be seen to be fitly used from Advent Sunday to Trinity Sunday, while the Jubilate is more proper for the Trinity season. It was intended in the English service to be used constantly, the Jubilate being given as an alternate, to avoid the repetition of the Benedictus when it should occur in the second lesson. Its ritual use has come to us from the Gallikan and Salisbury uses.

Benefice. It was used to signify the gift of land given to the soldier out of conquered territory. "Hence, doubtless, came the word benefice to be applied to Church livings; for, besides that the ecclesiastics held for life, like the soldiers, the riches of the Church arose from the beneficence of princes." (Burns, Eccl. Law.) In the American Church no such thing as a benefice is properly known, since our parishes and churches are erected and supported under different conditions of life from those in which the Church in Europe grew. A benefice is the growth of different customs from ours. A benefice requires to be erected by Episcopal authority; to be founded for purely spiritual purposes; to be conferred upon a clerk in orders; it must be perpetual, and given to another person than him who confers it. In obtaining a benefice, then, there must be, I. Presentation by the proper person to the Bishop of the nominee. II. Examination by the Bishop. III. Refusal (generally from want of learning); or, IV. Admission. V. Institution (when the nominee is presented by a patron to the Bishop or Collation (when the Bishop presents a benefice in his own gift). VI. Induction, usually by the Archdeacon. VII. Duty after induction. A benefice is a different thing from a cathedral preferment; for it has a cure of souls, which a cathedral preferment hath not.

Benefit of Clergy. A mediæval custom by which accused persons who proved themselves to be "clerks" by reading Latin could claim to be tried by the Bishop's, instead of the King's, Court. It was a privilege originally belonging only to those who were actually in holy orders, but it was gradually extended to those in minor orders and to every one who could read a verse in the Latin Bible. The privilege was grossly abused, and a hindrance to the execution of justice and a scandal and burden to the Church. It was modified and restrained at the Reformation, and the clergy were themselves subject to secular tribunals for crimes and misdemeanors at law, and finally the Benefit of Clergy was abolished in 1827 A.D.

Bible, The, is the popular collective title of the sacred books of the Christian Church. It includes the Old Testament, or the Hebrew Sacred Scriptures, the ecclesiastical books called "the Apocrypha," and the distinctively Christian books which compose the New Testament. The earliest collective title was the Law, which embraced probably only the five books of Moses. Later the collection of the prophets was added, and later still the Hagiographa, or the Psalms. In our SAVIOUR'S time the whole collection was spoken of as "the Law," "the Law and the Prophets," or "the Law, the Prophets, and the Psalms," or more generally, "the Scriptures," and "the Holy Scriptures," or "the Scripture." With one or two exceptions (2 Pet. iii. 16; 1 Tim. v. 10), whenever "the Scriptures" or "the Scripture" are mentioned in the New Testament, the reference is to the sacred books of the Old Testament (e.g., St. John ii. 22, v. 39; 2 Tim. iii. 15). St. Paul speaks of "the old covenant" or "testament" (2 Cor. iii. 14), and contrasts "the two Covenants" (Gal. iv. 24), so that very early these titles of "Old Covenant," or "Testament" and "New Testament," were in use. It was not till St. Jerome, in the fourth century, used the title "Bibliotheca divina" that any one term was used to include both. About the same time the Greeks began to use the plural Biblia, or "The Books," which was afterwards borrowed in the West and used as a singular, and so has passed into common use in the word Bible.

While, therefore, this use expresses a popular conviction and a great truth, St. Jerome's title, "the Divine Litany," or that which is generally used in the Prayer-Book, is more strictly correct, inasmuch as the Bible is a collection of some sixty-six (or, including the Apocrypha, eighty) distinct books or documents, scattered over a period of fifteen hundred years, and written in different styles and for different purposes.

These are arranged in our Bibles, except so far as the threefold general division marks such a distinction, without regard to order of time. The Law of Moses comes first in order, followed by the historical books, and many of those which, in the Hebrew, are reckoned among the Psalms or Hagiographa, and those by the prophets. The Hebrew Bible, after the Law of Moses, places two collections of "the Prophets," the first, *prior*es, including Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, 1 and 2 Kings, and *posterior*es, including those that we name the prophets, except Daniel, who, along with David, as possessing the gift of prophecy but not exercising the pastoral office of the prophet, is reckoned among "the Writings," or "the Psalms." In the Septuagint version of the Old Testament, which has always been in use in the Eastern Church, the Apocryphal or Ecclesiastical books are interspersed among the books of the Prophets and Hagiographa as they are also in the Vulgate, which is used by the Roman Church and regarded as in every part of equal authority. Neither is the New Testament arranged chronologically. The general order is the Gospels and the book of Acts, which supplements St. Luke's Gospel, St. Paul's Epistles, the General Epistles, the Revelation of St. John.

The history of the Canon of the Old Testament is very meagre. The word Canon signifies a rule or measuring line, and is generally used to signify the collection of those books which came under the rule or definition of "inspired books," or "Holy Scriptures." Of the Canon of the Old Testament, it is conceded that up to the captivity only that portion which is called the Law (2 Kings xxii. 18; Isa. xxxiv. 16) was collected and reckoned as sacred and closed. A strong evidence of this is found in the fact that the Samaritans only receive the five books of Moses as sacred. After the return from the Captivity history ascribes the authoritative collection and use of "the Prophets" to Ezra, and after him to Nehemiah (2 Macc. ii. 13). Ezra organized "the great assembly" by which the collection of the Scriptures was carried on and completed. The last member of the great assembly was Simon the Just (290 B.C.), and after his time no new book was added to the Hebrew Canon. In Alexandria, however, in the third century B.C., the Greek version, called, it is said, from the number of the translators the Septuagint, or "the LXX.," had been made, and was in universal use among all Greek-speaking Jews in the world. To this additions were made, viz., those which are included in "the Apocrypha," and were received and used as part of the Holy Scriptures by the early Church. As has been said, they are still so received by the Eastern Church, and in spite of St. Jerome's protest and distinction, which is quoted in our VI. Article, the Roman Church declares all but three of them canonical and of equal value with the other books of the Old Testament, and those three being the two books of Esdras and the Prayer of Manasseh. Our own Church draws the distinction of St. Jerome between "the Canonical books of the Old and New Testament" and "the other books (as Hierome saith), which the Church doth read for example of life and instruction of manners, but yet doth not apply them to establish any doctrine."

The history of the Canon of the New Testament is of course much more complete. At first the Church had the living voice of Apostles, and with this to supplement and explain the Sacred Scriptures of the Old Covenant, it needed nothing more. But this state of things could not last, and partly by design (St. Luke i. 1-4; 2 Pet. i. 15), chiefly, it would appear, by the power of an overruling Providence, not only were the four Gospels written, but in a series of occasional letters the Apostles, and especially St. Paul, furnished a body of commentaries and instructions, which have been and will be the sacred legacy and the Sacred Scriptures of the Church for all time. Though these writings were at first the special property of different parts of the Church, and though at the very first not all Churches possessed them all, still as one body the Church possessed them all, and within another generation had gathered them all in one collection. The "Apostolic Fathers," St. Clement of Rome, St. Ignatius, St. Polycarp, St. Barnabas, frequently quote the Gospels and Epistles. Marcion the heretic, Irenæus, Tertullian, recognize the Gospel "comprising the four Gospels." Tatian's Diatessaron is a harmony of the four Gospels, and they quote "the Apostles" as collections of Epistles already known. Origen mentions the books of both the Old and the New Testaments by name, and comments on them. Other books of the Apostolic Fathers were read in churches, but were designated as "ecclesiastical," "read," or "disputed," though they were not forbidden till the Council of Laodicea, 360 A.D. The persecution of Diocletian, 303 A.D., was especially directed against the Churches and the Scriptures of the Christians, "that the Churches should be razed and the Scriptures consumed with fire," but it had the good effect to sharpen the distinction between "the Holy Scriptures" and all other writings, and the use of the word "Canonical," to distinguish those which were "inspired and sacred," may be said to date from this time. The controversies of the fourth century give frequent testimony to the fact that there was a general consent to the Canon of both the Old Testament and the New.

The earliest MSS. known date from that century and the following,—the Sinaitic and Vatican Codices (fourth century), and the Alexandrian and Ephræmic (fifth century). Many hundreds, more or less complete, are in existence and known, dating from every century since that time. These which have been named are evidently intended for public use, and, of course, represent older manuscripts which have perished. They contain more or less entirely both the Old and the New Testaments.

Attempts were made very early to divide the books into portions for convenience of use, but our present division into chapters dates only from the thirteenth century, and is the work of Cardinal Hugo, of Sancto Caro. The division into verses is later still, and the work of Stephens, the printer, in the sixteenth century.

The Scriptures were first received by the Church in Greek, and there is no known translation into Latin till Tertullian quotes that which was in use in Africa. The first attempt at translation into Anglo-Saxon was by Caedman, in the sixth century, and after him by the Venerable Bede. Wickliffe's version in the fourteenth century was the first complete English translation. The first printed edition of the New Testament in English was Tyndale's, probably printed at Worms. Coverdale's Bible was printed abroad in 1535 A.D. Cranmer's "Great Bible," in 1540 A.D., was the first appointed "to be read in Churches." The Geneva Bible of 1560 A.D. was for three-fourths of a century the popular Bible in England. The "Bishops' Bible" of 1568 A.D. is that from which the Prayer-Book version of the Psalms is taken. The authorized version, known as King James's Bible, dates from 1611 A.D., since which time till the year 1881 A.D. no revision by authority has been attempted.

II. This bald and imperfect sketch of the history of the Bible leaves upon the mind of the reader at first the impression of uncertainty and lack of the authority which we have been accustomed to associate with the Bible. The Bible is fragmentary instead of being one complete work, and the history is fragmentary and as incomplete. The authors of many books are not named. They do not plainly set forth claims of their own authority. The record of their origin is often not what we would desire or expect. The Canon was not established at once and finally. There is little apparent unity of time or place or purpose in the different books.

And yet out of these fragments, and under circumstances of the kingdom and people of Israel and of the early Church most unfavorable, grew and has been made up a collection which, without change of one part to adapt it to another, is so completely one that to many a reader of the Bible the knowledge comes with a kind of shock that it is not one in the same sense that a history or a treatise on arithmetic is one. The unity is so complete and acknowledged by friend and foe that it has passed into common speech and thought, and the bitterest enemy of the "Christian superstition" considers that when he has delivered a blow at Daniel or St. Peter's Epistle he has smitten the whole fabric, while many a diligent reader of the Bible "reads a chapter" without being compelled to recognize the difference between Gospel and Epistle, between history and poetry, or even between Old Testament and New. That is to say, in a true and deep sense the Bible is one book, and they who so regard it are not mistaken. It has grown with the growth of a living thing, and the life of it has been the Spirit who spake by the prophets.

The true character of this Divine Library can better be understood from another point of view. The Scriptures contain in themselves the record of the effect which they have had in the world, and their work is on record and in sight. The history of the people of Israel is the story of the education of a people from the lowest beginnings to the highest forms of civilization and enlightenment. In depth of thought, in pureness of morals, in lofty spiritual conceptions, and at the same time in the practical bearing of its wisdom upon daily life and upon society, no literature of any ancient nation compares with that of the people whom Moses led out of Egypt. And upon that foundation is built the structure of the New Testament. To compare the Christian Scriptures with the writings of their own time or of any other is impossible. Their character and their effect is one, and it is unique.

III. The Old Testament is therefore the history of a nation, and to be understood it must be read as a history. The story begins with the beginning of the whole race, and then is narrowed to the history of a family which becomes a great nation. That nation suffers reverses and is broken up, but it does not perish till its work is done. This history is not contained only in the historical books. The prophets are woven into it, and each of the other books and each portion of them falls into its place.

The first book tells the story of the earth from its creation "in the beginning," through successive changes until man's creation, and then goes on to relate the history of the race until the choice of one family, which henceforward becomes its almost exclusive subject. There is hardly a passage or a verse in the first part of the book of Genesis, i.e., that part of it which relates the early history of the earth and of mankind, which has not been the object of attack and the subject of controversy. The accounts of the creation, of the fall, of the flood, the chronology, the theology,—everything in the book and everything about it has been denied and defended. Its Mosaic authorship has been impugned. It has been separated into two and three and an indefinite number of documents ascribed to as many authors. But still the book remains. Its account of the creation is declared to be "a remarkable anticipation of the conclusions of science." Its account of the fall of man is our only solution of the problem of evil in the world. The critics never have agreed in the results of their criticism. The Mosaic authorship is unshaken. And the historical character of the narrative rests on firmer ground than ever.

The remaining four books of the Pentateuch relate the history of that chosen people from the time of their great leader and lawgiver, Moses, down to the time of their establishment in the land which had been promised to them.

From Moses to David marks the trial and failure of the theocratic system, or rather the failure of the people to come up to the lofty ideal of that system. The three characters of prophet, priest, and king are remarkably blended in Samuel; but they are never reunited. He is the one chosen to anoint the king over the people, and to establish the line of the prophets which becomes from that time prominent. To this period belong the books of Joshua, Judges, Ruth. From David to the Captivity is the period of the kingdom, though in the second generation it was divided and continued as two kingdoms. The worship of ЈЕХОВАН was established at Jerusalem. The prophets prophesied as special messengers of the LORD to both kingdoms. To this period belong the historical books of Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles, the prophecies of Isaiah, Jeremiah, the earlier of the minor prophets, the greater part of the Psalms, and the books of Solomon. During and after the Captivity, Ezekiel, Daniel, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi, many of the Psalms, and the historical books of Ezra and Nehemiah. The book of Job is one of which the date and author are unknown, but apparently it is one of the earliest, if not the very earliest, of all.

These different books represent different stages of the national life and of the national education. The state of society in Genesis is patriarchal. When the children of Israel come prominently forward in Exodus, they are bondmen in Egypt. The Law is given to a people degraded by long bondage. Joshua, Judges, Ruth, depict a state of society of the modest and most primitive. The books of the kingdom show us a nation highly cultivated and enlightened. From that condition they fell away, but the lofty spiritual conceptions and high moral purposes which had belonged to them at their best remained to them, and kept them from ever becoming really like the nations around them. There is in the history a distinct advance from time to time. The nation is being educated, as we can see very clearly.

IV. But while, say during the five centuries from Moses to Solomon, there is a continual progress and education of the people, evident in their customs, social, political, and even religious, in the evils that are rebuked and in the form of the rebukes, in the form of the instructions that are given to them, there is in the story from beginning to end one unchangeable element. He who in the beginning created the heavens and the earth is the LORD, who spake to Abraham and to Moses, who was revealed on Sinai, and who made the promise to David and to Solomon. The Law that He gave on Sinai embraced all the principles of all the law that He ever gave them. Higher conception of God, or of man's duty to Him, than was revealed then, and later in Deuteronomy,—"THE LORD our God is one LORD: and thou shalt love the LORD thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might" (Deut. vi. 4, 5),—was never revealed to them or to man. All that was taught them, and all that was given them, was involved in those first commandments. The priesthood as being nearer by their office to the source of truth, and as the teaching caste, no doubt were always somewhat in advance of the common people, but they had no secret knowledge, and nothing which did not belong alike to all and each of the "kingdom of priests" (Ex. xix. 6). Moses expressed the view of true wisdom and the view of the whole law when he rejoiced that some were prophesying in the camp, "would God that all the LORD's people were prophets." Our SAVIOR appeals to the saying to Moses at the bush, "I am the God of Abraham and of Isaac and of Jacob," as proof of the resurrection of the dead. The progress and education of the nation was not in the way of discovery or development of new truth; but it was a progress and education up to a standard which was set for them on Sinai, and in the call of Moses and in the promise to Abraham, and never changed.

This thought of the perfectness and unity of the truth which was revealed gives us the key to the unity of the Scriptures. We can understand how the inspired words of the One God should be essentially one with each other. But we have an explanation more definite still. That explanation lies in the one purpose of God, which was first revealed in Eden, in the promise of the "seed of the woman who should bruise the serpent's head," which was repeated to Abraham, "in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed," and again to David of the Sox, who should sit on his throne and reign forever. "Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day," our SAVIOUR said. Of all the Law and the prophets He said, "I am not come to destroy but to fulfill." "The testimony of JESUS is the spirit of prophecy." The children of Israel were chosen and kept and taught and trained for the fulfillment of that one promise and purpose of Almighty God. What was true of the whole system was true of every part of it. Every sacrifice was a type of CHRIST. Every law and every prophecy foretold Him.

Still more evidently true is it of the Scriptures of the New Testament that they depend upon CHRIST and reveal Him. The Gospels are biographies of Him. The Epistles apply the truth as it is in Him, to establish and edify His Kingdom and to instruct and guide His followers. They are nothing without Him, and it is in vain to try to understand them without the presupposition of faith in Him.

The faith in CHRIST is therefore the bond of union between the Old Testament and the New. Out of the Old Testament had grown up at our SAVIOUR'S coming a strong and definite expectation of the CHRIST, the Son of David. And though many held that expectation along with such errors that they could not recognize the fulfillment, He did fulfill it, and it was the purpose of the Gospels and Epistles to show how He fulfilled it. The Old and the New are, therefore, one "in Him." We could have neither without the other, but neither without Him.

V. The Bible is therefore a history, and a history which has one key, and which centres in one Person. But there is another view of its historical character which is involved in this one, and which is not less necessary in order to understand either the history which the Scriptures relate or their own history as books. It would be impossible for any man to understand the first sentence of the Old Testament who did not know who is the God who created, or to believe it who did not believe in Him. It would be impossible to form any idea of the connection of the different portions without some recognition of CHRIST our LORD as the object and fulfillment of the purpose of God.

But not less necessary than these two first principles of scriptural criticism is another,—the recognition of the kingdom of Israel and of its fulfillment, the Kingdom of Christ on earth, in their corporate and official capacity of the witness and keeper of Holy Scripture. The Old Testament Scriptures were written and committed to the Kingdom and Church of Israel (Rom. iii. 2) under all its varied circumstances. It is as necessary to keep this thought in mind in order to understand them as it is with regard to any history or public document of any nation. While they contain many things which are universally true and applicable to all times and peoples, they contain a great deal which is only directly true and applicable to this particular people and perhaps to this particular time, and even that universal truth must be seen to be understood through the medium of this "peculiar people."

This is one practical bearing of the principle. Another is no less important. These Scriptures are the inspired Word of God, and this chosen nation is the chosen people of God in the same sense and for the same purpose,—"an inspired nation" in Dean Stanley's words. To give any meaning to the words "inspired" or "chosen of God," is to suppose His overruling presence with them as a people in the reception and preservation of His words to them. He used men to write them. Who the men were or what the pen they wrote with or the material on which they wrote we do not know, but the fact that we have them proves that they were written, and proves also the fact of their preservation. The men and the names passed away, for they were acting officially,—the prophet is one who "speaks for God,"—and what they spoke and wrote by virtue of their office, the whole living body acting by its various members, and through generations, tested, sifted, preserved by virtue of its office. When men neglected their duty God overruled their neglect, and when some reformation repairs the ruined Temple of the LORD, under the rubbish they find "the book of the Law of the LORD" (2 Chron. xxxiv. 14). The practical bearing of this principle as an answer to many of the attacks of unbelief is very evident. History and constitution and laws and poetry imply and prove the nation to which they belonged. The strong proof that the Scriptures of the Old Testament are all that we believe them to be lies in the testimony which the people of Israel supply us by their existence as a people. In this wider view many of the smaller questions and tests of words and styles and imagined probabilities of men who read the books of three thousand years ago with nineteenth century eyes simply sink out of sight.

We can see the bearing of this principle upon the Old Testament Scriptures. It is no less important to the understanding of the New Testament. The Scriptures of the New Testament were written and committed ted, not by chance, nor to all the world, nor to any miraculous agency, but to the Church of Christ, to which they stand related precisely as do the Scriptures of the Old Testament to the Church of Israel. It hardly needs to be suggested that the Epistle to the Church of God, which is at Corinth, supposes the existence of the Church of God at Corinth, and that one who would understand that Epistle must read it with the understanding of a Church thoroughly organized and possessing all that was needed for the full performance of the work of a Church: Creed, Sacraments, Liturgy, Psalms, and many other things not so desirable, but all indicative of corporate existence. What is true of this one letter is just as true, though not always so evident, of all the rest of the New Testament. No one can read and understand alike why some things are said, and some equally important are omitted, and many others only hinted at, who does not read these Scriptures with the understanding of the Church to which and for which they were written. The world receives them from the Church. It can only read them understandingly in the Church.

The same principle clears up many difficulties with regard to the history of the Canon of the New Testament. Written to and for the Church, that Church preserved them. Fathers and Councils were the voices, blending many in one, which spake the judgment of the living body in which the guiding Spirit had come to abide at Pentecost. We have an idea of what is meant by "public opinion," "the spirit of the age," etc. The Canon of Scripture expresses the matured judgment of the Church of God, whose office it is to be "the pillar and ground of the truth," and to which the Spirit was promised, and at Pentecost was sent to abide, who "shall guide you into all truth."

VI. In referring to these first principles of the truth about the Holy Scriptures we have not been unmindful of the recent attacks and the bold claims of modern criticism. We have had them constantly in mind, and this article has been shaped with reference to them, not with a view to avoid any of them, but to suggest the best way for the ordinary reader to meet them. There are two kinds of criticism,—one is the criticism of true, and therefore humble and faithful, scholarship, which regards no point of the truth beneath its notice, and so is not ashamed to busy itself with words and jots and points of the Scriptures, but which is not afraid of any truth wherever it finds it, but which, at the same time, recognizes the fact that there are weightier matters than these, and that there is truth which is higher and deeper than men can see or reach, and which is to be accepted not on evidence of right, but of reason and faith. We need never fear such criticism or its results. There is another criticism which we need not so much fear as shun,—the dishonest and destructive criticism of determined unbelief, sometimes very learned, and sometimes very shallow and ignorant and boastful, which begins its investigations into the Scriptures in the spirit of the detective, with a mind warped and a heart hardened by determined prejudice. It says beforehand, There can be no such thing as a miracle; a real prophecy is impossible. There is no God, or if there is, He does not interfere with the order of nature and in the affairs of man; the supernatural is the work of imagination, the divine is the unknowable, and then in this spirit of "free inquiry" it proceeds to convict the Scriptures of folly and falsehood, and calls its conclusions "the results of the higher criticism." So another "sweeps the heavens with his telescope and finds no God there," and another "carves the living pound," and with knife and glass and unclean hand searches and finds no life in the carcass. Even so "their witness agrees not together," and the constant contradictions of the critics, both in their principles and in their conclusions, are enough to allay our fears if we had any. There is literally not a book of Holy Scripture which has not been the subject of such attacks, and it may be safely said that no book could possibly stand, and no evidence could be accepted, upon their principles. If the judge begins the trial of a case by declaring that all the witnesses are liars before he hears them, then no evidence can prove a case, and not only can no miracle and no prophecy be proved, but no ordinary event in life. If differences in style in the writings of one who prophesied during the reign of four kings proves that Isaiah could not have written all his prophecy, and demands a "great unknown" to supply his lack, and if the same reasons require two Zechariahs and two or more Daniels and two St. Johns, and two—the "Elohist" and the "Jehovist"—or a dozen writers of Genesis, and a forger of Deuteronomy, and even of St. Paul's Epistles, then no great poet or author who ever lived ever wrote his own writings, and no man who "now is old" could ever "have been young."

The truth about such attacks is that they are only new in form, they are old in spirit. They are the trials and tests not only of our faith, but of the truth. The final results have always been good. Small errors in the text have been detected and corrected, and there is a constant return to the very perfection of the original writings. But that we may not misunderstand the bearing of such an admission, let us understand just what it implies. Such a sifting and comparison of hundreds of old manuscripts, and the existence of such errors or any errors in some or other of them, proves two things,—in the first place, the vast number of other manuscripts which they represent, and therefore of other witnesses to the truth, and also proves the true existence of a common and perfect original as certainly as the converging of paths into roads, and of roads into a city, proves the existence of the city into which and out of which they lead. The finding and expunging of a word or a sentence or a passage (and especially one which has no special doctrinal significance, and which is, if not a copyist's error, at best a paraphrase or comment), so far from shaking our faith in the rest, only confirms our assurance. When the expert clerk in a bank discovers, by the aid of eye and glass, and scales, in packages of bills or a pile of gold and silver pieces, one which is counterfeit, but which, by its close imitation of the genuine, has escaped the ordinary eye, instead of rushing to the conclusion that all are therefore counterfeit, you are assured by the same tests that all the rest are true.

"I am not aware," says Professor Sanday, of Oxford, "of a single discovery of new documents or materials bearing, however indirectly, on New Testament criticism, that has tended in any way to shake the foundations of our faith, while by far the larger number have tended very positively to strengthen them. Nor is the prospect any less favorable as regards speculative, analytical, or reconstructive criticism. Here, perhaps, there is more reason for disquiet. Bold and revolutionary hypotheses have been thrown out, and will probably be thrown out again. But when we look back upon past controversies, we shall see indeed that they have left a residuum, but a residuum that leaves Christianity no weaker, but rather stronger, than it was before. Errors are corrected; exaggerations are modified; our understanding of the New Testament grows in depth and fullness. And in the mean time, as it seems to me, certain positions have been placed beyond the reach of controversy. They are so much secure ground from which we can look out in safety, even though there may be obscurity outside. It is only a matter of time, and in the end all will come out right again. One truth cannot permanently conflict with another truth."

There are "things hard to be understood in all the Holy Scriptures, which they that are unlearned and unstable wrest to their own destruction." But none the less we are commanded by our LORD to "search" them, only to read them in faith in Him if we would read them safely and profitably. They will be attacked, and many will deny and reject them. But we need neither be misled by their errors nor fear their attacks. Some of them proceed from ignorance. One is reminded of the anecdote of Franklin, who being in company with a number of French infidels, who were ridiculing the Bible, took from his pocket "an old book that he had picked up at a book-stall," and read to them, to their delight, the "Prayer of Habakkuk," and then compelled them to confess that they had never read the book on which they were sitting in judgment. Others proceed from other causes. But we need not fear them. We have endeavored to indicate some of the guards against them in those deeper and wider principles of scriptural criticism without which any student will go astray. With which we come down to these books from a wider view and a higher position.

It may be well to remind ourselves that one single fulfilled prophecy, such as the many that cluster about our SAVIOUR'S coming, is decisive against the denials of prophecy and for the belief in it. One fact of definite, Messianic expectation, once so persistently denied and now so universally conceded, founded on the prophecy of Daniel, is enough to establish the truth of Daniel the prophet. One miracle, and above all the miracle of the Resurrection, justifies and establishes the belief in miracles. "If all the rest of the Christian Scriptures were lost or unauthentic, the four great undisputed Epistles of St. Paul furnish us with all the essentials of the Christian Faith." So that even against unbelieving criticism we are at liberty to choose our own ground, and to summon an enemy to stand upon it. But for our own purpose and advantage the true course is not even to take our stand at first even on such certain truth. We can come more safely and wisely to the examination even of such evidences—of which there is abundance—from above. Granted the being of GOD, and the supernatural is natural, things hard to be understood become matters of course. Prophecy is the necessary declaration of His will, and miracles the natural evidence and means by which He accomplishes it. If this is His will and His work, then these ways are such as are to be expected. Instead of fastening on some little point and testing the passage by a word, and the book by a misunderstood passage, and the whole by a darkened past, and so at every step shutting out the evidence and truth of GOD, we see in the Scriptures the Word of Him who is higher than the Scriptures, and who must be believed in, in order to understand His Word, the revelation of CHRIST the Incarnate Word without whom they are naught, and the message delivered to "the Church which is His Body." They are not, therefore, all our religion, nor the sum of the trust committed to us. They do not lose but gain to our view when we understand that they are not alone, but that they are as the law of the Kingdom, filling their place and fulfilling their work in the great system of the Kingdom of the great GOD and our SAVIOUR. Then we can read the books in their places, and each chapter and verse and word is magnified and enlightened by the light that falls upon it from the sun of the system. It is fully in accord with this principle that "the Article of the Sufficiency of the Holy Scriptures for Salvation was placed by our Anglican Fathers next after the Articles of the Trinity." "Holy Scripture containeth all things necessary to salvation, so that whatsoever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man that it should be believed as an article of the Faith, or be thought requisite or necessary to salvation." And it is in the same spirit that it goes on to define what is meant by Holy Scripture, with an appeal to the general judgment of the Church,—“those canonical books of the Old and New Testament of whose authority was never any doubt in the Church.”

Bidding Prayers. To bid not only meant to order, but also to pray (cf. German, beten). Bidding prayer, then, is a monition or call to prayer. It is retained in our “Let us pray.” In the 55th Canon of 1603 A.D., the form of bidding prayer was given thus: “Before all sermons, lectures, and homilies the preachers and ministers shall move the people to join with them in prayer in this form, or to this effect, as briefly as conveniently they may: Ye shall pray for CHRIST's Holy Catholic Church; that is, for the whole congregation of Christian people dispersed throughout the whole world, and especially for the Churches of England, Scotland, and Ireland. And herein I require you most especially to pray for the King's most excellent Majesty, our sovereign, Lord James, King of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith and supreme governor in these his realms and all other his dominions and countries over all persons, in all causes as well ecclesiastical as temporal. Ye shall also pray for our gracious Queen Anne, the noble Prince Henry, and the rest of the King's and Queen's royal issue. Ye shall pray for the ministers of God's Holy Word and sacraments, as well Archbishops and Bishops as other pastors and curates. Ye shall also pray for the King's most honorable Council and for all the nobility and magistrates of this realm, that all and every of these in their several callings may serve truly and faithfully to the glory of God and the edifying and well governing of His people, remembering the account they must make. Also ye shall pray for the whole Commons of this realm that they may live in the true faith and fear of God, in humble obedience to the King, and brotherly charity one to another. Finally, let us praise God for all those which are departed out of this life in the faith of CHRIST, and pray unto God that we may have grace to direct our lives after their good example, that this life ended we may be made partakers with them of the glorious resurrection in the life everlasting.” It always concluded with the LORD's Prayer. The names and estates are varied, of course, with the times and the sovereigns, but the bidding prayer is still used in England. As it often happens that it would be very convenient to deliver a lecture or sermon to a class or guild without the Evening Prayer preceding it, it is worth the while to consider whether it might not be advisable for the Church to permit some such form of bidding prayer to be used under due restrictions.

Bier. A portable carriage for the dead.

Bigamy. The crime of marrying a second wife while the first is still living. In the early Church it meant also the marrying of a second wife after the death of the first,—an act which was discouraged in every way, it being sometimes an impediment to holy orders. But the rule and the opposition varied in various parts of the Church and at different times.

Birretta. The square cap worn by foreign ecclesiastics over the zucchetto, or close skull-cap. It was probably a late introduction after tonsure was fully enforced.

Bishop, The Rights, Duties, and Privileges of a. Immediately before His ascension into Heaven, in a place apart where He had appointed, our LORD, in the presence of His eleven Apostles, asserting the plenitude of His power, “All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth” (St. Matthew xxviii. 18), made this the basis of the fullness of the functions with which He sent forth His Apostles to their work: “Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations. . . and, lo, I am with you always.” “As (καθως) my Father has sent me, even so send I you” (St. John xx. 21). Of the fullness of the power with which He was Himself endued, according to this measure He invested His Apostles with authority to carry on the work which He had begun. Realizing the sole responsibility thus placed upon them, they fill up their number (Acts i. 26), and in due time constitute the subordinate orders of Deacon and Presbyter (Acts vi. 6; Titus i. 5), for the better execution of the task that at first rested wholly upon themselves. With the headship of the Church under CHRIST in this office always clearly indicated, but under varying names, it settled within the first century after CHRIST upon that designation of Bishop, which was used at times by the Apostles, and has been employed ever since. At first the oversight was in the body of the Apostles jointly. Then a single Apostle had the care of those whom he had been the means of converting to the Christian faith. Soon after this there arose naturally the Diocesan Episcopate, with the immediate authority of Bishops restricted to their several Dioceses, along with a joint responsibility on the part of each Bishop, as a part of the general Episcopate, for the welfare of the entire Church.

The duty of general oversight in the Bishop very soon compelled the designation of particular Presbyters to have the immediate spiritual care of the several districts or parishes as they were successively formed. These Presbyters at first were sent forth from the Bishop's Church, and acted with delegated authority. As the number of Christians and the distance from the Bishop increased, these Presbyters came gradually to act with greater independence, and the relation of their parishes with the cathedral became more indefinite. At the same time the connection of every baptized person with the Bishop was marked, and the significance of the sole office which was immediately created in the Church by our LORD was emphasized in the renewal before him of the baptismal vows, and the receiving from him in confirmation the seal of the HOLY GHOST.

The distinct purpose declared for which the number of the Apostles was completed was that the person so chosen might be a witness to the resurrection of our LORD. This office of the Episcopate, to hold, and hand on, and bear witness to, the purity of the faith, has always been very important. As different interpretations of the Holy Scriptures appeared, and questions arose about the faith which had been delivered, the Bishops from all parts of the Church were called together into Councils in order to bear witness to what had been held from the beginning, and to determine questions of discipline and order. This was the order in the Church with whom the decisions as to doctrine rested.

This witnessing function of the Episcopate, coming among the other reasons stated, from the fact that it never died, and could be distinctly traced in the history of the several Sees, was naturally joined with the executive function. Whatever others could do the Bishop could do, and more. All functions ended up in him. All appeals might finally come to him for settlement. He was the visible centre of communion. Through him the Diocese and its members were connected with the universal Church. He was the guardian of the rights and privileges of the several members of the Diocese as against each other.

This executive function of the Bishop manifested itself in several forms:

(1) Having a seat in all General Councils of the Church, he has the position of presidency in his own Diocese. He holds his own office in trust, being obliged to see that its powers and dignities suffer no diminution while they are in his hands. He is also the trustee of the traditional and immemorial immunities and privileges of all the clergymen and laymen in his jurisdiction. The interest and the greatest efficiency of the whole Church are involved in the development to the highest point of all the capacities which are in each office, and in the prevention of the dishonoring of any position or the diminution of its efficiency by the intrusion of other agencies out of their rightful place. This duty comes rightly on the Bishop.

Apostolic example shows that this rule of the Bishop is not designed to be autocratic, but to be shared and concurred in by the counsel of the Presbyters and Brethren (Acts xv. 23). In all forms of ecclesiastical action, whether in the adoption of Canons, or in the election of Bishops, or in the regulation of the minor business of the Church, this initiation of the Bishop along with the deliberate concurrence of the other orders in the Church has been seen.

(2) Outside of conciliar action the Bishop is responsible for the efficiency of the Church in all of the multifarious activities of a living, aggressive body, all the time confronting new questions. Responsible for the spiritual interests of the Diocese, his original right of nomination of ministers to all parishes has yet its trace remaining in the need that he should concur in all elections of clergymen to cures, in order to the validity of the action. In case of differences between the minister and congregation, which may not otherwise be appeased, with him, either personally or by deputy, the business of final appeal and settlement lies. In case of fault of any sort alleged in the minister, the Bishop, on a formal presentation of the case to his notice, takes order for the constitution of the court, if he thinks that the matter should go to trial, and the pronouncement of sentence if guilt is found.

The Deacon is peculiarly under the Bishop's care. His studies, as are also those of the candidate for holy orders, are prosecuted under the Bishop's direction. The Deacon is also subject to the Bishop's control in officiating in the Diocese.

To the parish and the laity, from the Bishop, passed, in large degree, the power of nomination to the rectorship when the income of the parish went directly to the clergymen, instead of, as at first, coming to the Bishop for distribution. Where, however, the Bishop now does not nominate, he generally recommends for vacant positions, with an influence which is increased, not merely by the fact of his office, but also by his larger knowledge and the disinterestedness of his motives. In any event the choice of a rector has to be communicated to him and be approved by him.

(3) As the supreme executive officer of the Diocese, the distribution of the moneys of the Diocese is largely under his influence, if not his control. He, in consultation with others, distributes the money which is contributed for the missionary purposes of the Diocese, as well all the educational and eleemosynary funds which are at disposal. To him also, as having a better knowledge of the real condition and needs of the Diocese, are intrusted, from time to time, trust moneys for distribution according to his judgment, for church building and for personal and parochial aid.

The relation of the Bishop not merely with the Diocese, but with the general Church, is shown in the manner of his election and otherwise. It is required that he shall receive at least a majority of the votes of the clergymen and parishes having seats in the Convention; but his election is still incomplete until he receives the votes of a majority of the Dioceses, as represented by their Standing Committees or deputations in General Convention; and after this the evidence of the consent of a majority of the Bishops. He may not resign his office until he has not only the consent of the Diocese, but of the House of Bishops. If charged with fault, he is tried by the House of Bishops sitting as a court.

The official designation of the Bishop in this country, as recommended by the General Convention of 1785, was "The Right Reverend A. B., Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in C. D."

It would not be strange that, from disuse on the part of the Bishop, or from ambition or excessive energy on the part of others, in the passage of time some of the original functions of the Episcopate may have lapsed or been intruded upon.

(1) The right of ordering the Liturgy and the Ritual of his Diocese, which originally belonged to the Bishop, has passed to the legislation of the national Church, to which the Bishop has virtually ceded a portion of his right. A disposition, also, practically to regulate the Ritual, without reference to the Bishop, has not infrequently appeared in certain ministers and parishes of a Diocese.

(2) The headship of the Diocese as represented in Council, and the possibility of rejecting all measures which did not meet with his approval, has in many instances shrunk to the honorary presidency of the body, and only such a voice in disapproval as belongs to any clergyman in the Diocese.

But his authority as being the chief officer, and his veto, which is inseparable from his right to legislate and to discipline, being inherent in the office of Bishop, are not forfeited when either not used or held in abeyance through force of circumstances.

(3) From non-residence and immersion in other interests the right of the Bishop in his cathedral has declined, in many cases, to the concession of but a formal visitation, and the privilege of an honorary seat in the choir.

(4) The right and the duty of giving holy orders, which is a primary office of the Episcopate, have in cases been so abridged by the excessive powers asserted by bodies having advisory functions, that it has been impossible for Bishops collectively or acting singly to give the Episcopate, or even approach the question of the fitness of the persons proposed for admission to the lower orders.

It is believed, however, that, with regard to these and many other functions of a like character, the disposition in the Church is to restore to the Bishop that which for the Divine regimen of the Church, and therefore the better efficiency of its work, rightly and originally belonged to him; while providing that the wisdom and faithful influence of his work shall be increased by the counsel, the co-operation, and the necessary checks which come from the other constituent parts of the Church.

RT. REV. C. F. ROBERTSON, D.D.,

Bishop of Missouri.

Blasphemy. Blasphemy is sometimes confused with profanity. A profane person is one who uses evil language, oaths, and blasphemous phrases. But a person may be guilty of blasphemy without any profanity, for he may teach contrary to God's honor or truth and yet use apparently reverent language. In the early Church there were three sorts of blasphemy distinguished: First, of apostates; so St. Polycarp indignantly replied when required to deny CHRIST: "These eighty and six years have I served Him, and He never did me harm; how, then, can I blaspheme my King and my SAVIOUR?" Second, of heretics and schismatics, who yet may recommend their heresy by moral lives. The Church visited these with excommunication. The third sort of blasphemy was the sin against the HOLY GHOST. What this sin was, or is, was much debated. At the time when our LORD declared it, it was a denial of the evidence by miracles which He worked of the power of the HOLY GHOST. If, then, it was a sin then to deny the power of the HOLY GHOST, now it must be of the same kind. St. Athanasius and St. Ambrose defined it to be a denial of the Divinity of CHRIST, but St. Augustine defined it to be persistent and final impenitency. However this may be, the sin of blasphemy is committed with fearful frequency in this age. It is by a direct reviling of God a sin that marks the last age of the world (Rev. xvi. 9, 11, 21; 2 Tim. iii. 2). By willfully imputing to Him attributes or qualities which are not possible, as injustice, and creation of sin, or denying His attributes of love, mercy, truth, and such like. It may be also committed by reviling His creatures. Thus imprecations and profane swearing have the nature of blasphemy. By the Statute Law of England the denial of the persons of the TRINITY, of the Christian religion, of the Divine authority of the Holy Scriptures, is made blasphemy.

Blood. "But flesh with the life thereof, which is the blood thereof, ye shall not eat" (Gen. ix. 4). "And whatsoever man there be of the house of Israel, or of the strangers that sojourn among you, that eateth any manner of blood; I will even set my face against that soul that eateth blood, and will cut him off from among his people" (Lev. xvii. 10). "That ye abstain from . . . blood" (Acts xv. 29).

It is very clear that in God's sight blood has a sacred and significant character which is much disregarded. The command was strict, "he shall even pour out the blood thereof and cover it with dust." The Christians observed it under the directions of the Apostolic Letter, as quoted above. Blood was accounted the life, and modern science teaches us the same. "It is the life of all flesh; the blood of it is for the life thereof."

The loss of blood is the loss of physical life, and this is typical of the death of the soul. So Holy Scripture speaks of the "pouring out of the soul," and "the offering of the soul." Blood, therefore, being the life, and as Atonement is based upon the life of one for the lives of all (Rom. v. and Heb. ix. 7 sq.), the bloody sacrifice was the type of the one full sufficient sacrifice of CHRIST. For the life of the flesh is in the blood: "and I have given it to you upon the altar to make an atonement for your souls: for it is the blood that maketh an atonement for the soul" (Lev. xvii. 11). If, then, the blood of the lamb, the heifer, or the dove could have such typical significance, of how much greater dignity must we devoutly count the redeeming blood of our LORD JESUS CHRIST, the Lamb of God, for whom were all previous sacrifices and in whom their meaning and efficacy centred! "The blood of JESUS CHRIST cleanseth us from all sin." "How much more shall the blood of CHRIST, who, through the eternal SPIRIT, offered Himself without spot to God, purge your conscience from dead works to serve the living God." "Unto Him that loved us and washed us from our sins in His own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and His FATHER, to Him be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen." "These are they which came out of great tribulation and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the LAMB." Thence the blood of redemption upon the cross is made by Him our life. "This is my blood" which is shed for you and for many for the remission of sins. Do this as oft as ye shall drink it, for the LORD JESUS had already said, "Whoso eateth my Flesh, and drinketh my Blood, hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day" (St. John vi. 54).

Body, Mystical. The union between CHRIST and His members is so real, so intimate, that St. Paul declares we are of His flesh and of His bones (Eph. v. 30). The Body into which we are so bound up is His Mystical Body the Church, which the Apostle declares we are. "Now ye are the Body of CHRIST, and members in particular (1 Cor. xii. 27), but this Body hath CHRIST as its Head, "And gave Him to be the Head over all things to the Church, which is His Body, the fullness of Him that filleth all in all" (Eph. i. 23). This Church, the souls and bodies of them that believe, He has purchased to Himself with His own Blood. It is a mystical Body, and our union in CHRIST is mystical, because it is now beyond our comprehension, but not contrary to the analogies which faith supplies from the experience we daily have given us. It is, therefore, to be believed and acted upon in our spiritual life, for the spiritual life of the Christian is the Life of CHRIST. The Church is not only the fullness of Him that filleth all in all: it is His Bride; it is His joy. Therefore the joining of ourselves to CHRIST by baptism, by the Communion, by the faith, love, and obedience which enter into the nature of our spiritual life, is such and so close a union with Him that it is properly mystical, beyond human knowledge, and is summed up in the strong words St. Paul uses: "Ye are dead, and your life is hid with CHRIST in God," and the still more mysterious language of St. Peter: "Whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises, that by these ye might be partakers of the Divine nature, having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust" (2 Pet. i. 4). The Church is the visible appointed Body for the giving and receiving of the gifts, graces, and influences which make up the mystical union of the Christian with his LORD. The inner mystical union of the life is the spiritual activity and healthy use of these means of grace in the man himself. This mystical union has been treated of in many ways, its study and practice having formed a school of thought in the Church, which finally led into vagaries not warranted by Holy Scripture.

Body, Natural. Our natural bodies, however they may be viewed under the investigations of modern science, can finally be treated simply as returning to that dust out of which we are formed. The teachings of the 1st and 2d chapters of Genesis are the basis, finally, of all that can be said of our mortal bodies. That we were made by God in His own Image, and received from Him a living soul from His breath, that this breath was the breath of lives (vide margin in A. V. and Heb.), and that the subdivision of our life into physical, intellectual, and spiritual life, of which every thinking man is thoroughly conscious, all these are postulates with the Christian. The analysis of materialists cannot overthrow these, for they are aside from the line of study he has marked out for himself, and the clashing comes from his effort to overpass the bounds between mind and matter. And the last analysis even of the materialist ends in a pre-existent ideal. That He can and did call our nature into existence by His own fiat is, of course, a fact that every believer in Revelation asserts. How far, in what way it may be said that our body is in His Image, has ever been a matter of much speculation, but will be ever one of those mysteries solved in the hereafter, when we shall know even as we are known. Of the creation of woman, it may be said to be wholly of the one nature of man, but derivatively, and subsisting as subordinate, and not by original creation. There are in our human nature three forms of existence, two of them in the historical past, the third in the continuous flow of human history: Adam by original creation, Eve by being formed out of Adam, and their descendants by conception and birth. And this human nature thus brought into existence is intimately bound up in a unity wonderful and reacting, and typical of the infinite and incomprehensible unity of the Divine Nature.

The Fall, by the introduction of sin by disobedience into our nature, produced disintegration where the principle of unity had been fundamental. Capacities and endowments fitted for immortality and perfect happiness were so tainted and stained, and the principle of harmonic life in God so ruined, that death was the inevitable result. "Dying thou shalt die" was the enouncing of a fact resulting from sin. Death is the final result of a prolonged disintegration that begins with the moment of birth. When reparation no longer exceeds the waste, then death begins to win the victory in the lengthened struggle. But since man had all things put in subjection to him, his fall tainted and soiled all the subordinate creation. Therefore St. Paul teaches us that "we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now." Our space does not permit us to point out the bearing of the whole passage (Rom. viii. 19-23) upon the Fall, the interconnection of the natural creation and man, and the restoration of the one by the redemption of the other through JESUS CHRIST, and by the continuous presence of the HOLY SPIRIT. But this outline statement of the scriptural facts will give the clue to a clear grasp of this subject. The capacity for eternal life will be discussed under the title of IMMORTALITY. The disastrous consequences of the Fall ruined the corporeal powers and beauty of the body, but we cannot know the height from which Adam fell. Dr. South's well-known saying, that an Aristotle was but the rubbish of an Adam, is possibly the best way that we can express the extent of the injury. Immortality belonged since then only to the sinless CHRIST, for "it was not possible that He should be holden of death" (Acts ii. 24). But as the second Adam, the Quickening Spirit, He restores to us this immortality. The forgiveness, then, of sin is the first step to the giving back to our natural bodies their original power of mortality, which re-endowment is to be completed at the Resurrection.

Body, Spiritual. St. Paul distinctly teaches that the body to be given us at our resurrection is to be spiritual. This difficulty always has been presented: how, then, shall we be judged in the spiritual body for the deeds done in the natural body? or, in other words, how shall that personal identity which we now wear be brought up at the judgment-seat? That we cannot now understand, but it is no greater difficulty to accept the future fact than it is to accept and act upon the present fact, that our souls and our bodies—two distinct and, in some respects, antagonistic entities—form but one person, though we can never understand the ultimate principle of their union. Indeed, it is less difficult to admit that in a perfect state of sinlessness a spiritual body, with spiritual capacities now beyond us, may be the only fit habitation for the redeemed soul. But the words of Scripture are to be accepted, and then explanation to be patiently waited for. The fuller discussion of this subject belongs to the title RESURRECTION.

Bowing, in the Creed. A reverent act of worship at the name of JESUS (Phil. ii. 10). The text upon which this bowing is based refers properly to a bending of the knee, which was an Oriental act of homage. It is only when His name, JESUS, is uttered that this reverent bowing is proper. JESUS is His name as man with us. CHRIST is His title, as anointed to His threefold office as Prophet, Priest, and King. Therefore St. Paul's arguments with the Thessalonians were accurately stated, "that this Jesus whom I proclaim unto you is the CHRIST." The 18th Canon of the Church of England makes bowing at the name of JESUS proper, not only in the Creed, but at all other times when it is mentioned. "When, in time of Divine service, the LORD JESUS shall be mentioned, due and lowly reverence shall be done by all persons present as hath been accustomed: testifying by these outward ceremonies and gestures their inward humility, Christian resolution, and due acknowledgment that the LORD JESUS CHRIST, the true eternal SON of GOD, is the only Saviour of the world, in whom alone all the mercies, graces, and promises of GOD to mankind for this life and the life to come are fully and wholly comprised." (Canons of 1603 A.D.)

Breviary. The Book of the Daily Offices of the Roman Church. The name belonged to the particular MSS. prepared by Gregory VII. (1085 A.D.), but the book, in principle, was in use in the Church many ages before. It was made up of the Psalms, of the Lessons from Holy Scripture, or from the works of the Fathers, sentences thrown into the form of Versicles, Responds, Antiphons, Prosas, and other similar forms. Every Bishop had, originally, the power to alter, arrange, or recompile the Liturgy in his Diocese, but from the fifth century there was a tendency to unify the services, and especially was this done in the Provinces. Still there was a large degree of variation for many ages. In the English Church there were varieties in the several leading Dioceses. The monasteries had their special Breviaries. The Roman office-books, Missal and Breviary, were and are forced upon the Dioceses which receive the papal authority, despite of very determined resistance. The present form of the Roman Breviary was made under Pius V. It is divided into four parts, called after the seasons, Pars Hiemalis, Vernalis, Æstivalis, Autumnalis. Each of these parts, in addition to the introductory rubrics, calendar, and other tables, has four subdivisions: (I.) The Psalter, comprising the Psalms and Canticles, arranged for weekly recitation, and also the unvarying parts of the offices. (II.) The Proper Offices for the season, which vary with the season. (III.) The Proper Offices for the Festivals of the Saints. (IV.) The Common (i.e., unvarying) Office for the Festivals of the Saints.

Brief. Usually applied to Letters Apostolic of the Pope. It is distinguished from the Bull chiefly from the form and nature of the instrument. They both have the same authority, but the Brief is generally shorter and deals often with matters of less importance, and it may be recalled or repressed at will. It is ordinarily written in the Latin character, has a wax seal attached bearing the impress of the so-called "fisherman's ring,"—a figure of St. Peter fishing from a boat,—and is signed by the Secretary of Briefs. The form of the Brief, though now fixed by language, has varied in times past. (Vide BULLS.) In England the crown has from time immemorial issued Briefs for charitable purposes, which briefs are directed to be read among the notices after the recitation of the Nicene Creed after the Gospel. As the cost of issuing these briefs, though reduced very much from the previous charges, is still very great, they are not so frequently issued.

British Church, The. When or by whom Christianity was brought to Britain is unknown. As it was under the dominion of the Roman emperors until 409 A.D., it is probable that the Gospel was preached there as in other parts of the empire at a very early period. Direct evidence is wanting until the end of the second century. Clement of Rome, 90 A.D., mentions that St. Paul, before his martyrdom, had visited the boundary of the West (τὸ ῥέμα τῆς δύσεως), but the expression is too indefinite to found an argument upon it. The identification of Claudia and Pudens mentioned by St. Paul (2 Tim. iv. 21) with a Roman family connected with the government of Britain is also very doubtful. The story of St. Joseph of Arimathea and his twelve companions, their coming to Glastonbury, and the holy thorn which sprang from his planted staff, is a mediæval legend. The earliest undoubted testimony to the existence of Christianity in Britain is that of Tertullian (b. 160), and as he says that the Gospel had in his time penetrated regions in the island which the Romans had not visited, it is clear that it was no new thing. To that period (177 A.D.) belongs the account of a British chief, Lucius by name, applying to the Bishop of Rome for Christian instruction. Very little can be collected from our scanty records with regard to the state of the Church in its earliest period, its extension, mode of government, or life. There were Bishops in the principal Roman towns, in which places there may have been some churches of Roman brick, but in most cases, away from those centres, such buildings as existed for purposes of Christian worship were constructed of wands or wattles in the ancient British fashion. But it does not appear that much progress had been made during the Roman period in the conversion of the great body of the population. That the Church had her martyrs here as elsewhere is shown by the story of Alban, converted by the Christian priest to whom he had in pity given shelter, and in whose stead he gave himself up to the persecutors. With his name are associated many others at the same period, the beginning of the fourth century, under the merciless Emperor Maximian. Bishops from Britain were present at the Council of Arles in France, 314 A.D., from York, London, and (probably) Caerleon. During the Arian controversy in the fourth century the steadfastness of the British Church is frequently referred to, though British Bishops at the Council of Ariminum (359 A.D.) assented with those more learned than themselves to the uncatholic formulæ there adopted. But like the mass of those who were there misled, their weakness was but temporary. St. Jerome speaks of the British Christians of his time as sharing in the common enthusiasm for pilgrimages to the Holy Land. We obtain at this period some interesting glimpses of British Christianity shortly before the withdrawal of the Romans. In North Britain, near Dumbarton, we read of the Deacon Calpurnius, whose father, Potitus, was a priest, and his son the famous St. Patrick. Ninian, from Cumberland, is educated at Rome and returns in Episcopal orders to establish a mission on the coast of Galloway. Here he built his church on the promontory of Whithorn, which, being of stone instead of the more common wood, became renowned as the White House,—Candida Casa. This mission was a centre of light throughout the Roman province of Valentia. The heresy of Pelagius, or Morgan, the Briton, deeply affected his native country, and occasioned the mission from Gaul of the famous St. German and his companion, Lupus, who succeeded in stemming the tide of heresy, and seem to have done much good of other kinds. In this connection comes the story of the "Alleluia Victory," when a British army, mostly converted from paganism and baptized by German at the Easter festival just past, rose from ambush shouting "Alleluia," and put to rout an army of Picts and Saxons without striking a blow. During his mission in Britain, which included two visits (429 and 447 A.D.), German is said to have founded schools in Wales, and some old religious customs were always referred to him. This mission of St. German, the still earlier one of Victricius of Rouen, the fact that a Briton was the first Bishop of Rouen, the character of the earliest Liturgical remains, are facts which point to a Gallican origin for the British Church. The supposed proofs of an Eastern origin are without foundation, as will be seen hereafter.

In the fifth century came the labors of St. Patrick and the conversion of Ireland. The infant Church, owing to the circumstances of the case, assumed in Ireland, and afterwards in Scotland, through the mission of St. Columba, a peculiar form. The country was peopled by wild clans, each attached to its own chieftain, a type which remained longest in the Highlands of Scotland. The missionaries were compelled to direct their efforts first to the conversion of the chiefs, for without this nothing could be effected. Almost of necessity the monastic system became predominant. The Abbot occupied with reference to his society a position parallel with that of the chief to his clan, and, in fact, both characters were sometimes united in the same person. The consequence of this system in a country in which other centres did not exist was, that the Abbot exercised the chief religious control of the district in which his house was situated, and the position of Bishops was inferior to that which they occupied generally in the Catholic Church. This, which grew out of the necessities of the earliest missions, long remained a striking feature of Celtic Christianity in Ireland and Scotland, but a little later we see it disappearing and the Bishop assuming his more appropriate functions, when these missions spread into the north of England. It would be a mistake, however, to suppose that the essential functions of the Bishop were at any time lost sight of or usurped by the Abbot. The Bishop was always called upon to ordain, to give confirmation and the more solemn benediction, and to consecrate churches. A Bishop might be a member of a religious house, advanced perhaps to the Episcopal order for pre-eminent piety or learning. He would be subject, like the rest, to the Abbot, yet the Abbot never ventured to exercise any of his Episcopal functions. It would appear that there were in Ireland a great number of "village Bishops." To such a one St. Columba was sent for ordination, and found the good man plowing in his field. From such a system as this went forth some of the grandest missionaries the Christian Church has ever produced, through whom the conversion of Germany was well begun, that of paganized England mainly accomplished. Such a system was, in fact, far better suited for mission work among wild and barbarous tribes than to be the permanent form under which Christianity should occupy the land. We can only mention here the names of Columban and Gall, who labored in the Vosges and in Switzerland, Kilian and Vergilius in Germany, and many others their companions and associates. It was the foundation of St. Columba in Scotland which became the chief source of light for England, as we see in following the history of early English Christianity.

Reviewing the interesting though scanty records of British Christianity, we easily discern, (1) That the supremacy or even the primacy of Rome was unknown. St. Columba and the other Irish missionaries treated the Pope with the respect due to the Bishop of the most important See in the West, but nothing more; they hesitated not to differ with him and to rebuke him in no measured terms. (2) We see Christianity assuming a unique form of external organization among the Irish and Northern Celts, which, however, is not seen among the Britons of the south until the Saxon conquest drives them into Wales. (3) Such characteristic marks as can be made out indicate a probable Gallic origin for early British Christianity, while that of North Britain and Ireland is derived from South Britain.

The Saxon Period, the Conversion of England.—During the century and a quarter from 449–577 A.D. Britain becomes England, and with this change Christianity is driven from the land, and the worship of Thor and Odin reigns supreme. The only account of this momentous change, from the British side, is that of Gildas, who shows fully the weak and divided condition of the mingled heathen and Christian Britons, which made them on the whole the easy prey of desultory conquest. The remnants recover some degree of strength and maintain themselves long after the conquest in Wales, Cornwall, and Strathclyde along the western coast. Christianity here undergoes a revival of earnestness aided perhaps by closer relations with the vigorous life of the Irish Church. Colleges and monasteries were founded in which religion and learning were fostered and kept alive. Such were the famous Bangor Isceod in Flintshire; St. Asaph, founded by St. Mungo (Munghu); at Llancarfan the college founded by St. Cadoc, who resigned a princely heritage for the religious life. Elsewhere the Angles and Saxons had occupied the land. The old Episcopal Sees had become centres of pagan worship. Then came the mission of Augustine and his monks (597 A.D.), sent by Pope Gregory, the one great mission which came forth from Rome itself. The missionaries landed at Thanet, where the fierce Jute had first stepped upon British soil. Kent was soon conquered for the Church and the See of Canterbury established, with Augustine for its first occupant. Essex followed, with Mellitus as first Bishop of London, from which, however, he was soon driven, and paganism resumed its sway. Paulinus, another member of the mission, became the Apostle of Northumbria under the patronage of King Edwin, and showed himself a faithful and unwearied missionary, but on the death of the king he too was driven out. Birinus, who came later under the auspices of Pope Honorius, converted the West Saxons.

The Celtic Missions.—But while the good work of the Roman missionaries was thus proceeding with many vicissitudes, an independent movement of even greater strength was setting in from the northward, and ten years after Paulinus was driven from York St. Aidan arrived to take up the work, from the great monastery of St. Columba at Iona. He established himself not at York, but, after the Celtic custom, selected a retired spot upon the coast, and founded the new House of Lindisfarne, from which went forth the men who were to convert all North and Middle England, that is, the greater part of the land. It was not long before the two elements, that from Rome and that from Scotland, came into collision. Augustine, acting under the direction of St. Gregory, had made an endeavor to arrive at an understanding with the British Bishops of the west of England, but failed of success, partly through his own want of tact, partly through their obstinate adherence to their own customs. This was at the meeting at Augustine's Oak near the Severn (600 A.D.). Here the points of difference between the Roman Church and the Celtic first came into view, from which it plainly appears that the latter knew nothing of the supremacy of Rome. The principal ground of difference was the time of the observance of Easter. There was also some difficulty in regard to the mode of baptism, but precisely what we have no means of knowing. A third point had reference to the tonsure. The first and last of these have often been adduced as proofs of the Eastern origin of British Christianity, but (1) the Celtic Easter was not the same with the Quortodeciman practice of Asia Minor, ascribed to St. John, according to which the festival was celebrated on the 14th Nisan, which might fall on any day of the week. The Celtic Easter must always fall upon a Sunday, but the cycle employed was simply the uncorrected cycle of an earlier time. Neither (2) was their tonsure like that of the East. The Greek tonsure was total, that of Rome was coronal, the Celtic shaved the anterior half of the head.

The next great occasion when these points of difference came in question was at the conference of Whitby, 664 A.D. This was not so much a contest between men as principles, since the leaders of the discussion on both sides were men who had been trained originally in the Celtic system. On the Celtic side was Colman, the successor of Aidan; on the Roman side the famous Wilfrid, then Abbot of Ripon. Wilfrid was a native of Northumbria, trained first at Lindisfarne, but afterwards with Benedict Bishop, the earliest Englishman who appears as a promoter of religious art, he had visited Rome and become filled with an enthusiastic determination to bring his earlier friends into accord with the usages of the Church at large, especially as represented by the mother-Church of the West, as she now claimed to be. The conference was held at Whitby, the famous monastery of St. Hilda, who had become the counselor of kings. Wilfrid gained the victory, and Colman with a part of his monks from Lindisfarne, and other followers, withdrew to Iona and afterwards to Ireland, where he died in 676 A.D. This conference and its results constitute an epoch in the history of English Christianity. The single-mindedness and saintly lives of these Celtic missionaries, their utter unworldliness, as Bede, himself a strong Roman sympathizer, describes it, might make us regret the triumph of the Roman system. Looking at the later development of the papal claims, we might be tempted to dream of a Church which, taking its rise independent of Rome, never submitted to her domination, and thus in the far West might have presented a parallel to the orthodox Church of the East. But such a result was probably impossible, when we consider the difficulties which the future history of England had in store for the Church. The Celtic Church was "devoid of that unifying power, that wonderful gift of order and organization which was the strength of the Roman," therefore it would not have enabled England "to endure the tremendous strain of the next four hundred years." As it was, it was the Church which gave England unity and the strength which comes from unity. After the withdrawal of Colman, Wilfrid was appointed Bishop of York, and went into Gaul for consecration. During his prolonged absence the Celtic party obtained a temporary victory, by persuading the king to appoint to the vacant bishopric Chad, one of the original disciples of Aidan at Lindisfarne. His consecration, which took place at Winchester, is interesting from the circumstance that Bishop Wini of that See, who had been consecrated in Gaul, obtained the assistance of two Bishops of British race from Cornwall, and thus in the person of Chad the two lines were united.

Another epoch in the history of England and its Church was the arrival of Theodore of Tarsus, an Eastern monk (669 A.D.), appointed and consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury by the Pope himself after the death of the nominee of the English kings, who had gone to Rome for consecration. Theodore, taking his seat at Canterbury, commenced his work by making a careful visitation of his whole province. He was the first Archbishop to whom all England submitted. One result of his visitation was the establishment of Wilfrid in the See of York, Chad quietly withdrawing to become, later, Bishop of Lichfield. But the great work of Theodore was the extension and organization of the Episcopate. According to high authority, "by his arrangement of Dioceses and the way in which he grouped them around the See of Canterbury, in his national Synods and ecclesiastical Canons, Theodore did unconsciously a political work." The spectacle of a Church at one, under one Archbishop, prepared the way for a united state under one king. The union of England was, however, very gradual, and only effected long after this time, when danger threatened from abroad. Theodore is also thought to have taken the first steps towards the establishment of the parochial system.

Schools and Learning.—Learning followed in the wake of Christian enlightenment. At the school of Canterbury, under Theodore, Hebrew, Greek, and Latin were taught. Here was trained Adhelm, Abbot of Malmesbury and Bishop of Sherborne, who zealously promoted the cause of education in Wessex, and composed many religious songs in ballad form and in the Saxon tongue. He is to be remembered as the first Englishman who cultivated classical learning with success. He died 709 A.D. The poetry of Cædmon, a lay brother of Whitby, the great St. Hilda's monastery in the north, enabled Biblical lore to spread among the common people of the lowest class. By casting the Sacred Story and the Creed of Christendom into the simplest vernacular speech, the Faith was brought home to the hearts of serf and shepherd. Learning flourished most in the schools of Northumbria, especially at Jarrow and York. It was at Jarrow that Bede, called the Venerable, passed his life (b. about 673 A.D.). He is the true father of English literature, and through his many treatises made accessible to his countrymen all the knowledge of his day, sacred and profane; the first theologian and the first cultivator of science the English race ever produced. From the school of York came in the next century (b. 735 A.D.) the famous Alcuin, who spent many years at the court of Charlemagne, and aided in the great educational designs of that enlightened emperor. In Alfred the Great Christianized England produced the perfect king. "Alfred was the noblest, as he was the most complete embodiment of all that is great, all that is loveable in the English temper" (Green's English People). The first in the line of ecclesiastical statesmen who have played such a large part in English history was St. Dunstan. As virtual ruler of Wessex from 950-979 A.D., he did much by his firmness and strict even-handed justice to fuse the English people into one nation.

The Effects of Monasticism.—In the later Saxon period the glory of the earlier Church is obscured. The galaxy of saints and learned men who appeared at the period of the conversion of England and in the next age left few successors. Gradually a certain feebleness crept over the whole people which made them the easy prey, first of the Danes, then of the Normans. The cause of this was undoubtedly the abnormal development of monasticism. England, like all Northern Europe, was converted by monks,—those of the rule of St. Columba on the one hand, and of St. Benedict on the other. It was inevitable that monasticism should be strong, and it soon pervaded the whole of Anglo-Saxon life. Immense donations of land were conferred upon the monasteries, more than thirty kings and queens ended their days in the cloister, and from other walks of life an innumerable company. The grandest and most successful of all missionary agencies, monasticism becomes a heavy burden and a grave evil when it dominates the whole life of a nation. Asceticism, which has and ever must have its place, and that a most important place, in the Christian Church, is a fruitful source of error and corruption when it is attempted to make it the only allowable form of Christian life. The strength of the nation forsaking the work of common life to serve God in the cloistered walls, and ultimately to avoid the burden of duty laid upon them, was putting an end to progress, both in Church and State. The condition of things is well expressed by Dean Milman: "The Anglo-Saxon clergy, since the days of Dunstan, had produced no remarkable man. The triumph of monasticism had enfeebled without sanctifying the secular clergy. . . . It might conceal much gentle and amiable goodness; but its outward character was that of timid and unworldly ignorance, unfit to rule, and exercising but feeble and unbeneficial influence."

England and the Papacy.—It is important to trace, however briefly, the relation of the Church in England to the Papacy. We have seen, in reviewing the history of British Christianity, that the Britons seem to have had no knowledge of any kind of papal jurisdiction. It would seem to be equally true that in the early English (Anglo-Saxon) Church there was but little notion of the rule of Rome over other Churches as a matter of right and law. They by no means submitted to the Pope as possessing the headship and universal dominion over the Catholic Church. Yet none the less they owned his sway. It is a popular error to represent the Anglo-Saxon Christians as asserting independence of Rome and maintaining their rights as a branch of the Church. The simple truth is that the relation between Rome and England at that period did not rest upon a basis of claims and concessions; it did not wear a legal aspect. Such words as these indicate the prevailing sentiment: "Gregory, our father, who sent us baptism," "Though he be not an apostle to others, yet he is to us, for the seal of his apostleship are we in the LORD." Notwithstanding the fact that the greater part of England had first received the Gospel from Iona and Lindisfarne, there was, after the reconciliation and fusion of the two elements under the influence of Wilfrid and the wise measures of Theodore, a remarkable lack of any consciousness of an independent origin among the Christian people of England. They leaned to Rome as colonists to the mother-country, without thinking of raising any question as to what might some time be claimed as a matter of right. Their loyalty to the mother-Church was romantic and childlike. A pilgrimage to Rome was the dream of every Christian Englishman's heart. "From no other land did there flow into the papal exchequer such rich contributions." Yet practically the independence of the Church was little interfered with. Bishops were chosen without the papal intervention, though sometimes that intervention was invited, as in the case of Archbishop Theodore. But in general all ecclesiastical appointments were in the hands of the king. If we compare the position of the Church in the Anglo-Saxon period with that under the Norman kings, the difference does not consist in the greater devotion shown to the Papacy at the later epoch. The contrary is true. Doubtless the foreign ecclesiastics who poured into England at this time, filling its Sees and Benefices, brought with them the latest forms and observances which the Catholic religion had assumed, and a perceptible change of tone. But as regards the Papacy, we find that the common practice of the earlier period, which had rested only on custom, became express law. The dependence of the Church on the royal power was strictly enforced. Prelates were practically chosen by the king. Moreover, William the Conqueror would allow no papal letters to be received into the realm without his assent. He met the demands of Gregory VII. with a stern refusal. "Fealty I have never willed to do, nor will I do it now. I have never promised it, nor do I find that my predecessors did it to yours." Such principles were maintained by William and his successors, not for the good of the Church, but to strengthen their own power. Yet the practical result was the comparative independence on Rome of the realm and Church of England, and at most periods a considerable jealousy of papal encroachments. It seemed to many noble and devoted men far more natural that the Church should lean on Rome than be subject to the tender mercies of a tyrant at home, and, very different from our view, they often identified the "liberties of the Church" with subjection to the Pope. Yet a deep, underlying feeling of independence resided in the English people. When the most powerful of Popes, Innocent III., deposed even so evil a man as King John, the bull might have remained ineffectual, so far as the main body of the people were concerned, notwithstanding the great encouragement which it gave to all his enemies, public and private. When the king yielded and knelt before the papal legate, "He has become the Pope's man; he has forfeited the very name of king," was said to have been the indignant outcry of his subjects. This was the highest point which papal aggression ever reached in England. With the growth of a strong national spirit came resistance, often renewed and gradually embodied in the laws of the kingdom, to the papal claims (1) of a right to exact pecuniary contributions, (2) of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, as exhibited in appointments to Bishoprics and other Benefices, and in appeals from English courts. The "Constitutions of Clarendon," 1164 A.D., provided that elections of Bishops or Abbots should take place in the presence of the king's officers, and have the king's assent, and that no appeals should go further than the Archbishop without his consent, and to these measures the prelates gave their indorsement. In Henry III.'s time there was a rising throughout the kingdom against the papal collectors, and the barons for their part refused to aid the Pope in his contest with Frederick II. It was at this time, says Green, "that the little rift first opened which was destined to widen into the gulf which parted one from the other at the Reformation." As Parliament rises into importance, the jealousy of papal aggression is exhibited from time to time in no uncertain tones. In the reign of Edward III. (1327-1377 A.D.) Parliament utters distinct protests against the corrupt and injurious interference of the Pope with the affairs of the Church of England, and supports the king against the Pope in the contest with Scotland. When a papal interdict was laid upon Flanders, English priests said mass in that country with bold defiance. Papal legates were threatened with stoning when they landed in England. In 1343 A.D. the Commons petitioned against papal appointments to vacant livings in despite of the rights of patrons or of the crown, and the king complained to the Pope of the appointment of "foreigners, mostly suspicious persons," and reminds his Holiness that the successor of the Apostles was set over the Lord's sheep to feed and not to shear them. The Parliament declared that they "neither could nor would tolerate such things any longer."

In 1351 A.D. the Statute of Provisors forbade any one to receive a papal provision or appointment; that is, a grant of the Pope superseding the right acquired by election, and conferring afresh the spiritual and temporal administration of See or Benefice. This practice had commenced in 1300 A.D., but had constantly been resisted. In 1353 A.D. the first of the celebrated statutes of "Præmunire" was passed, forbidding any appeal from the English courts, under pain of outlawry, perpetual imprisonment, or banishment from the land. Both these laws were reiterated at later periods. By the enlarged statute of Præmunire, passed in 1390 A.D., it was enacted that all persons procuring in the Court of Rome or elsewhere translations, processes, sentences of excommunication, bulls, instruments, or other things which touch the king, his crown, regality, or realm, should suffer the penalties of præmunire. "This act is one of the strongest defensive measures taken during the Middle Ages against Rome" (Stubbs). When Pope Urban V. referred to King John's submission and oath of fealty as the ground of his demands, it was declared by Parliament that John's submission had been made "without their assent and against his coronation oath," and they pledged themselves to resist such claims with all their power. That was the last ever heard of a papal over-lordship in the feudal sense over England. These statutes of Præmunire and Provisors remained the law of England, though allowed to fall into disuse when the policy of the Papacy avoided direct conflict, until in the hands of Henry VIII. they proved a weapon of tremendous power, and hardly any new legislation was necessary, but simply the execution of laws already long existing, to complete the independence of the English Church. Whatever theories of the Papacy may have been held by many or few and acted upon from time to time in England, however far at some epochs the leaders of the Church may have committed themselves to Rome's extreme claims, history shows that the assertion of those claims was resisted whenever they came in conflict with the national spirit, that the general drift of English sentiment was towards independence, and that the steps needful to achieve that independence were almost all taken one hundred and eighty years before it was at last effected. While we may admit the subjection of the English Church to the Papacy in ways more or less defined and admitted through the Middle Ages, the facts show that such subjection was not looked upon as a matter of Divine right, and that the extreme claims of Hildebrand were not admitted. The Papacy had its part to play under Divine Providence, in aiding the Church to resist the tyranny of kings, and when that work was done its power ceased in England. Even Sir Thomas More and those who thought with him were not troubled at the rejection of papal control: their opposition was to the royal assumption of supremacy over the Church.

Conclusion.—We may fitly conclude in the words of Dean Church: "The lesson of history, I think, is this, not that all the good which might have been hoped for to society has followed from the appearance of the Christian religion in the forefront of human life; not that in this willful and blundering world, so full of misused gifts and wasted opportunities and disappointed promise, mistake and mischief have never been in its train; not that in the nations where it has gained a footing it has mastered their besetting sins, the falsehood of one, the ferocity of another, the characteristic sensuality, the characteristic arrogance of others. But history teaches us this: that in tracing back the course of human improvement we come, in one case after another, upon Christianity as the source from which improvement derived its principle and its motive; we find no other source adequate to account for the new spring of amendment; and, without it, no other sources of good could have been relied upon."

Bull. The name given to the Letters of the Pope, whose authority, whether for temporary or constitutional purposes, is paramount. The name is taken from the leaden seal (Bulla) attached by a silken string (if it be a Bull of Grace) or by a hempen cord (if it be a Bull of Justice). This globular seal bears upon one side the representation of the Apostles SS. Peter and Paul, and on the other the name of the reigning Pontiff. The Bull is issued from the papal Chancery. There are also Consistorial Bulls; i.e., those issued by the advice and consent of the Cardinals in Consistory, by whom they are signed. The matter of the Bull may be of comparatively private nature, or it may relate to public matters of a nation, or of an order, or it may be binding upon the whole Roman obedience, or it may lay down certain constitutional principles, as did the famous Bull Unam Sanctam.

Burial. While it was customary among the heathen, yet the whole surroundings accompanying the act of burial among Christians were so marked and so reverent, that they stamped the rite as Christian. Julian, the apostate emperor, 363 A.D., acknowledged that austerity of life, hospitality, and reverent burial of the dead were the powerful influences that gave Christians the conversion of the empire. It had its motive in the faith in the Resurrection, and, therefore, the body that God would so care for as to bring again from its dust must be reverently laid away. To attack this loving care of the Christian for the remains of his loved one was a controlling cause why so many martyrs were burnt by heathen magistrates. The honorable burial of our Lord's Body by Joseph of Arimathea was the pattern upon which the Christian based his care of his dead. But in times of persecution it was not always possible to bestow this care, and interment was often very hurried. Yet when Polycarp was burnt, his bones and ashes were gathered up, without hindrance, by the brethren. To be buried beside the remains of a martyr was always accounted honorable. At first burials were made anywhere it was most convenient outside of the city, as burials within were illegal. But care was had to obtain, whenever possible, a cemetery of their own, and their right to it was generally conceded. At Alexandria they had them openly. In Rome, where the soil was such that subterranean burial could be carried out, the Christians dug out those underground galleries—already begun by the heathen—for burial purposes, and these catacombs became places of refuge of safe meeting as well as of burial, since the tunnels as they were dug out ramified so as to form an underground labyrinth. When peace came, churches were frequently erected upon the tombs of saints. The early Christians, whenever they could do so, made their burial rites contrast notably with those of the heathen. The body was kept unburied as long as convenient. It was decently prepared for burial by the friends and relatives, not by hired persons, swathed in linen with decent orderliness. It was laid out either at the house or in the church. The watchers over it sang hymns and anthems. They buried in open day, with something of triumphal pomp, with hymns of hope and faith and scriptural anthems. When the grave was reached these hymns and prayers were renewed, and an address closed the service.

Burial rites must vary very much with the circumstances and with the development of the people, but the simpler and plainer a Christian burial can be conducted the better it is. Two chief things should be made prominent, the faith in the future Resurrection and the loving care which for CHRIST's sake we should show the dead. The history of the Order for the Burial of the Dead is simple and clear. It has little relation to the ancient offices, taking from the Sarum use the first two opening sentences, and adding the third. The corpse was to be carried either to the church or the grave at once, apparently customarily to the grave. Then the noble anthem, "Man that is born of woman," was recited. Its use here was peculiar to the English Prayer-Book. It was to be said either by the priest alone or together with the clerks. The priest was to cast the earth upon the body in the first Prayer-Book (1549 A.D.); this was changed to the present use in the second Prayer-Book (1552 A.D.). The sentence of committal, as also the final prayer, expressed a strong hope in the blessedness of the deceased. In the first Prayer-Book, if the body was borne to the grave at once, the Psalms cxvi., cxxxix., cxlvi., were to be recited in the church afterwards, together with the Lesson (1 Cor. xv. 20 sq.), and then the suffrages and a final prayer were recited. The second Prayer-Book apparently, after the anthem, "I heard a voice," ordered the Lesson to be read at the grave, and then, with the Kyries and the Lord's Prayer, closed with the final prayers nearly as in our Prayer-Book. The Prayer-Book of 1662 A.D. rearranged this material into the present order, which, with important verbal changes, we follow. These verbal changes consist in an entire omission of any reference to hopes especially for the deceased, the dropping of the Kyries, and the continuous recital of the two Psalms (xxxix. and xc.), whereas the Gloria is placed at the end of each Psalm in the English Prayer-Book.

This order for the Burial of the Dead is unapproached in simple and severe grandeur and lofty faith and perfect harmony with only what is revealed to us in Holy Scripture. Its clear proclamation of the RESURRECTION, its freedom from all that men may wish to believe, however naturally, yet without clear warrant, its solemn lesson to the living, make it a most noble office. And yet no office in the Prayer-Book has so many of its rubrics systematically violated, in ordinary cases at least. Comparatively little watchfulness is used to observe the rubric as to those who can have the office read over them. The anthem shall be said or sung while the corpse is made ready for the grave, not after it is placed. It is not incumbent on the minister to recite it by himself. The purpose evidently is to have the choir or the assembled friends recite it. This is true also of the other anthem, "I heard a voice." Then the minister alone should recite the Lord's Prayer. Much of the impressiveness and solemnity of this beautiful office is lost by these infractions of the rubric.

Cabala. The mystic theosophy of the later speculative Jewish schools. Its contents are much older than its written documents, which apparently date from the tenth century, though these are attributed to a much later age. The Cabala is based upon a mystic and allegorizing arithmetic, which is arbitrarily applied to the doctrine of the nature and attributes of God. It had its uses, doubtless, in counteracting the grosser anthropomorphic teachings of the Talmud, beside which it seems to have flowed in a parallel and distinct channel, though probably the Rabbi of the Talmud was also a master of the Cabala. It may indirectly have had a great influence in the allegorizing tendency in the interpretation of Holy Scripture, which overreached itself in the Church. The tendency to a mystical interpretation has always been very great in both the older Jewish, and in the Christian Church, based, indeed, upon the sanction and example of our Lord and of St. Paul, but running to a most absurd excess. The Cabala has many points of contact with Gnosticism. It was essentially pantheistic. That it should have some points of agreement with Christian doctrine is to be anticipated, yet they are very few. It supplied Philo, probably, with the idea of the Logos which prepared the way for understanding the revelation of the Word of God. It seems to hold to a triple condition of our soul,—the intellectual, the moral, and the spiritual energy of our life. The freedom of will in fallen man is asserted.

Calendar. A table of the order of days in the year, such as is prefixed to our Prayer-Book. The earliest tables of this class were very ancient, being civil as well as ecclesiastical. There is, however, combined with this calendar ecclesiastically a catalogue of the saints whose commemorations fall upon fixed days in the civil year. Our own calendar is a most admirably simple and clear arrangement for practical use. The following outline gives but the chief points. A thorough discussion would require a volume. The word calendar is derived from the Old Latin caleo, to call, from the custom of having the Pontifex announce to the people, called together, the holy days. Later the practice of posting in public places the proper holidays came in; hence the title calendæ, and in late Latin calendarium. The division of days was necessarily solar; that of weeks by Divine law. The months were originally lunar. Now it is remarkable that these three modes of marking time have no common divisor, yet are constantly commingled. It causes a great deal of embarrassment, and yet there is no means of making a change. By intercalations and arbitrary enactments points of time for new eras can be arranged as it was by Julius Cæsar or by Pope Gregory XIII. (1582 A.D.), or restorations effected as the several rectifications of the calculation for Easter; but these three incommensurable measures of time are unalterable.

To us the week is practically the most important, but as it is incommensurable with the 365 days 6 hrs. 48' 46" of the actual solar year, there must be some mode by which we can connect the two without confusing them. This was simply done by using the first seven letters of the alphabet for the days of the week, marking the 1st day of January as A, and so on. The letter for the 31st of December is A. Now as Sunday does not fall yearly in the same place, each letter becomes in its turn the Sunday letter. If Sunday fall on January 1, as it will in 1899 A.D., then A will be the Sunday letter. Again, if there be a leap-year, as the day intercalated falls between the 28th of February and the 1st of March, the Sunday letter with which the year begins, as, for instance, in 1896 A.D., E, will fall back, as in the date just given, to D, for the Sunday letter being E, and the 29th of February lettered D, as also March 1 is lettered D, the intercalated day is as it were a dies non in the calendar, but carries back the Sunday letter. So that the 23d of February being E in 1896, the eighth day after is March 1, which is lettered D, and this will be the letter for the rest of the year. Whenever the Sunday letter for any year is found, the date of any given day of the week can be readily found in the calendar by this simple contrivance.

The rule to find the Sunday letter for the remainder of this century is very clear, and is thus given in the first of the Tables for finding Easter-day: "To find the Dominical or Sunday Letter, according to the Calendar, until the year 1899, inclusive, add to the year of our Lord its fourth part, omitting fractions, divide the sum by 7, and if there be no remainder, then A is the Sunday Letter; but if any number remain, then the Letter standing against that number in the small annexed Table is the Sunday Letter.

"NOTE.—That in all Bissextile or Leap-Years, the Letter found as above will be the Sunday Letter from the intercalated day to the end of the year."

But it was a small part of the work to arrange the Dominical Letter. A more difficult work was to adjust the proper time for the celebration of Easter. Since Easter was the Christian Feast standing in historical relation to the Jewish Passover, it was necessarily governed by similar rules. Then Easter, as did the Passover, depended on the full moon, or, rather, on the fourteenth day of the moon. The Council of Nice, 325 A.D., laid down four postulates concerning it:

I. That the 21st of March must be taken as the day of the vernal equinox.

II. That the full moon happening upon or next after the 21st of March is to be taken for the full moon of the month Nisan.

III. That the next Lord's Day next after that full moon is to be observed as Easter Day.

IV. But if the full moon fall on a Sunday, the next Sunday is to be Easter Day.

But these are calendar, not astronomical full moons, since the lunar cycle being 29.5305 days, the equation proposed by the golden cycle of Meton of alternate twenty-nine and thirty days was not accurate enough after a lapse of time, and this slight error every nineteen years was sufficient to produce a serious inconvenience after a time. It was with some trouble that the corrections were effected. The Paschal term is that period within which the moon can pass through her lunation before and immediately after the vernal equinox. The Paschal moon is new at the earliest on March 8, so that it is full on the 21st (both days being counted),—that is, fourteen days after. But should the full moon fall after the 21st, the latest date is April 18, since from March 8 to April 5 is twenty-nine days, and April 18 is the latest full moon, so that the latest Sunday on which Easter can fall is April 25. Easter-day, then, may fall on any Sunday between March 22 and April 25, both inclusive, immediately after a full moon. Since, then, the calendar date of the full moon may be three days even different from the astronomical full moon, the two modes of calculation do not always coincide. The reason for this discrepancy is not far to seek, since the new moon from which both Jew and Christian counted was not the one obtained by calculation, but by observation. But the calculation of the calendar moon depended upon the Epact, which was the name given to the number of days' difference between the current lunar months and the solar year. The difference is eleven days. At the beginning of the cycle the year and the new moon coincide; but at the end of the solar year the moon is eleven days old. At the end of the second solar year the difference is twenty-two days. At the end of the third year it is only three days,—i.e., thirty-three days minus the thirty days of a full lunation. At the end of the cycle of nineteen years the same order recurs. Since the true lunar month is 29.5308 days, to allow thirty days to a lunation is too much; therefore upon February, April, June, August, September, and November two epacts are assigned to a certain day in each of these months. This device serves to keep the error within bounds. The principal use of the Epact is to enable one to find the age of the moon at any required date of the given year, and of course its chief use is to determine the Paschal moon. The rule is, (1) Add together the day of the month given and the Epact, to be found in the third table in the Prayer-Book; (2) if the date given is after March, add the number of the month from March inclusive, and the sum is the required age of the moon. Let us take 1896 A.D. Easter-day for that year would be thus calculated: Since an Easter can fall between March 22 and April 25, let us choose April 1 on which to find the moon's age. The Epact for 1896 is 15; therefore,

April 1.....	1
Epact.....	15
March and April.....	2
	18

The moon will be eighteen days old on April 1. It was full, therefore, on March 29, and April 5 will be Easter-day.

The Golden Number was really the same cycle as the Epact, i.e., one of nineteen years; but there was made no provision for the hour and a half of gain in each lunation, which amounted to about a day in three hundred and twelve years. Therefore, when the Calendar was rectified in the English Church in 1752, the Golden Number was set aside practically, and the Epact substituted. For the order of the Golden Number was fixed by law, and could not be moved to its true place in the column whenever the error by increment became serious; so it was dropped and the Epact was substituted, which could be placed opposite its true place in the cycle. The Golden Number is apparently different from the Epact, as will be seen:

Epact.....	{	0	11	22	3	14	25	6	17	28	9
Golden Number.....	{	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10
Epact.....	{	20	1	12	23	4	15	26	7	18
Golden Number.....	{	11	12	13	14	15	16	17	18	19

But the fact is that the Golden Number needed the Epact originally; and if the Table of Lessons for March and April be examined a series of strangely arranged numbers will be noted. These are the Golden Numbers, marking the days upon which the full moons can fall in those months, so that the year on which the Golden Number points out the full moon being found, the Sunday letter following such Golden Number is Easter-day. Take, again, the year 1896 A.D. The Epact is 15, the Golden Number corresponding is 16. This is set opposite March 29 as the date of the full moon. Easter-day will, therefore, fall on April 5. These computations were necessary to procure an accurate mode for finding Easter-day; yet there will always be a variation from the astronomical full moon, since it is not possible in an ecclesiastical calendar to make provision for the minute errors which the loss of a few moments or seconds will produce in the lapse of centuries. Therefore a rectification must always be made at stated periods.

Easter determines the dates of all the Movable Feasts and Fasts which precede and follow it. Upon Easter depend the number of Sundays after Epiphany, the date of Septuagesima, Sexagesima, and Quinquagesima Sundays, Ash-Wednesday, Good-Friday, which precede, and Ascension-day, Whit-Sunday, and Trinity-Sunday, which follow, Easter-day, and necessarily the number of Sundays after Trinity are also thus determined. Except for the Immovable Feasts, which follow the solar calendar, all ecclesiastical calculations follow the Mosaic precept to regulate the feasts by the moon.

In fact, no proposed calendar can so well meet all the difficulties and nice adjustments required as the one we now use. It is a memorable example of the truth that God's ordinances are immutable. The French attempted to substitute a new calendar during the Revolution; but they had, in less than twelve years, to revert to the Church Calendar, which is based upon Jewish Law, which, again, is based upon the ordinance:

"And God said, Let there be lights in the firmament of the heaven to divide the day from the night; and let them be for signs, and for seasons, and for days, and for years. . . . And God made two great lights" (Gen. i. 14, 16).

Under any system of chronology whatever each historian is inexorably bound by the conditions of Jewish computation, both because it is so universally received that he cannot escape it, and because, with all the difficulties attending calculations under it, it conforms to natural terms of time. Many facts of ancient history depend (to take but a single instance) upon the calculation of eclipses for their verification.

California, Diocese of, 1850-1884. The first Convention was held in Trinity Church, San Francisco, in July (1850 A.D.), for the purpose of organizing the Diocese of California. The opening sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Ver Mehr, and the Rev. Flavel L. Mines was appointed chairman.

It is a fact in history that the early founders of the Church on this coast had no idea of uniting with the General Church at the East. There is no recognition of it in any of their proceedings. They ignored the name of "Protestant Episcopal," and called their organization the "Church in California." Knowing that while in this position no Bishop would be consecrated for them, the question was discussed of attempting to procure the Episcopate from the Greek Church. Abandoning this idea, the Convention elected as their Bishop the Rt. Rev. Bishop Southgate, who, having been consecrated to a foreign mission, had lately returned. He, however, declined the invitation. Three years passed away, during which time nothing further was done to organize the Church. In this time the Rev. Mr. Mines, the first minister to the coast and the first rector of Trinity, the mother-church of the Diocese, had been removed by death. The so-called parishes of Marysville, Stockton, and Sacramento had hardly an existence, and there were but two live parishes,—Trinity and Grace, of San Francisco, these constituting the "Diocese of California."

In October, 1853 A.D., the General Convention met in New York, and the wants of this coast soon claimed their attention. Ignoring most wisely the past action of the Diocese, which was not in accord with the majority of Churchmen in California, the General Convention decided to appoint a Missionary Bishop for California. The election was held in the House of Bishops, and the Rev. William Ingraham Kip, D.D., rector of St. Paul's Church, Albany, was nominated. The election was so unanimous, and the voice of the church so urgent, the Rev. Dr. Kip accepted the nomination, and was consecrated in Trinity Church, New York, on October 28, Festival of SS. Simon, Jude, 1853 A.D. The sermon was preached by Bishop Burgess, of Maine, and perhaps it will not be out of place in this brief history to give a few words or passages of that eloquent and touching sermon, for in the thirty years that have passed it seems like the fulfilling of prophecy:

"In this foremost temple of the great mart and metropolis of this new Western world we are assembled for a work which cannot be without fruit in distant days and in distant regions. From this spot, and from the act we are about to accomplish, the course, if Providence favors it, is straight to the Golden Gate, which opens towards Eastern Asia. He who shall enter there as the first Protestant Bishop will see before him the land which is the treasure-house of the republic. Behind it are the vales and rivers and snowy mountains, which are to our Far West the Farther West. And amidst them lie the seats of that abominable and sensual impiety, the cry of which goes up to heaven, like that of Sodom and Gomorrah from the valley of the Dead Salt Sea. Still beyond spread the deserts which divide, but which will not long divide, the Christians of this Continent.

"Upon the edge of the vast field he will stand when he shall place his foot on the shore of the Pacific. There he is to be occupied in laying the foundations of a Church which must be a pillar and ground of the truth for wide lands and for unborn millions.

"Few of the issues can he live to witness. But in the years to come, if years are given him, he must recall the prospects which opened upon him in this hour, and again when he first saw the coast of that Western ocean."

To the Bishop-elect: "Yours is an Episcopate to be exercised where fellow-laborers are still to be gathered, where seminaries are yet to be founded, where congregations are mostly to be begun. You go where thirst for gold, impatience of restraint, the vices of adventurers, and all the ills of unavoidable lawlessness have been before you; where the softening influence of old age and of childhood can as yet be little known, and where female piety throws but a small measure of its familiar light over the surface and face of society. A lover of the world, a pleaser of men, a reed shaken by the wind, has nowhere his place among the standard-bearers of CHRIST; but least of all on such an outpost beleaguered by temptations."

These passages help to show not only the magnitude of the work before the first Bishop of California, but the peculiar difficulties to encounter.

At the time of his arrival, January 29, 1854 A.D., there was but one clergyman, Rev. Dr. Wyatt, rector of Trinity, actively engaged in parochial work. Rev. Dr. Clark was prevented by age from assuming the duties of a parish, and Dr. Ver Mehr, who was nominally rector of Grace Church, was engaged most of the time with his school at Sonoma.

At the first Convention held by the Bishop, three months after his arrival, there were but three parishes represented, Trinity and Grace, of San Francisco, and St. John's parish, Stockton, and the latter existed only on paper.

In December, 1856 A.D., the Diocese having strength enough to elect a Bishop, a special Convention was called for that purpose. It met in Sacramento, February 5, 1857 A.D. There were nine clergy present, and nine parishes represented, when the Rt. Rev. William Ingraham Kip, D.D., the Missionary Bishop, was unanimously elected Bishop of the Diocese of California.

In 1874 A.D. the Diocese, by consent of General Convention, was divided, and the northern portion set off as the Missionary Jurisdiction of Northern California, of which the Rt. Rev. J. H. D. Wingfield, D.D., is its Missionary Bishop.

Instead of two parish ministers, as thirty years ago, now, with the northern portion of the State taken off, there are still about seventy on the list.

Never in its history has the Church in California been more prosperous than at the present. In sympathy, in Churchmanship, in loyalty, and devotion the clergy are united. Older parishes are awaking to the great work before them, while new missions, soon to be parishes, are springing up all over the Diocese.

To Eastern people trained in the Church and Church principles it might seem that the progress here has been slow, and that with all the reputed great wealth of California there should be Church institutions, largely endowed, springing up and reaching out aggressively all over the broad State. But very little of this great wealth is in the hands of Church people, and the Church is comparatively poor, and it has been a hand to hand struggle at times barely to exist.

In such a mixed population, the ends of the earth thrown together in a lump, as it were, with all shades of religion and no religion, one might well exclaim, "Who is sufficient for these things?" Yet amid the lawlessness, even in its early history, there have always been some noble souls doing valiant service for CHRIST and His Church. There have been earnest, self-denying souls going about doing good humbly, not to be seen of men, whose reward will one day come from Him in whose memory "no good deed is ever lost." Many a pioneer Churchman, of both clergy and laity, will be of those who shall be had "in everlasting remembrance."

The Women's Missionary Society of the Diocese (Auxiliary) is doing a good work, and many of our missionaries are cheered by their timely gifts and thoughtful care, while the little chapel is beautiful in its chancel furnished from the same source. With nearly every parish there is connected a Parish or Rectors' Aid Society, whose visits to the sick and sorrowing, together with substantial aid, do much to teach people of a living, loving CHRIST, as well as a living Church.

Trinity, the mother-parish, is a sort of rallying-point. Every year in our Diocesan Convention she welcomes the scattered children and bids them come once more around her altar. Beneath the chancel of this church rests all that is mortal of the first minister of our Church to the coast, the Rev. Flavel L. Mines.

Grace, formerly called the Cathedral, in which the Bishop labored for many years, and twice saved from the sheriff's hammer, stands upon what is called Grace Church or Nob Hill, and can be seen for many blocks around, as though inviting all to come and worship.

Advent, the down-town church, is next in age. It has its guilds, its brotherhoods, and its great army of choristers; its doors stand open to the weary laborer, as though saying, Come in and rest and pray, for this is the house of prayer.

St. John's, St. Paul's, St. Luke's, St. Stephen's, and St. Peter's,—this cluster of saints in these churches are in a certain way children of the older parishes, and are all doing good work for the Church.

Of the Church institutions, there is the Old Ladies' Home. The building was formerly used as St. Luke's Hospital; clean, bright, and truly home-like, it is admirably managed, some four ladies from each parish constituting the board. It is emphatically a Home, and its inmates, some forty in number, are tenderly cared for and their declining years made happy by watchful care and the comforting services of the Church.

The Diocese is well supplied with Church schools. I will not mention the very excellent institutions of Benicia, as they come under another head, viz., the Jurisdiction of Northern California. In this Diocese we have, as one of the oldest Church schools, St. Matthew's Hall, San Mateo, Rev. A. L. Brewer, Principal and Rector, founded in 1865 A.D. with but three pupils, until its rolls number about one hundred, and full. The school in all its appointments is well arranged; the stone church covered with ivy, the shaded walks and profusion of flowers, make a picture, one of the most beautiful in beautiful California. Independent of the thorough training, the thorough drill, and manly bearing of the cadets, the refining, Christianizing influence thrown around the boys is an education in itself.

Trinity School, in San Francisco, Rev. E. B. Spalding, Principal, though but five or six years in existence, has made splendid progress, and does great credit to its founder and instructors.

Irvin School for Young Ladies, in San Francisco, Rev. E. B. Church, Principal, is steadily growing in favor, as it so well deserves.

There are also Church schools at San José, Santa Cruz, Alameda, and Oakland, so that our Diocese is not only well supplied with Church schools, but can be congratulated on their high character and efficiency.

Many of those who helped to lay the foundation of the Church in California have passed to their reward,—“they rest from their labor, and their works follow them.” Our good Bishop, after thirty years of faithful doing, is still hale and erect, and as the years pass on is more and more beloved by his people. In “journeyings often” he visits every parish and mission in the Diocese every year, and some of them, as they call upon him, much more frequently, and among all the changes that have occurred in this changing population is a living oracle, a perpetual parish and diocesan register.

There remains yet very much land to be possessed, for our Church is but as yet in its infancy, and if but the foundation can be laid deep and strong in faith, in love, and devotion, the future historian will look upon this little sketch of the Church in 1884 A.D. as in still greater contrast than in that first Convention thirty-one years ago.

Calvinism. The system of theology of John Calvin (1509-1564 A.D.). It was based upon Augustine's system of Predestination, but was far more systematic, and was based less upon the control of the Incarnation over men than the subordination of the Incarnation and Atonement to the logical exigencies of a strict dogma of Predestination. Calvin was a master of logic, and impressed his conclusions upon many who studied his works. His system affected many who did not agree with him in his ecclesiastical theories, and Calvinism is held by a great number who are by no means in sympathy with him, simply because it expresses most logically for them the conclusions to be drawn from God's justice, prescience, and omniscience. The error lies, not in urging these, but in unconsciously subordinating to them the Atonement and its consequences to all men. In this as in so many other things, the Church does not interfere with any private opinions that are not pushed to the extent of breaking down the Articles of the Creed and to the practical denial of any part of the teachings of Holy Scripture upon the only true principle laid down in the XX. Article: "The Church hath power to decree Rules or Ceremonies and authority in controversies of Faith, and yet it is not lawful for the Church to ordain anything that is contrary to God's Word written, neither may it so expound one place of Scripture that it be repugnant to another. Wherefore, although the Church be a witness and a keeper of Holy Writ, yet, as it ought not to decree anything against the same, so, besides, the same ought it not to enforce anything to be believed for necessity of salvation." Therefore, though men may by force of their individual temperaments need to form systems, the Church cannot form any system of theology other than the breadth of Scripture and the Creed allow. Calvin's extreme notions, or rather statements, are not now so tenaciously held as formerly. The Five Points of Calvinism, as they are called, are,—

I. That God has chosen a certain number in CHRIST to everlasting glory before the foundation of the world, according to His immutable purpose and of His free grace and love, without the least foresight of faith, good works, or any conditions performed by the creatures, and that the rest of mankind

He was pleased to pass by and ordain them to dishonor and wrath for their sins, to the praise of His vindictive justice.

II. That JESUS CHRIST by His sufferings and death made an Atonement only for the sins of the elect.

III. That mankind are totally depraved in consequence of the Fall; and by virtue of Adam's being their public head the guilt of his sin was imputed, and a corrupt nature conveyed to his posterity, from which proceeds all actual transgression: and that by sin we are made subject to death, and all miseries, temporal, spiritual, and eternal.

IV. That all whom God has predestinated to life He is pleased in His appointed time effectually to call by His Word and Spirit out of that state of sin and death in which they are by nature to grace and salvation in JESUS CHRIST.

V. That those whom God has effectually called and sanctified by His Spirit shall never finally fall from a state of grace.

The older Calvinists strenuously defended these propositions, but at the present day they are held in a much modified form.

Candlemas. An old name for the Feast of the Purification of Saint Mary the Virgin (February 2). It was customary in the mediæval Church upon this feast to bear in procession, and to place in the church, a large number of lighted candles, typifying the description in the Song of Simeon of the LORD JESUS,—“a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of Thy people Israel;” hence the name Candlemas-day. Alcuin (790 A.D.) speaks of the custom; St. Bernard also (1153 A.D.). (Vide FEASTS.)

Canon. Apparently it is a name given to an officer in the Cathedral staff—a member of the Chapter—who held the same general rank as the Prebend. They with the Prebends had their several duties in the services and care of the Cathedral. Possibly the Prebend enjoyed the income from a special endowment or estate, while the Canon was maintained out of the common income of the Cathedral. However that may have been, Canons and Prebends are now merged into the single title of Canons. They are members of, and vote in, the Cathedral Chapter. (Vide CHAPTER.) Minor Canons are not of the Chapter. They ought to be all priests, skilled in Church music, and are responsible for the decent and solemn celebration of divine service in daily rotation.

Canon. The term is from the Greek Canon, and means a rule or law, or the term is used generally for Canon Law,—i.e., the rule of the Church; Canon of Scripture, i.e., the books which the Church accepts as inspired and as binding; Canon of the Liturgy, i.e., the rule for the celebration of the Holy Communion, which usually begins with the versicle, Lift up your hearts (Sursum Corda).

Canon Law. All the legislation of the Church, enacted by her own spiritual right, has from the first been embodied in Canons,—a word derived from the Greek, and signifying Rules. The earliest example of these Canons is found in the Acts of the Apostles, where by open consultation, free discussion, and joint action of Apostles, Elders, and Brethren (or, as we should now say, "Bishops, Clergy, and Laity"), the first Canons were made. At no time in the history of the Christian Church has any individual—not even the Pope—undertaken to enact Canons by his sole authority. The collective nature of the act, enduring to the present day, is an indisputable proof of the collective character of the law-making power from the beginning.

There are three distinct sources of Canon Law for us,—Ecumenical, Anglican, and American.

I. The Ecumenical Canons, besides those already alluded to in the Acts of the Apostles, include,—

1. The Apostolic Canons,—a body of eighty-five Canons, of unknown antiquity, but certainly in large measure embodying the rules of action taught everywhere by the Apostles themselves, though also with marks of later additions. The first two, brief as they are, have been the rule of all branches of the Apostolic Church in all ages: "Canon I. Let a Bishop be ordained by two or three Bishops." "Canon II. Let a Presbyter, or Deacon, and the other clergy, be ordained by one Bishop." These, as well as many others of the most important of these ancient Canons, are embodied in the "Digest" of the American Church.

2. The Canons passed by the undisputed General Councils. By the Council of Nice 20; by the first Council of Constantinople 7; by the Council of Ephesus 8; by the Council of Chalcedon 80;—these 65 Canons are of highest authority.

3. Besides these, the Council of Chalcedon gave Ecumenical approval to the Canons of several Provincial Synods, as follows: of Ancyra, 25 Canons; of Neo-Cæsarea, 15; of Gangra, 20; of Antioch, 25; of Laodicea, 60. The last of these Laodicean Canons is the earliest that settles the number of the books to be received as Holy Scripture. This entire body of Ecumenical law lies at the basis of the working system of the Church in all ages, though naturally some portions of these Canons have become obsolete through the many changes of time and circumstance.

II. The Anglican Canons. The Canons adopted in various Provincial Synods in England—Lyndwood enumerates fifteen—before the Reformation remained in force until 1603 A. D., and still continue to be of force, except where subsequent legislation has expressly altered them. Of these Dr. Hook says, "The above Canons, made by our Church before the Reformation, are, of course, binding on our Church now, and are acted upon in the Ecclesiastical Courts, except where they are superseded by subsequent Canons, or by the provisions of an Act of Parliament." Blunt's "Book of Church Law" says, "The Canons passed up to the fifteenth century were collected by William Lyndwood (Archdeacon of Canterbury, and afterwards Bishop of St. David's) in a work called 'Provinciale,' of which the best edition is that printed at Oxford in 1679. They were published in English in Johnson's 'Collection of all the Ecclesiastical Laws, Canons, Answers, or Rescripts . . . of the Church of England,' the original edition of which was printed in 1720 A. D., and a revised one, edited by Baron, in 1850 A. D. Wilkins's 'Concilia Magnæ Britanniae' contains all such documents down to 1717 A. D. Ayliffe's 'Parergon Juris Canonici Anglicani,' or, a Commentary by way of Supplement to the Canons and Constitutions of the Church of England,—a valuable work, the character of which is indicated by its title, was published in 1734 A. D. An entirely new and most trustworthy edition of Wilkins's 'Concilia' has lately been issued from the Clarendon Press under the editorship of Professor Stubbs and the Rev. A. W. Haddon."

Besides the above, there was the immense "Corpus Juris Canonici," the accumulated conglomeration of Church law as set forth by the Popes. In addition to the ancient Canons, it contains the decrees of Popes and Fathers of the Church, a large part of which are acknowledged forgeries. As edited under Gregory XIII. the bulk of the two massive folio volumes in fine print consists of the Decretum of Gratian, the Decretals of Gregory IX., the Decretals of Boniface VIII., the Clementine Constitutions (Clement V.), the Extravagantes of John XXII., and the Extravagantes Communes. In England the adoption of this Roman Canon Law was never unrestricted or unreserved. More than once the attempt to introduce it was successfully resisted; one such attempt bringing from the barons the famous reply, Nolumus leges Angliæ mutari. Subject to the admitted superiority of English law, however, many rules of the Roman Canon Law have been incorporated with the English, and the English courts have in recent times decided cases on no other authority than that of a Canon of the fourth Lateran Council, as accepted and recognized by English Ecclesiastical law.

At the Reformation settlement of this matter, which took place in the twenty-fifth year of Henry VIII., it was expressly provided that so much of the entire body of ecclesiastical legislation as did "not stand with God's laws and the laws of the realm, the same to be abrogated and taken away;" but "such of them as shall be seen . . . to stand with God's laws and the laws of the realm, to stand in full strength and power." A royal commission of thirty-two persons was to sift the whole, and put in tangible shape that which should continue in force. The "Reformatio Legum Ecclesiasticarum," issued in the reign of Edward VI., was the work of the commission contemplated; but it never received any legal sanction, so that the settlement of Henry VIII. still continues in force.

In 1603 A.D. a body of Canons was prepared by Convocation and approved by the king; but they were not adopted by Parliament, and therefore are not binding on the laity. In 1641 A.D. other Canons were put forth, but not with as high authority as those of 1603 A.D. One Canon, that concerning sponsors, has been altered since the revival of Convocation in our own day. Considerable portions of these English Canons are practically obsolete.

III. The Canons of the American Church (including the Constitution) are found in the "Digest," which is divided into four titles: Title I. is "Of the Orders in the Ministry, and of the Doctrine and Worship of the Church," including general directions for the work of Priests, Deacons, and parishes; Title II. is devoted to "Discipline," an abundance being provided for Bishops, Priests, and Deacons, and very little for anybody else; Title III. concerns the "Organized Bodies and Officers of the Church;" and Title IV. is occupied by "Miscellaneous Provisions."

There is no restriction on the power of legislation possessed by the General Convention; but many things are left to the Diocesan Conventions, especially the mode of trying Priests and Deacons. Each Diocese, therefore, has a Constitution and Canons of its own, which are of subordinate authority to those of the General Convention.

As to the present authority of these three branches of Canon Law, it may be said:

I. Of the Œcumenical Canons, a pregnant recognition is embodied in our Ordinal, where the Presiding Bishop thus addresses the Bishop-elect: "Brother, forasmuch as the Holy Scripture and the ancient Canons command," etc. This recognizes a still abiding authority in those Canons, as well as in Holy Scripture. A very large proportion of those Canons, moreover, is embodied in our own "Digest." But no specific mention of them is made in that Canon which enumerates the causes for which a cleric may be presented and tried.

II. The Anglican Canons have, by many of our leading canonists, been declared to be still binding in this country, except where American Canons have covered the same ground differently; others deny it. The House of Bishops, in 1814 A.D., distinctly affirmed it.

This, at least, may be said, that both Œcumenical and Anglican Canons are a safe guide to the individual conscience or judgment, where American Canons are silent.

III. Among the charges for which a Bishop, Priest, or Deacon may be presented and tried, our American Canon specifies "Violation of the Constitution or Canons of the General Convention," and also "Violation of the Constitution or Canons of the Diocese to which he belongs."

It would not be safe to take for granted that an Ecclesiastical Court would carry its penal discipline beyond the two specifications here made.

It has been said that the first Canons were passed by the "Apostles, Elders, and Brethren." In the case of the Œcumenical Councils (as in all Provincial Synods), though only Bishops (or the representatives of absent Bishops) voted, yet the discussions were public, and the voice of the other orders of the ministry was freely heard, so that the result may fairly be said to be the voice of all. Nor had those Canons the force of laws until they received the official sanction of the emperor, the embodiment of the lay power. During the mediæval period no Council was held without some representation of the same secular element, either in the Council itself, or applied afterwards. The common rule was, that no bull of any Pope, and no Canon of any Council, could be published as binding in any country without the consent of the king. Under the Anglican system, where the Convocation includes only Bishops and clergy, their acts do not bind as law without the approval of Parliament. And, with us, no Canon can be enacted without the free vote of the order of the laity, as well as that of the Bishops and the clergy. The shape in which the principle is embodied in our American system is the fairest of all, and the least liable to any abuse.

REV. J. H. HOPKINS, D.D.

Canon of Scripture. A point of the highest importance from many points of view is the determination of the Canonical Scriptures. It has been urged latterly that the Scriptures are not of the essence of the Faith, but only inspired records of it. While it is very true that the Faith and the facts on which it rests are so woven into the very texture of the Christian polity that they would exist in all essentials without the record, yet the very constitution of our nature, our finite condition, and the relations of God dealing towards us, necessitating a Revelation, it follows that the preservation of this Revelation could not be left to chance, but being to men, for men, and deposited with men, for their instruction, it must be preserved by them under God's general guidance. A slight examination of the distortions of the original Divine communication which belonged to all men at the first, shows us that peculiar guards are needed for the accurate conservation of such a Revelation. When the family of Abraham was chosen there was at first a transmission of the Faith by tradition. It was a simple plain fact. The unity of God, and the blessed mission for which He had chosen them and the inheritance of the land of Canaan. Doubtless the doctrine of the unity of God was obscured by contaminating heathen communications, but the tradition was direct. But when Moses received a Revelation and a Law, and an order to write them down, then preparation was also made for their due preservation. They were put beside the Ark of the Covenant, and were kept with the care that watched over that. Then the records, not the full records of what we may call the state papers and public documents of their history, but the records that exhibit the direct line of God's dealings with and care for His chosen people, as Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings,—written by men whose names may be traditionally connected with them, or which may have been forgotten, but who nevertheless were recognized as the proper persons to do this,—were also published in some authentic way. So, too, of the prophetic writings, of Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Songs,—the Psalms as belonging to the Temple ritual stands somewhat apart,—these were in some sense recognized as holy books, though not gathered into an authoritative collection as in the present Canon. The Law apparently was the only collection which received from the first full recognition. After the Captivity Ezra took up the work. He caused the Law to be read publicly. Jewish tradition assigns to him the collection and arrangement of all the books up to his time, and Nehemiah added what was wanting, save the books evidently later, as Malachi. This tradition of the Talmud shows the gradual forming of the collection of the sacred books. Later, as we know, the whole list underwent severe scrutiny, and some, as Esther and the Song of Solomon, were only received after sharp discussion. External testimony is not wanting. The translation of the Hebrew into Greek, though a work extending over a long period, may be assigned to about 270 A.D. While there are books in it which are not from Hebrew originals, and so are rejected, the list otherwise corresponds to the Palestinian Canon. In the ejected books in this Septuagint is a confused reference to the tradition of the Talmud. We have next the indirect testimony of the Alexandrian Philo, who quoted largely from some portions of the Old Testament, and referred to the laws and oracles uttered by prophets, and hymns and the other (books) by which knowledge and piety are perfected. This triple division into the books of "Moses, the Prophet, and the Psalms" (cf. Luke xxiv. 44) was common then, but the contents of the three parts varied, from thirteen prophets of Josephus to the eight that the prophets now contain, for the twelve minor prophets must be counted as one book. The usual number was arbitrarily made to consist of twenty-two books, to correspond with the twenty-two letters of the Hebrew alphabet. Thus Josephus classes them: The Law five books; the Prophets, Joshua, Judges with Ruth, Samuel, Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah with Lamentations, Ezekiel, Daniel, Ezra with Nehemiah, Esther, Chronicles, the twelve minor prophets, and Job; and the Hagiographa

Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Song of Solomon. There was a gradual transference of separate books from the section of the Prophets to that of the Hagiographa, but the triple division was still the current one, and so accepted. It in truth represented not only the gathering of the books into one formal list, but the gradual growth of it among the Jews, and the appreciation of the relation of the Canon to their national history. But this is the state of the Old Testament at the time of our LORD. His references to it with approval, and His quotations from it, place its authority for us beyond any question; and, further, His quotations were not from every book, for from a few there is no quotation. Yet since He referred to this triple division, the Law of Moses and the Prophets and the Psalms, after His Resurrection as containing all things to be fulfilled, and as He opened their understanding to receive these Scriptures, we have a special seal placed upon their authenticity and authority. We have only to notice here that the lists given by Origen (220 A.D.), and Jerome (400 A.D.), and by the Talmud (550 A.D.), completely correspond. Other lists include some or all of the apocryphal books, but Origen, Jerome, and the Talmud adhered to the Hebrew text. These larger lists merely traced their lists through translations to the Septuagint, itself a translation, with additions, as we have seen. It follows that the Apocrypha is to be rejected as uninspired.

The history of the Canon of the New Testament is parallel. The Revelation of JESUS CHRIST, recorded by chosen men, was first published and authenticated and gathered into a Canon, after thorough testing. It holds precisely the same relation to the Christian Church that the Old Testament held to the Jewish Church. Through sixty years its writings were produced as the Hebrew writings were produced during the fourteen centuries of their production,—i.e., as the circumstances of the Church demanded. Persecution and difficulty of intercommunication for such purposes kept the formation of the Canon in abeyance. The Gospels and other writings were circulated, examined, used, tested and criticised, doubted of, and finally accepted as we now have them. The list as we now have it was the generally-accepted one made by the Council of Laodicea (363 A.D.). But there were complete collections made much earlier, though there were so many of the books which were still under doubt in one part or another of the Church that there was no general readiness to accept any one catalogue, till the cessation of persecution gave the Church leisure to examine this most necessary question; and when it was done satisfactorily, though by a Provincial Council only, it was at once received and restated by other Councils. It is out of place here to do more than to indicate the various lines of evidence which go to corroborate the genuineness of the several books so received as inspired and canonical. The first and most valued is the long series of quotations—made, as from books as inspired and of ultimate authority and of the highest value, to settle other points—to be found in the Christian writers, beginning with Clement, the fellow-worker of St. Paul, in his letter to the Corinthians, and continually increasing and widening till the date of the Council above referred to, later than which it would not be necessary to trace the quotations. Indeed, every verse in the New Testament, it is said, save one, can be found in the ante-Nicene Fathers,—i.e., in the first two hundred and thirty years of Christian history. It is not that any one writer quoted from all the books, but all these writers together did so. And this is the more remarkable not merely from the comparatively slight means of circulating those writings, but from the manifold difficulties which persecution created for the diffusion of the books, and the studied concealment and protection of them. The second line of evidence is the translations which were made at an early date, as the Peschito and the Itala. The third line is the use of them in the public services, showing how they were received as of inspired authority in the worship of the Church.

The 6th Article, after concisely stating the authority of Holy Scripture and the relation of the Apocryphal books to the inspired Scriptures, gives the lists of the books of the Old Testament. This was done because of the reverence which the Latin Church showed to the Apocryphal books, and to decide the question authoritatively.

Canonization. The papal act of pronouncing upon the full sanctity of a holy person. In beatification the Pope only pronounces upon his (or her) blessedness, but does not decide whether he (or she) is a saint or not, and allows a certain cultus to be paid him. But in canonization the Pope ex cathedra announces the enrollment of the name upon the Calendar of Saints and the privilege to receive the cultus of the faithful in the Church.

In early times local fame for sanctity placed the name upon the roll. It was a continuation of the still more ancient rite of reciting the names of the faithful departed in the celebration of the Eucharist. (Vide DIPTYCHS.) But often, after the name was put upon the roll, papal sanction was sought. But the Roman See did not claim the exclusive right till the pontificate of Alexander III. (1181 A.D.). This right was not completely established till 1625 A.D., when Urban VIII. issued a bull (and a second 1634 A.D.) detailing the manner of procedure. The saint was entitled to the invocation and adoration of the whole Church. "The cultus of the beatified is permitted, the cultus of the canonized is enjoined."

Canticles. Vide THE SONG OF SOLOMON.

Cantor. The office of the singer was very anciently recognized in the Church, and he was set apart for his office with the charge, "See that thou believe in thy heart what thou sayest with thy mouth, and approve in thy works what thou believest in thy heart." The choir being divided into two parts, the Cantoris, or north side was the Precentors, or leaders, and was the leading side in the antiphonal singing, while the Decani side, in the opposite stalls, responded.

Capital. Vide ARCHITECTURE.

Capitulary. A name for a section of the laws enacted by the states-general which Charlemagne used to gather to advise upon the empire. The whole series was called The Capitularies, from capitula—chapters—of such a Diet. These capitularies of Charlemagne and his successors are well known, and are very important documents in the history of these times. They treated of every topic, from private matters to constitutional principles and ecclesiastical affairs, being often civil re-enactments of Provincial, and even Ecumenical, Canons.

Cardinal. The title of the highest dignity under the Pope of the Roman Church. Its origin lies far back in the history of the Church in Rome, but in the form and rank it now holds it dates only from the sixteenth century. Each parish in the city had its own mother or baptismal church, and the incumbent was called intitulatus incardinatus, thence cardinalis. There were seven Deacons appointed for the charitable work in the several wards or parishes, a Deacon to each Church. These formed a council to the Bishop. Afterwards Stephen IV. (771 A.D.) added the suffragan Bishops of the neighbor cities. These, with the people, had the right to nominate the Bishop of Rome; but the right to confirm was exercised by the Franco-German emperors; finally, the right to elect was secured to the Cardinals only (1058 A.D.). The number of Cardinals varied. In the time of Innocent III. there were over thirty. Death, and political intrigues and difficulties in nominating, of course, all had their force. The Council of Basle fixed the number at twenty-four. In 1559 A.D., under Pius V., there were as many as seventy-six. Sixtus V. (1590 A.D.) fixed the number at seventy-six Bishops, fifty Priests, and fourteen Deacons. A Cardinal priest of a city church in Rome may also be a Bishop of a See elsewhere.

The Pope nominates the new Cardinal in one secret Consistory, who is confirmed in a second by vote of the Cardinals present; when the creation is publicly announced, installation with the red hat, the ring of office, etc., takes place. There must be some regard paid to the rights of other nationalities to a share in holding the office, but the majority of the Cardinals are Italians.

A Cardinal is alone eligible to election to the papal throne; his title is Eminentissimus. Offense against him ranks as treason. The oldest resident Cardinal Bishop is Dean of the College of Cardinals.

Carthage. The Councils of Carthage and the Councils of Africa are frequently interchanged by historians, and as they were often composed of the same Bishops and gathered in the same place, and even in the same year, it is possible that independent partial accounts of the same Council may have come to be reckoned as accounts of separate Synods. It will not be necessary to notice more than two or three in any detail. A Council was held at Carthage, or rather several Councils were held, in the year 255 A.D., on the question of baptizing those who had already been baptized by heretics. The uniform decision was that there was no valid baptism out of the Catholic Church, and that all who had once been baptized by heretics must be baptized again for admission to the Church. St. Cyprian maintained this opinion without wavering, and there was a long dispute between him and Pope Stephen on the matter of rebaptism, which was decided finally at the Council of Arles in 314 A.D. In the year 411 A.D. a Council, or perhaps a Conference, was held at Carthage on the schism of the Donatists. After considerable discussion, decision was made that the Donatists were entirely refuted by the arguments of the Catholics, and though their leaders appealed from this decision, it was in vain, and the sect from this time declined in number and influence. Several Councils were held in Carthage in the years 412, 416, 418, and 419 A.D. Some of these are called Africa, some Carthage, some by both names; and as they were composed largely of the same Bishops, they are more like several sessions of one Council than separate Councils. In the Councils of Carthage, held in 412, 416, and 418 A.D., the heresy of Pelagius was discussed and answered, and Pelagius and his disciple, Celestius, were condemned and excommunicated. From the last of these assemblies the Bishops addressed a very strong letter on the heresy of Pelagius to Zosimus, the Pope, who seems to have been imposed upon somewhat by Pelagius and Celestius. The Council of Africa, held in 419 A.D., is also called Carthage, and is numbered by some the fourth, by others the sixth, of Carthage. Aurelius, Bishop of Carthage, called the Council and presided over it. There were present two hundred and seventeen Bishops, among whom were the Primate of Numidia, St. Augustine, Bishop of Hippo, and St. Alypius, of Thagaste. A legate of the Pope was also present. The business of the Council was on the question of appeals to the Pope. Faustinus, the legate, produced a Canon, purporting to be one made at the Council of Nice, to show that all Bishops have a right of appeal to the Pope; it was denied that there was such a Canon, and in order to determine the dispute, authentic copies of the acts of Nice were sent for from Alexandria and Constantinople. In the mean while the affair of Apiarius, a priest of Sicca, was discussed. He had been deposed and excommunicated by his Bishop, but had appealed to Pope Zosimus, who had received the appeal, contrary to the decisions of several Councils, and readmitted him to communion. The African Bishops refused to admit this pretension of the Pope with regard to the right of appeal to Rome, and great contentions arose upon the subject. Five years later another assembly, or perhaps the same Bishops, came together on the business of Apiarius. It appears that he had been a second time excommunicated, and had afterwards fled to Rome, where he was received by Pope Celestine (for Zosimus was dead, and his successor Boniface), who gave credit to his statements, received him into communion, and gave him a letter to the Bishops of Africa. Accordingly, Apiarius appeared at this Council with Faustinus, who wished to have him received into communion. But the Council proceeding to inquire into his conduct, Apiarius confessed his crimes and was cut off from the body of the Church. By this time an answer had been received from Cyril of Alexandria and Atticus of Constantinople, certifying that the Canons cited by Zosimus were not made at Nice; so the Council addressed a letter to Pope Celestine, in which they complained of his conduct in the matter of Apiarius; begged him not to listen so easily to those who came to him from Africa; not to receive into communion those whom they had excommunicated, as this was contrary to Nice, which decided that all cases should be settled in the province where they arise, and could not be carried elsewhere without the especial direction of the Church; they added that the aid of the HOLY SPIRIT might be hoped for to assist several Bishops together as much as one alone; and finally they begged the Pope to send no more legates to Africa to execute his judgments, as likely to introduce too much of the pride of the world into the Church of CHRIST. A hundred years later, a Council was held at Carthage under Bonifacius, when certain Canons were passed forbidding without distinction all appeals beyond the sea. The Church of Africa maintained her right of judging her priests without appeal until the time of Gregory the Great.

Cassock. A long straight gown of some kind of stuff, or cloth. In the Church of Rome it varies in color with the dignity of the wearer. Priests wear black; Bishops, purple; Cardinals, scarlet, and Popes, white. In the Church of England black is worn by all the three orders of the clergy, but Bishops, upon state occasions, often wear purple coats. The lxxiv. English Canon enjoins that beneficed clergymen, etc., shall not go in public in their doublet and hose without coats or cassocks. Jebb. (Hook's Church Dictionary.)

Casuistry, or Cases of Conscience. Casuistry is the name that is given to that science which aims to show how to resolve "cases of conscience," as they are called. They are cases in which we are in doubt as to what is our duty, the doubt or hesitation arising from the fact that there are two or more duties, each of which has claims upon us, which are so situated that we can perform only one of them. The aim was legitimate and good; but the science, this branch of Moral Philosophy and Christian Ethics,—for it was included in both alike,—has fallen into neglect and some measure of disrepute, so that it is now seldom or never included in any treatises on these subjects. The disrepute into which it has fallen has resulted from two causes. In the first place, the views of Christian life and duty taken by Protestant denominations generally give but little occasion for the application of any of the principles of casuistry as it was taught by writers before the Reformation, and as it is still taught in the books of Roman Catholics on the subject. The other reason, which was perhaps much the most influential on the whole, was the fact that casuistry was too often used and regarded as a means of finding out how to escape the performance of some duty that was distasteful or inconvenient, rather than as a means for finding out in a conflict of several duties, which one of them was really the duty that ought to be performed.

Still, however, casuistry, properly regarded and properly treated, has its place and its use, and it ought not to be omitted from any work that undertakes to show a man what his duties are, or to help him to find out how he ought to deport himself, and what he ought to do under all conditions and in all the circumstances of life, whether it claims to be a treatise of Moral Philosophy based on reason and the light of nature alone, or a treatise on Christian Ethics based chiefly on the truths and doctrines of Revelation.

In the one case, that of Moral Philosophy, the rule is one of law, the fulfillment of which is exact and complete righteousness, with always a possibility of going beyond the requirements of duty and doing what will thus become works of "supererogation." In the other case,—Christian Ethics,—where the attention is directed both to the purity of heart and the uprightness of the motives, it is hardly recognized as a possibility that one can go beyond the requirement of the law—the law of liberty and of grace—and do more than is needed to fulfill one's obligations. Nay, only one Being in "the form of man" is supposed to have ever done so much as to fulfill the requirements of the law. In this code there are but two great duties,—love to God and love to man; these, when properly understood, can never be in conflict by any possibility or in any case. No human being can, in fact, come fully up to the requirements.

Still, however, there is a place and a sphere for casuistry even here. For although there can be no conflict between our duty to God and our duty to our fellow-men, when both are rightly understood, there will be many cases in the life of an earnest and conscientious man when he will be in doubt about his duty, even from a Christian point of view.

As specimens of the questions that have been discussed under the head of casuistry take the following. Under the head of the duty of truthfulness, "how far is one justifiable in withholding the truth and misleading others by telling what is known to be false, when the telling of the truth would put the man who tells it to inconvenience or loss, or damage to his friends, his country, or his Church?" Or, again, as coming under the head of honesty, "how far may a servant whose wages are either insufficient to support him and his family or below what they ought to be, take the property of his employer without his knowledge or consent to make up the deficiency?" It will readily be seen how and why the subject of casuistry should fall into disrepute when it is occupied with such questions.

Still, however, as we have already said, there will be occasions for the exercise of genuine casuistry in its proper and higher sense, whether we regard the matter as one purely of Moral Philosophy or as one of Christian Ethics.

As a matter of Moral Philosophy I think we may get a very important help from a recognition of the fact that our duties may be referred to those classes, with reference to their grade of importance or claim to preference in making our selection. In the first place, we may speak of those duties which each one of us may be said to owe to himself; second, those that he owes to his fellow-men; and, thirdly, those that he owes in the several orders to his country, to humanity, and to God.

Among the duties that one owes to himself are temperance, sobriety, care of health, moral and intellectual culture, and such like. Now it is hardly possible that there should occur any conflict between those duties one owes to himself and the duties of either of the higher grades. On the contrary, the performance and perfection of these duties are a help towards the performance of the higher duties. Health, temperance, purity, and a high state of culture make us more valuable to others and enable us to render duties of a higher grade, or to perform them more fully and more acceptably, than we could if we were deformed and degraded by the vices which are the opposites of those virtues and accomplishments. Then as between our duties to our families, our friends, and our country, humanity, and to God, there is less often a conflict than we are apt to imagine. But when there is really a conflict, there can be no doubt that the objects rise in superiority the one to the other, in the order in which they are named above. One who is fit to be a martyr for truth, for his country, and his God should have no hesitation about being a martyr. But no man of a mean or cowardly disposition has any such call, or any qualification for the calling. Men who are worthy to be martyrs are always the men who have the respect and esteem of their fellow-men, for their moral excellence and mental superiority. Of the foremost and most worthy of all the martyrs the world has ever had it was "He who has done nothing amiss," there was no cause of death in Him, "not even so much as a word of guile was ever found in His mouth." No one can render effective and acceptable service to any cause as a martyr who does not command the respect and confidence of his fellow-men.

We can well understand how one should enter upon a course of heroic devotion to his country or the service of God without even a regret for the comfort, the ease, and the occasions for selfish and sensual indulgence which the duties he undertakes to perform may compel him to sacrifice. But we cannot understand how any one should enter upon such a course without regret and pain at the thought of the sacrifices which others must make, or the losses which this course may entail upon them,—the loss of society and companionship, and, as it will often happen, the loss of much needed help and support. Hence one should well scan his motives before entering upon such duties, involving, as it does, the neglect or non-performance of other duties that are in a way and to a certain degree, at least, due to one's relatives and neighbors. He should carefully consider whether any help that he can render to the higher cause will compensate in the general balance for the loss of those duties which by a different course he could certainly perform for the good of man and the glory of God.

As a matter of Christian ethics the solution of questions of conscience or of duty becomes a very different thing. Here we have not only the Scriptures but also the Church in general, and each one his own immediate and particular Christian pastor, to inform, advise, and to guide him. But the Scriptures themselves have put the matter in such a light that the solution of such questions becomes comparatively easy. Christianity directs attention to the motives by which one is actuated in what he does as a chief and controlling element. It distinctly recognizes the fact that one may do from the best of motives what ought not to be done, and may, on the other hand, do from very bad motives the very thing that ought to be done. St. Paul will furnish us an example of both cases,—the one in his own person, and the other in that of some of the people with whom he was brought into contact in the course of his ministry. Before his conversion, and when he was persecuting the Christians, in a spirit of determined opposition to the very Gospel which he afterwards so effectively preached, he, as he himself informs us, did it from a zeal for God and the truth. The act was about the worst that could be done as he came to regard it afterwards, while the motive was of the highest order, and that one which of all others he regarded as the most holy and commendable. For an example of the other class of cases we may refer to his Epistle to the Philippians, chap. i. 15, where he says that some have preached CHRIST "of envy and strife," "not sincerely," but from mere "contention," supposing and intending to add "affliction to his bonds." "What then?" he asks, "notwithstanding, every way, whether in pretense, or in truth, CHRIST is preached; and I therein do rejoice, yea, I will rejoice." Hence manifestly the motive was bad, although the act was a very proper thing to be done. And so in fact in a large share of what we undertake there is always the possibility of some element of bad motive. However good and commendable the work in which we engage, the enforcement of law and the administration of discipline may be prompted or pursued more intensely than it would otherwise be from motives of anger or dislike towards those who are the objects of our activity and our zeal. So too in the highest, noblest works we can undertake,—even those that seem most noble and heroic, even in those cases where martyrdom may appear to be the inevitable result, there may be something of an unholy feeling, something of pride, of ambition, some thought of the halo of glory that will accompany our name in all the future generations of men.

Christianity does not teach, as it is sometimes claimed, that the character of our acts depends wholly and exclusively on our motives. It recognizes the fact, as we have just said and seen, that the motive may be bad while the act is good, and the reverse, which will happen far more frequently. The motive may be perfectly pure and good, while the act we perform is one that ought not to be done. And although we may hope for pardon from God, as St. Paul did, and obtain it, as he assures us he did, there are often certain natural consequences that will follow our acts which no repentance can avert, and from which, so far as we know, God will not grant us any exemption. The broken constitution that comes from a life of dissipation and vice will not be restored, although, as we may hope and believe, the final penalty for the transgression which is to follow in the next world will be remitted, and in fact many of the purely essential and psychical consequences may be averted by Divine grace, so that peace and hope will come as the result of the Divine favor and forgiveness.

We have spoken of three guides which the Christian believer has to a knowledge of his duty in the order of their authority and importance,—the Holy Scriptures, the Church, and the immediate pastor of each one as a member of some congregation of Christians. Ample provision is thus made for all classes and conditions of men. For the very lowest in the scale of culture, the most ignorant and least intellectual, perhaps, this order should be reversed, so as to put the pastor first, then the Church, and finally the Holy Scriptures; for, as a matter of fact, what these people learn of CHRIST and of duty they learn from their pastor, and through him they may come to know of the teachings of the Holy Scriptures or of the Church, without distinguishing or knowing any difference between the two elements, or in fact that these are the two sources from which this instruction has come to them. Such is the provision for the very lowest and those who have the least opportunity to learn and judge for themselves. Now we may well believe that for such persons God will not hold them responsible, to any considerable extent at least, for the errors that may be taught them, if any such should have entered into the instruction that has been given them. But for those of larger endowments there can be no doubt that God will hold them responsible for any errors they may hold, whether in doctrine or in regard to their duty, which they might have avoided by such a study of the Church and the Holy Scriptures as it was in their power to make. The Bible is for all, and all who can do so should read it. But it needs interpretation, and there are none, even the most learned and the wisest, who do not find in it many things that are "hard to be understood," and for the right understanding of which they would be glad of help that they have not yet received. But with regard to duty—the minor details of our actions—I think there are two principles or rules of the greatest importance. I speak now not of doctrine, or the doctrines of the faith, but of duty, what we are to do, and chiefly of those minor points of duty in regard to which there is most likely to be doubt, difficulty, or in which there may arise conflicts of duties, so that we are in doubt which to perform in order to serve God most acceptably.

1. The first principle is that it is always better to err, if we must err at all, or are in danger of erring, on the side of self-denial and generosity than in the direction of self-indulgence and selfishness. Most of us need restraint in the indulgence of our appetites and the enjoyment of our pleasures. Periods of prayer, abstinence, and self-denial are prescribed, and they are found necessary for most persons, and beneficial, I doubt not, for all. Now whenever a case of doubt occurs, in which it is merely a question of a little more enjoyment or ease on our part, and a duty of charity or of forbearance for the good of others, this principle will help us to a very ready solution. By abstinence and self-denial in order to do a deed of charity or to promote the happiness and welfare of some other person, we may be doing a double duty and conferring a twofold benefit,—one on ourselves and one on some brother in this common humanity of ours, on some one of those in reference to whom CHRIST has said, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of those ye have done it unto me."

Of course there is a possibility of carrying our abstinence and self-surrender, not to say self-sacrifice, too far. There may be an abstinence and self-neglect that will impair the health or endanger the life. And there are cases of course in which one will have duties to perform that will require self-sacrifice to that extent. In the case of the parent and the professional nurse, as well as that of the physician, it sometimes becomes a clear duty to do what the case requires even at the risk of health and of life. And there are cases, as we cannot doubt, in which persons who are not supposed, and cannot be supposed on any general principles of duty to run such risks, have nevertheless done so, with the approval of God, and, as we doubt not, the approval of all right-minded persons and with, at any rate, the admiration of all subsequent ages.

And so with generosity. If in a matter of doubt whether I owe a man six pence or ten pence, on the principle I have stated it is safer, and, in a Christian point of view, it is better, to pay the ten pence. Most of us have constitutionally and naturally quite enough of selfishness. We need rather to check than to cultivate and encourage it. By acting on the rule suggested we may, and most likely we shall, be gaining more in a spiritual way than we lose in our temporal affairs.

This principle, however, should not be so understood and applied as to inculcate submission to wrong and extortion when the right is clearly known. We are speaking of cases of doubt, and not at all of those in which the right is clearly seen and known. How far we may submit to what is clearly wrong and unjust is another question, and one, too, that we are not considering now. There are cases, doubtless, in which it is a duty to resist wrong, not necessarily from any motives of self-interest or hope of gain or advantage to ourselves, but in the cause of truth, and of those great principles of righteousness without which there can be no peace on earth and on which happiness in the kingdom of heaven itself is founded.

2. The other great principle to which I referred is that of spiritual guidance in answer to prayer. In the state of nature our natural instincts are suggestive. In almost any circumstances, and in view of our duty before us, which is to be either done or to be left undone, those instincts will suggest, each one according to its nature, what we shall do. The instincts of a generous man will suggest and incline him to act generously, and he will decide and act accordingly; while the man of a different natural tendency in this respect will as readily choose and act in the other way under precisely the same circumstances. In this way we all show what is our natural disposition.

And these differences in natural disposition constitute the difference in natural character which we all exhibit in daily life, and which, to some extent, remain and underlie as a basis and the ground-soil the character that we carry or maintain through life, notwithstanding all the natural culture we may receive. But Christianity and Christian conversion changes our nature in this respect. It implants new instincts, gives new aims in life, and especially does it establish the idea of God, as omnipresent, knowing the very secrets of our thoughts and hearts, as a Being to be supremely loved and to be feared more than all else that we can have thought or conception of, and this puts its natural instincts and propensities to a very large extent into abeyance or into a state of inactivity, just as one may be so absorbed in some earthly pursuit that he becomes unconscious of pains, and even of bodily needs. One may even be so much overcome by fear as to be incapable of anger or of lust. Now, whatever of supernatural there may be in the religious experience, there is a change of this kind in our thoughts and feelings in consequence of the rise into activity of the religious emotions awakened in us by our Christian faith. Through the influence of this faith, and by perseverance in the acts and mode of life which Christianity prescribes and requires, these new motives become constantly prominent and predominating. They become habits, and supersede the old, constitutional, and natural instincts of the individual, so that after a period of confirmed experience and acquired habit, he acts as promptly, as unconsciously of his motives, and in a certain sense as naturally in the new way as he did in the old way—"after the flesh," as the Apostle calls it—before the change.

Now, the Bible teaches that in and along with this change the HOLY GHOST works on our hearts. And not only so, but Divine guidance, the sacred influence of the HOLY SPIRIT, will be given to guide us in all questions of doubt and uncertainty in answer to our prayers. When we pray for specific objects we are apt to confine our desires for those objects, and to encourage and strengthen our hopes of realizing them. But when we subordinate our wills to the will of God, and in praying for any object, pray also, and still more earnestly, that His will may be done, whatever may become of the object we desire, this is pretty sure to cause a clear, settled, and abiding conviction as to what we ought to do. On such a conviction we find that we may act, and have no cause to repent of our action; and seldom, perhaps never, if we want to see all the consequences of our act, shall we come to regret it or to wish that we had done otherwise, or in any respect differently from what we were led, as we shall believe, to do by the guidance of God, working within by His HOLY SPIRIT, and without and around us by His overruling providence. In the light of Christian Ethics, therefore, one does wrong only when (1) before the conscious adoption of the Christian Faith he follows those natural instincts which are bad, or in the degree and form in which they are bad, or (2) when, after having come under the influence of the Christian Faith and the guidance of the HOLY SPIRIT, he allows himself to choose an act without consulting and allowing himself to be guided by the Divine influence; and the only practical difficulty in this latter stage of our experience seems to be in silencing our own hearts and its promptings,—the promptings of that "corruption of our nature," "the infection of which doth remain even in those that are regenerate," and will remain until we are wholly transformed into the image of "Him who is our Resurrection and our Life."

Catechism. To give instruction, to teach, is an essential part of the spiritual teaching every Christian should receive. It was based upon the rule our LORD gave the Apostles: "Go ye, therefore, and make disciples of all the nations, baptizing them into the name of the FATHER, and of the SON, and of the HOLY GHOST: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I commanded you" (St. Matt. xxviii. 19, 20). Whenever the Church made converts she instructed each specially in the doctrines of the Faith. From this grew up the Creed, and for this schools were everywhere established for the training of the catechumens. Several of these schools, or rather the teachers of them, became famous. The Alexandrian and Antiochean schools bore an important part in the early Church teaching, and most disastrously since Arius the heretic was trained in Antioch under Lucian the martyr, where he imbibed those principles of dialectics which resulted in his heretical doctrines, and was master for a time in the Alexandrian school, before his heresy became so flagrant. Pantænus, Clement of Alexandria, and Origen, were famous instructors in this school. Cyril of Jerusalem delivered in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre the valuable Catechetical Lectures that have come down to us. Everywhere the office of the Catechist was an important one, intrusted to him who was fittest. It was not properly confined to any order; a Layman, Deacon, Priest, or Bishop, as he had the gift and the opportunity, could fill it.

So St. Augustine wrote for a Deacon his elements of catechising (De Rud. Catech.). There was ever a watchful care to see that children were properly catechised, and we have frequent enactments by Councils and Synods upon this important duty. The rough, strong missionary sermons of St. Boniface (740 A.D.) have a catechetical force and directness. So, too, in a missionary journey into Pomerania, Bishop Otho catechised the converts to the number of seven thousand, it is said (1124 A.D.). A great activity in this work was developed by the Reformation, and nearly every leading Reformer compiled a catechism which contained his own peculiar doctrinal views. Injunctions were made by Cranmer, and issued by Henry VIII. (1536 A.D.), enjoining the clergy anew to train the children in the Creed, LORD's Prayer, and Ten Commandments. In Edward VI. Primer (1553 A.D.) a long catechism was set forth. In the Confirmation Office was prefixed the first half of our present Catechism. Who its author was is not certain. It has been claimed for Alexander Howell, second master in Westminster school in 1549 A.D., but Dean of St. Paul's from 1560 to 1602 A.D.; also for Bishop Poynt, who was Bishop of Rochester in 1550 A.D. Bishop Goodrich, of Ely, has also been urged as its author, since the duty towards God and the duty towards my neighbor are on tablets in the walls of a spacious bow-window which he added to the Palace of Ely. The catechism in Edward's Prayer-Books ended with the explanation of the LORD's Prayer. At the Hampton Court Conference, 1603 A.D., the Puritans complained that the Catechism was too short. In consequence the latter part, upon the Sacraments, was drawn up. Its author is claimed by Bishop Cosin to have been Bishop Overall, at that time Dean of St. Paul's. It is probable that he translated from some Latin catechism.

The present system of Sunday-schools usurps too much the place of proper catechetical instruction or thorough drill in the Catechism. It should be made a much more important part of the parochial work, in accordance with the plain language of the rubric at the end of the Catechism. The failure to do this lies of course mainly upon the rector, but the laity are not free. But little pains are taken to see that the children are so instructed at home that they can be profitably sent to the church to be catechised, and but little more care is taken to see that they do go at all whenever there is this duty discharged. Were the parents themselves to come, or were the open catechising directed by the Prayer-Book held after the second lesson in the evening service, when the parents and guardians could make it a duty to be present, there would be more energy and zeal shown. It is true that not all have the gift to catechise happily, but it can always be made most profitable to all engaged. The rubrics demand the earnest attention of every layman:

"§ The minister of every Parish shall diligently, upon Sundays and Holy-days, or on some other convenient occasions, openly in the Church instruct or examine so many children of his Parish sent unto him as he shall think convenient in some part of this Catechism.

"§ And all fathers, mothers, masters, and mistresses shall cause their children, servants, and apprentices who have not learned their Catechism, to come to the Church at the time appointed, and obediently to hear and to be ordered by the minister, until such time as they have learned all that is then appointed for them to learn.

"§ So soon as children are come to a competent age and can say the Creed, the LORD's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments, and can answer to the other questions of this short Catechism, they shall be brought to the Bishop.

"§ And whensoever the Bishop shall give knowledge for children to be brought unto him for their Confirmation, the minister of every Parish shall either bring or send in writing, with his hand subscribed thereto, the names of all such persons within his Parish as he shall think fit to be presented to the Bishop to be confirmed."

The plan of the Catechism is very obvious. It is a most comprehensive summary, setting forth clearly the Baptismal Covenant, and our duty to assume it; the Creed and its summary; the Covenant of duty in the Ten Commandments, with a noble exposition of it; the Law of Prayer, and the grace of the Sacraments. As the Bishops at the Savoy Conference replied to Puritan objections, "The Catechism is not intended as a whole body of divinity, but as a comprehension of the Articles of Faith and other doctrines most necessary to salvation."

Catechumens. In the early Church those who were preparing for baptism, or who sought instruction in Christian doctrine for that end, were admitted into a class by some significant rite, by the laying on of hands and the sign of the cross. They were, besides receiving special instruction from the catechist, allowed to attend the public service and to listen to the Scriptures and to sermons, probably from some allotted place in the church. They were dismissed from the church with some special prayer, as this, from St. Chrysostom's Liturgy:

"LORD our GOD who dwellest on high and beholdest the humble, who didst send forth the salvation of the race of man, Thine only-begotten SON, our GOD and LORD JESUS CHRIST, look down upon Thy servants the Catechumens who have bowed their necks unto Thee; and make them worthy, in due season, of the laver of regeneration, of the forgiveness of sins, of the robe of immortality; unite them to Thy Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church, and number them together with Thy elect flock, that they also together with us may glorify Thy honorable and majestic Name, FATHER, SON, and HOLY GHOST, now and ever and to ages of ages. Amen."

As they were better prepared they were instructed in the great facts and dogmatic truths, but were not intrusted with the words of either the Creed or the LORD's Prayer till just before baptism. The teaching was clear and as full as the condition of the catechumen would permit. But if the catechumen was approaching death or was in danger of martyrdom, the regular season of baptism was anticipated, and he was baptized without hesitation or delay; or if baptism could not be administered in cases of martyrdom, the Church held that the baptism of blood supplied the grace of the laver.

Cathedral. Society in the first of the Christian centuries was urban, and the political organization was municipal. A man's country was not a region but a city; his patriotism did not embrace a whole nation of the same language and blood as himself, but those only who with him were shut up within the walls of a single town. A man was not a Greek or Italian, but an Athenian or a Roman. Within the walls of each city were the schools of philosophy, the political assembly, the sharp activities of commerce, the glorious works of art, and the magnificent temples and the worship of the gods. They who lived in the midst of all this urban culture, excitement, and strife could but grow in mental vigor, sensitiveness of spirit, and eagerness for what was new. On the other hand, they who were shut out and condemned to the drudgery of daily and endless toil, born to labor and with children doomed to the same hard lot, grew with the years and the generations more and more stolid, clinging unreasoningly to the past and ready to adopt what was unwonted and new.

When they to whom the august command was given, to go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature, set about its obedience, they followed of necessity the lines on which they found society organized. They passed through the fields and villages, and the scanty and stolid populations there, into the city. They did so because here the multitudes were gathered. And these multitudes by education, culture, refinement, and long, daily, and anxious reasoning about the soul, its nature and destiny, had outgrown the mythology of their fathers and were ready to hear, heed, and accept a new solution of the mysteries of life, death, and immortality. But an itinerant apostleship, that blessed one city for a little while, and then, before what there had been won was well assured, was under the necessity of passing on to another, was unequal to the exigencies. As each city was a whole country unto its citizens, and commanded of them a patriotism as enthusiastic and narrow as the love of home, it followed that a local, stationary resident and municipal Episcopate was the only institution which could effectually work upon such populations. A Bishop of Greece or Italy was impossible. The autonomy of a Church in each city was a necessity by reason of the nature of every municipality. It was for this reason that the Apostles appointed elders in every city.

The actual work of obedience to the Divine command was conducted in the way we should expect. Going to his own city, the Bishop established himself in a certain place of residence and ministrations. Here he gathered about him his Priests and Deacons in numbers according to circumstances; all living together, their hearts aflame with a common zeal, their intense activities devoted to a common life and work and destiny. Each of those whom he had gathered around him was assigned by him to some special task,—e.g., labor among a class of the people whom he could more readily reach, or a section of the city which he could more conveniently serve, or a function of preaching or teaching or disputing or writing to which he was specially fitted. Each goes to his place and work, and returns to the Bishop with reports of what he has done and seen and heard, and to receive new orders, instructions, and assignments to duty. This common home of all his people, where all the ways of all their work begin and end, whither, after all toils and dangers and persecutions, they turn their weary feet for rest and their weary hearts for solace, is the Cathedral. It was not only the first Church in order of time: It was long the only Church, and it held its primacy among the institutions of the Christian state because it was the focus of all the work of the Diocese.

In Saxon England society was very differently organized. There were few towns. The population was sparsely scattered over the country. Each family, with its branches and dependents living by itself, held wide tracts of land, and much of the country lay vacant. The people were devoted to agriculture and pasturage. Their manners were rude and simple, and they were disinclined to the exactions of compact society. The polity was loose and easy; the country was divided among many tribes with indefinite, democratic institutions. Each had its king, but he was king in little else than name, except for purposes of defense and war.

The Bishop entering upon the work of converting a tribe fixed his seat, his Bishop's stool, as it was called, at any convenient place of his choice, and with no regard to population. Sometimes, as, for instance, at Ely, he planted it by itself in a vacant region, the religious colony afterwards drawing the people around it. Accordingly, he was the Bishop, not of a city, but of a tribe. This is illustrated by his title. On the Continent the Bishops were called after their city, as the Bishop of Jerusalem, of Antioch, of Rome. On the island, on the other hand, society being rural and the polity tribal, the Bishops took their style from their people. For instance, there was a tribe called the Somersætas, from which the name Somerset comes. The Bishop, whose seat was at Wells, was the Bishop, not of Wells, but of the Somersætas. There was also the tribe of the West Saxons, who had the royal city of Winchester. Their Bishop was not the Bishop of Winchester, but of the West Saxons.

But, however interesting this difference in circumstances, the work in Britain was the same as elsewhere, and was carried on in the same way. The Bishop having made choice of the place where he should live, built there the church, houses, gardens, farms, and all necessary conveniences for his clerical colony. Here he gathered about him his Priests and Deacons in considerable numbers, giving them homes in his own houses, and supporting them from his revenues. The life was not necessarily celibate, nor under one roof, nor at one table; but it was in community. He was the head of the family, and he ruled it as a father his household. He apportioned the work among his clergy, giving to each his place, office, and task. To this one he gave this circuit to travel in the country of the tribe, and to another that; to one he appointed this station or mission, and to another that; and so on through all the work of the Diocese. The sphere of duty whose centre was here embraced all ministrations, charities, instructions, and interests; and the service which went forth hence was circumscribed only by the boundaries of the whole Diocese. This centre of work was the Cathedral. For four centuries this was the polity of the Church, as well among rude and rural tribes of England as in the intense life of the great cities. Everywhere the polity of the primitive Church was the Diocesan system, just as everywhere the administration was Episcopal. The centre of the Diocese was the Cathedral, and from thence the work was conducted.

Throughout all the course of history, in all parts of the world, the polity of the primitive times has controlled the whole of the development of the constitution of the Christian Church. Its principles, modes, and administration have at all times been founded on what the Apostles and their immediate successors adopted and established. Under the pressure of circumstances there have been modifications in incidents and details, but never in what was essential and organic. When Christianity became the religion of the people, and the Cathedral could not contain them, nor be served directly from it, parishes sprang up as separate independent points of work. But the Bishop exercised his jurisdiction from his own Church as from the capitol of his Diocese. Thence proceeded the authority, the administration, the service by which the Diocese in city and country alike, and all the people, urban and rural, were ruled and served. The body of the clergy who hitherto had held a direct, personal, and constant relation to the Bishop, became now divided into two classes, one the Parochial, the other the Cathedral, clergy. The active work among the people was assumed by the former; the powers which all the Presbyters had exercised in assisting the Bishop in the administration of his office devolved upon the latter. The Diocesan system became accordingly separated into the Parochial and the Cathedral system; each of which was the complement of the other, and the whole still having a perfect union in the Episcopal function.

The Clergy of the Cathedral were now consolidated into a compact and highly-organized body. We shall define their duties and powers hereafter. We have now to direct our attention to their organization. They were first called Canons in the eighth century. Their corporation was called the Chapter. Their number differed at different Cathedrals and at different times. At Wells there were in the tenth century four or five; in the twelfth at first ten, then twenty-two; afterwards the number was raised to fifty. At St. Paul's, London, there were thirty, and at Lincoln fifty-two. It was necessary that these great societies should have officers charged with special duties. The principal officer of the Cathedral body after the Bishop was called the Dean. Dean Milman in his Annals of St. Paul's, London (p. 182), thus defines his duties and office: "The Dean had supreme authority; was bound to defend the liberties of the Church; was bound by his oath to observe and to compel others, from the Canons down to the lowest officer and servants, to observe the laudable customs of the Church, to watch over all the possessions of the Church, and to recover what might have been lost or alienated. He had authority also over all who inhabited the manors and estates; an authority which singularly combined the seigniorial and spiritual jurisdictions. He was the guardian at once of the rights and interests of the poorer tenants, and, it may also be said, vassals, as well as of their morals and religion. The Dean presided in all causes brought before the Chapter and determined them, with the advice of the Chapter. He corrected, with the advice of the Chapter, all excesses and contumacies. Lighter offenses of inferior persons were punished by the Chancellor. The Bishop had no authority in capitular affairs, except on appeal. The Dean, for more heinous offenses, could expel from the choir, and cut off all stipends and emoluments, with discretion, to the edification, not the destruction, of the Church. These words are in Colet's unaccepted code; but the same spirit prevails throughout the older statutes, only in different forms. The Dean had a Sub-dean to perform his functions when abroad or incapacitated from duty, with authority over all the inferior members of the Church except the Canons."

Next in rank to the Dean was the Precentor, who had charge of the choir of the Cathedral, and all the services which were performed in it, and the schools of music. He directed the music and had the discipline of all the choristers and singers. His deputy, where he had one, was called the Succentor.

Next after the Precentor came the Chancellor, who was charged with the care of the library, and the grammar and divinity schools. It was also his duty to lecture to the Cathedral clergy on divinity, and to organize theological instruction given by others. In some places, as at St. Paul's, he had "charge of education, not only for the Church, but for the whole city; all teachers of grammar are subject to him." His deputy was the Vice-Chancellor.

The last of the officers of the Chapter was the Treasurer. "The Treasurer was the responsible guardian of the treasures of the Church, and ample indeed they were. Reliques, first in value and importance; books, of which there is a curious catalogue; vessels of gold and silver, vestments, chalices, crosses, curtains, cushions, and palls. He was answerable to the Dean and Chapter for the safe custody of all these precious things, and could not lend any of them without the consent of the Dean and Chapter. Under the Treasurer was the Sacrist. His office was to superintend the tolling of the bells, to open the doors of the Church at the appointed times, to dress the altars, and take care that the vessels and vestments were clean and in good order. The Sacrist was to take care that there was in the Church, even on the festivals, no crowd, noise or singing, neither talking, quarrelling, nor jesting, neither business nor sleeping. He was to maintain order and conduct every one to his proper place."

There was another body of the Cathedral clergy who cannot be passed over, namely, the Vicars. When non-residence became common it was required of each Canon that he provide a clergyman who should take his place in his absence; and the rule sprang up making it his duty to always have a deputy. Just as the Dean had his Subdean, the Precentor his Succentor, and so on, each Canon had his deputy, who was called his Vicar. There were therefore as many Vicars as there were Canons. When the Canons forsook the Cathedral for their prebends, the Vicars carried on the services and work perhaps as efficiently and decorously as those whom they represented. An old writer of those times, seeking to show the superiority of the monks over the secular Canons, says that the former praise God with their mouths, the latter through their Vicars. There is a story of Thomas à Becket, when Archbishop of Canterbury, sending a man with a bull of excommunication against the Bishop of London, who went to St. Paul's Cathedral on Ascension-day, and on that great festival found the officiating priest neither Bishop, Dean, nor Canon, but only a Vicar. The Vicars of each Cathedral having common employment, interests, and life, were naturally drawn together. First, they acquired estates separate from those of the Canons; then they had houses of their own, dormitories, refectories, and chapels; at last, unmarried and living a purely collegiate life, they were formed into a corporation, so that, as there was the corporation of the Dean and Canons, so there was a corporation of the Vicars. They were now no longer each the deputy of a Canon, but were the assistants of the residentiaries in the service and work of the Cathedral. Then a distinction came in,—there were priest Vicars and lay Vicars. But the latter were not merely singing men paid each as stipendiaries, but members of the college, with equal rights with their clerical brethren.

For many centuries all the Canons resided continuously at the Cathedral, and found their sole occupation in service there and in service proceeding therefrom. But after a time the Chapters acquired the right to appoint the Priests of certain Parishes, who received its tithes and other revenues, and naturally they appointed their own members to those places. Clergy holding such beneficiaries had thus two offices,—one, that of Canon; the other, that of Parish Priest, his title in the latter capacity being that of Prebend. The two functions were united in one person, but were distinct. By and by some of the Canons lived most of their time in their Parishes, leaving their duties at the Cathedral to their Vicars. Others lived most of the time at the Cathedrals, leaving their parochial duties to Priests whom they employed. At length the separation between the two classes became so fixed that the name of Canon was borne only by the Cathedral clergy, while that of Prebend was applied to those who remained on the beneficiaries. The distinction was further marked by the names residentiary Canons, that is, those who retained duties at the Cathedral, and non-residentiary Canons, that is, those who had only incidental or slight or no duties there.

The Chapters were composed only of the residentiaries. But there was also a general Chapter to which the non-residentiaries of most Cathedrals were summoned. The duties of this larger body were those of electing Bishops and representatives in Convocations.

This highly-organized system existed in its perfection in the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth centuries throughout Europe and in Great Britain without material differences between them. But some of the Cathedrals were Monasteries, the Abbot holding the place of Dean, and the monks the places of the Canons.

When Henry VIII. suppressed the Monasteries in England he made no exceptions of the Cathedrals which were served by monks. These were Canterbury, Winchester, Worcester, Durham, Norwich, Rochester, Ely, and Carlisle. He found himself compelled to re-establish Chapters at these Cathedrals. The organization which he provided for them was much simpler than that which we have described. Each had a Dean and from four to twelve resident Canons, who formed the Chapter. Each also had honorary Canons, but this was only an empty title. Instead of Vicars there were Minor Canons, who performed the same duties. There were no Precentors, Chancellors, or Treasurers, but their duties were imposed on the Minor Canons. These Cathedrals are called Cathedrals of the new foundation. The others are called Cathedrals of the old foundation. The latter are London, York, Exeter, Salisbury, Wells, Lincoln, Lichfield, Hereford, and Chichester.

In 1840 A.D. Parliament passed an act reducing the number of Canons at each Cathedral to four, except at Canterbury, Durham, and Ely, where there were to be six, and at Winchester, where there were to be five, and the endowments of all other Stalls were diverted to other purposes. The act also diverted the prebendal estates, leaving the Prebends in Cathedrals of the old foundation without compensation. The number of Minor Canons or Vicars was to be not more than six nor less than two. In 1874 A.D. an act was passed permitting the endowment of new Canonries by the munificence of private individuals and the appointment thereto of encumbents. The appointment of Deans is in the Crown, of the Canons, Prebends, and Honorary Canons, as a general rule, in the Bishop, and the Minor Canons in the Dean or the Chapter.

During the last fifteen years the attention of English Churchmen has been drawn to the Cathedrals, and an agitation has been going on with a view of giving them a larger place in the practical activities of the Church. A royal commission is now sitting. Its reports upon the several Cathedrals contain the statutes of their organization and government which are to be adopted by the Queen in Council, and are a vast body of interesting matter. Perhaps the most noticeable feature of the new statutes, is the several provisions looking to a more direct and active relation of the Cathedrals with the Diocese and its administration.

In all except those for St. Paul's, London, provision is made for three Chapters; one called simply the Chapter, composed of residentiaries; one called the General Chapter, composed of the non-residentiaries, whether they are called Prebendaries or Honorary Canons, the Archdeacons, and (generally, but not always) of the Proctors in Convocation; and a third called the Diocesan Chapter, composed of the members of the General Chapter and all of the Diocesan officers. This latter body, newly created in these statutes, is a revival of the Chapters of the times when the Cathedrals were the most active and efficient agencies of the Church. It is so in its organization, and more especially in its functions. It is convened by the Bishop, and its duties are to advise and assist him in the administration of his office. In some of the statutes the same duties are enjoined upon the Chapters and the General Chapters; in others they are imposed on the General Chapters alone, but these provisions do not supersede the Diocesan Chapter. Provision is made for that body in all of the statutes except in those for St. Paul's, London, where the General Chapter is charged with the duties and service elsewhere committed to the Diocesan Chapter.

The importance of the introduction of these provisions into the statutes of the Cathedrals of England cannot be over-estimated. But they are only formulated statements of opinions which have been set forth in many writings of very eminent men, and especially in communications of Cathedral Authorities to the commission, which are appended to its reports. In these writings the contention has been earnest in behalf of the essentially Diocesan character of the Cathedrals.

In the statutes for Truro, provision is made for a force of men called Missioners, whose duty is to go up and down the Diocese assisting the parochial Clergy by preaching, lecturing, holding missions and other similar services. The first Bishop of Truro, now the Archbishop of Canterbury, originated the idea of this body, and speaks of them as the successors of the Prebendaries of the earlier times in the services above mentioned.

We pass now to consider the proper functions of the Cathedral and its Clergy. The first and most obvious of them is the maintenance of the constant, elaborate, and impressive worship of ALMIGHTY GOD. Speaking on this subject, Dean Goulburn, of Norwich, says,—

"I trust that I have opened a way by these remarks for the discernment of the true character of the Cathedral Church. It is a building specially and prominently dedicated to the glory of ALMIGHTY GOD. I say specially and prominently; and it is by this specialty and prominence that I believe a Cathedral to be distinguished from other Churches. All Churches are, of course, in one aspect of them, offerings to GOD for the honor of His Name. But then this is not the leading, but the subordinate idea in a parochial Church. The primary object there is the dealing with human souls, the converting and softening of human hearts, the stirring and awakening of human consciences, the initiating the worshiper into the knowledge of GOD, and the gradual drawing of him up into communion with GOD. Nor is this end in the least degree foreign to the functions of a Cathedral; rather it is a part of its functions, only not the most prominent part, not the great characterizing idea. The Cathedral is a place rather where GOD is worshiped than where man is impressed, though it is a most blessed thing indeed where the latter end is secured along with the former. The very core of its work is the daily office in the choir, solemn, effective, dignified; rendered as perfect as possible by the accessory of beautiful music, and ever striving and yearning to represent more perfectly upon earth the adoration which ceaselessly goes on in the courts of heaven. The anthem is quite in place in such worship; nor surely should anthems ever be discontinued in Cathedrals, though unsuited (in my judgment) to the worship of parochial Churches. To discard anthems from Cathedrals would be to discard some of the grandest efforts of music to praise the Creator, Redeemer, and Sanctifier, from those very houses of prayer which are, in a more especial manner, dedicated to the celebration of the glories of His Name." This is a service which has been always faithfully discharged by the Cathedrals and does not need further remark.

The second function of the Cathedral Chapter is to aid the Bishop by advice and labors in the administration of the Episcopal office. We have already seen how the Christian community was gathered by the Bishop about himself and directed and ruled by him in all their work. By the very circumstances of the situation it was a compact body: its members were all driven from the outside into the society for help and comfort and support. Without, society was unutterably corrupt and vile; sensuality, superstition, atheism, were on every hand. Popular amusements were altogether ungodly; the gravest thought, the noblest aspirations, were of the earth, earthy. The national religion, which multiplied the divinities, deified the emperors, and denied the one only and true God, was abhorrent. Against this wickedness it was the mission of the early Christians to protest with their life-blood. Their Lord of Lords, and King of Kings, was the Eternal TRINITY worshiped through the Incarnate SON; and in proportion as the Roman state was leagued to uphold its adulterate cultus, so the Christian Commonwealth was banded around the universal Church of CHRIST. Their very depths of veneration and passionateness of devotion made these men and women recoil from the touch of the vile world, and drove them together and bound them by the most sacred ties. Their society, isolated in the midst of the multitudes, took a corporate character and had a polity of its own, and was in truth a civitas Dei.

In this sacred family the Bishop was the father, and all were his children. It was not only love they gave him for his tenderness and wisdom, but veneration also for his high office and his character, which the office sanctified. Now let us ask how this holy man must have carried himself among his brethren. He shared their intensity of devotion; he shrank with them from the sin without; he awaited the same destiny that they foresaw for themselves; and besides, ever in his ear rang the voice of JESUS, "Feed My Sheep"; "By this shall all men know that ye are My disciples, that ye love one another." He was their ruler. Did he lord it over them? Being what he was, and they what they were, all brethren together, he could not help but take them, or at least those who were competent, into his counsels, and listen patiently, respectfully, reverently, gladly, to what each had to say. There, in those first days, under the pressure of the sin without and the love within, this custom grew up, of the Bishop taking counsel of his Clergy.

When afterwards the purely Diocesan system became modified by the parochial system, the Clergy who were about the Bishop at his Cathedral succeeded to this right to share the Episcopal consultations, as they succeeded to almost all the other corporate rights of the whole clerical body. It became universal Canon Law that the Bishop must on certain subjects consult his Chapter before acting upon them.

Hence the Chapter has been called "the Senate of the Diocese," and the Canons have been called "Brothers of the Bishop." In some statutes the duty of the Chapter is declared to be, "to aid the Bishop when the See is full, to supply his place when it is vacant." One great writer on Ecclesiastical Law concludes from a mass of evidence, that everywhere "the Clergy of Cathedral Churches formed one body with the Bishop, and entered into their share of the anxiety and into some association with his sacred sway." Another speaking of the Canons says, "their principal duty was to assist the Bishop by their work and their counsels in the government of the Church." Reginald Pole says, "the rationale and ground of instituting Canonries and Prebends in Churches was, that they who are appointed to them, may assist the Bishop and aid him with counsel and work in the discharge of his office and divine things."

A third function of the Cathedral Clergy was to supplement and reinforce the parochial Clergy in their active and practical labors among the people. This includes the strictly missionary work, of which, as done by the Cathedral Clergy in the early days, enough has been already said. And of the assistance they did, and may render to the parochial Clergy, nothing need be added to the explanation of the society of Missioners formed by Archbishop Benson, at Truro, in the Diocesan Kalendar for 1881 A.D.

"Cathedral Missioners. Sanctificatio in veritate. The object of this association is to provide a staff of preachers, who, not being bound by parochial or other ties, may be entirely at the disposal of the Bishop for any work to which he may see fit to send them, at the call of the parochial Clergy. Besides undertaking and arranging for missions (technically so called), where the Bishop and parochial Clergy think desirable, they will endeavor, as far as their numbers may permit, to give courses of sermons or lectures at populous centres, to supply spiritual ministrations during the absence or sickness of incumbents, and to help in the gathering of Candidates for confirmation; in the formation of branches of the Church Society for the advancement of holy living, or other societies approved by the Bishop; in the instruction or supervision of Lay preachers; in the promotion of Mission Chapels, and in other works which aim at the spiritual and moral improvement of the people."

and education. The custom has been universal to establish grammar schools for boys in connection with the Cathedrals. In England some of these schools have attained very great reputation. So, too, readerships and lectureships on divinity were general. The duty of hospitality was enjoined upon the Clergy, and this included care of the sick and unfortunate. These duties and services have devolved upon the modern institutions and cannot consistently be neglected. They are not essential, but they are practically so related to them that they ought to find a place in every scheme for their efficient organization.

After this review we are able to answer the question, what, then, is a Cathedral? How does it differ from any other Church? The name is derived from the Latin. The seat of a Bishop in a Church was his Cathedra. In and from this seat he especially exercised his office. He had but one seat in his Diocese, which was in his Church; he had none in parish Churches. Soon what was peculiar to one Church gave it a distinctive name, and the Bishop's Church was called a Cathedral. Properly, the word is an adjective and qualifies Church. Speaking exactly we would say Cathedral Church, Cathedralis ecclesia. In common parlance the adjective is used as a noun, and dropping the word Church we say Cathedral.

The Cathedral, then, is the Church in which is the Cathedra, Sedes, See, or Seat of the Bishop. It is his Church. He is sometimes said to be the pastor, and sometimes the rector, of his Diocese. And his Cathedral has been called the parish Church, and the matrix of the Diocese. These words may be not always descriptive of the fact, but they convey one idea, that the Cathedral is the Bishop's Church and has relations of some sort to and connection in some way with the Diocese. Many suppose that it must be a large and beautiful building; that the services must be choral, and that the Clergy must be numerous. It is natural to expect all these of a Bishop's Church. But the Anglo-Saxon Bishops generally built their Churches of wood, small in size and rude in construction; and they were truly Cathedrals. The choral service has long since ceased to be peculiar to Cathedrals, and one priest serving at the altar with his Bishop may be the only clergyman. Size of building, mode of service, and number of Clergy are accidents, accessories, circumstances; they are not essential to the Cathedral. What is essential is that the Church should be the peculiar place of the Episcopal function.

But when the Bishop has planted his See in any Church, other things naturally and necessarily gather around it. Especially will be collected a number of Clergy to whom he will resort for aid and advice in carrying on his work. The Episcopal function is the primary, and a number of Clergy, larger or smaller, who assist him in the administration of the Diocese is the secondary, element of a Cathedral.

In the scheme upon which the Church in this country was organized the Cathedral had no place. Several reasons may be assigned for this departure from Catholic usage, but it is not within our purpose or our space to mention them. About thirty years ago an attempt was made to engraft the Cathedral upon the organization of the Church. Not long after he was sent out to California, Bishop Kip placed his Episcopal chair in Grace Church, of San Francisco, and called that Church his Cathedral. He did this in his right as rector of the parish, and when his incumbency ceased, the name of Cathedral was dropped. He afterwards held the rectorship of the Church of the Advent, and there again set up his Episcopal seat and gave its edifice the same name, and withdrew both when he resigned the position.

Afterwards other Bishops set up their Episcopal chair in parish Churches. Usually they have secured from the parochial organization the right to occupy the seat, to preach, to direct the ritual, and to use the building for Episcopal services. Examples of Cathedrals of this class are St. Paul's, Buffalo, and St. Paul's, Indianapolis. To the same class may also be referred other Cathedrals, such as St. Peter and St. Paul, Chicago, and Our Merciful Saviour, Fairbault. At these institutions, the title to the property, and the entire power of administering it, and directing the services and work, are in the Bishop. But beyond this, these Churches have little to distinguish them from parish Churches. They have no Chapter or function not local to the building; nor organic relations to the Diocese. This is explained by Bishop Whipple in a letter to the writer. He says the Cathedral "should be solely in the Bishop's care, that he may set forth such a ritual as may be a model for the Diocese. It needs only such machinery as may help him."

A second class of Cathedrals have Chapters but no Diocesan relations. The Episcopate, as in the class first mentioned, is the primary, active, and central function, but not the sole and unqualified authority. The Bishop holds his office apart, sharing it with none, and aided in its exercise by none, but within the precincts of the Cathedral he has the aid of his Presbytery. All-Saints', Albany, and Davenport, Iowa, are examples of this class. In the institution at Albany there is a Chapter composed of the Bishop, Dean, Precentor, Chancellor, Treasurer, four Minor Canons, and six laymen. None of them except the Bishop has any Diocesan relations, duties, or rights other than those possessed by any clergyman or layman. The body has no care of the Missions of the Diocese, and whatever it attempts in that service is in subordination to the Diocesan Board of Missions. The funds and property of the Diocese are not in its hands, but in those of special Committees of the Diocesan Council. The Schools and Hospitals are independent of it; there is no duty on the part of the Bishop to ask the Chapter for advice in the administration of his office, nor on its part any duty to give him advice when asked for it. It is a body as local in its character and service as any parish Church. There is what is called a Greater Chapter, composed of the Archdeacons, the members of the Standing Committee, of the Board of Missions, and of the deputations to General Conventions, the officers of the Diocesan Council, and the rectors of the two oldest churches in the city. In its personnel it is Diocesan; but the only function of this body is to elect the members of the Chapter proper and to attend the Bishop upon certain special occasions. It has no direct and active relations with the Diocese.

The same is true of the scheme of the Cathedral at Davenport. Bishop Perry, retaining in his own hands the title to the property in order to preserve it as a Bishop's Church, has erected a Chapter, with a Dean, who is the head of the educational institutions, a Senior Canon, who has the pastoral care of the congregation, other Canons whose special duties are in the parish Churches of the city and in the schools, and Curators of the Cathedral, who are laymen charged with the temporalities. Its work is, first, to maintain the worship in the Cathedral in rich, abundant, and appropriate services; secondly, to conduct the work of the parish Churches and missions in the See city; thirdly, to carry on the schools there; fourthly, to extend missionary efforts into the Diocese as fully and as far as possible. But the Diocesan administration is here, as at Albany, distributed among the Board of Missions, the Trustees of the funds of the Diocese, and the Trustees of the Episcopate funds. It is not proposed to bring the powers and duties of these bodies within the jurisdiction of the Chapter.

Cathedrals of the third class are equally, with those last described, local as to the services or public worship and of charities; but they also have direct practical and constant relation with the Diocese. The Omaha Cathedral is an example. Its Chapter consists of the Bishop, Dean, three Canons, five honorary Canons, the Standing Committee, and all the other officers of the Diocese. It is charged with the care of the missions, funds, property, schools, and hospitals of the Diocese. It meets quarterly and deals with every subject of administration. In several Missionary Jurisdictions and also in several of the younger Dioceses it has been adopted. It comes much nearer to a restoration of the polity of the early Church than either of the two classes of institutions above described.

We have to-day in the American Church Cathedrals organized on three plans. The first are those based on the Episcopal office alone. The second are those based on the See principle, and have Chapters but no Diocesan relations. The third have the Episcopate as the primary element, with Chapters for the assistance of the Bishop in the administration of the Diocese.

In order to an intelligent view of the conditions in which the Cathedral in this country must be developed into a vigorous, efficient, and practicable agency in the American Church, something more than these descriptions are necessary. We have seen that the essential object of the Chapter is to provide from the Presbytery a competent body to assist the Bishop in the exercise of his office: which assistance is first by advice, and, secondly, by labors not parochial.

As the Cathedral was not recognized by those who framed the Constitution of the American Church, so nobody was provided for the assistance of the Bishop by advice. The need of such body was not felt at first. We need not concern ourselves with the reasons. But after a time it began generally to be felt that some authority ought to be provided to which the Bishop might resort, and which should also to a degree control the Episcopal function. Accordingly, in 1835 A.D. the General Convention by Canon provided that "in every Diocese where there is a Bishop the Standing Committee shall be a Council of Advice to the Bishop. They shall be summoned on the requisition of the Bishop whenever he shall wish for their advice, and they may meet of their own accord agreeably to their own rules when they may be disposed to advise the Bishop."

This was the restoration of the Chapter under another name. And if the functions of the Bishop extended to all the matters properly belonging to the Chapter, there would be little need of reviving it. But such is not the case. The duties of the Standing Committee are of the very highest and most solemn nature; but they are very limited. For instance, the Committee does not have the care of the missions of the Diocese. That is an interest the most active, urgent, and pressing of all. It is intrusted to the care of another separate, disconnected, and independent body called variously the Board of Missions, the Committee on Missions, or the Missionary Society. When a question touching missions has been determined by the body charged with their care, it would be not only unseemly, but mischievous in every way, for the Bishop to go to the Standing Committee for advice on the subject. It would be raising the Committee to an appellate jurisdiction, and subordinating it to all other bodies. Confusion and irritation would follow which would be intolerable. And what is true of missions and the Board charged with them, is true of all other interests of the Diocese, which are parceled out among different similar bodies. It thus appears that most of the administration of the Diocese being given into the hands of other bodies than the Standing Committees, it is impractical-ble for it to be a Council of Advice to the Bishop on only a modicum of the subjects in the discussion, consideration, and determination of which he needs assistance. It is very clear, therefore, that the Standing Committee of a Diocese does not answer all the needs which the Bishop may have for assistance in the way of advice. As his Council, as the Senate of the Diocese, it does not fill the place of the Chapter.

We pass on to consider the assistance which the Chapter may give the Bishop by clerical labors not within the province of the parochial Priest. A body of Clergy resident at the Cathedral, under the personal and active direction of the Bishop, going out to the missionary stations, serving them and returning to him for report and new orders, works in the same way as the forces by which the world was first conquered to the sway of the Church. It is a mode not only sanctified by primitive and Catholic usage, but in its nature fitted to the condition of modern missionary labor. Let this be explained by a view of the work done in this way. Suppose there were at the Cathedral a hall, and twice, or four times, or a dozen times a year, as should be appointed him, the Missionary should come up for a brief residence in it. Here he would meet and know and learn to love those who, like him, were devoted by vow and habit and zeal to the service of their common LORD; here he would find companionship and sympathy and affection and a freshened life and an animated spirit, such as come only from the warmth and fervor of association; here he would find the guidance and direction and counsel of his Bishop, and the elder and wiser of the Clergy; here he would see the need of reading to keep pace with the progress of others by whose conversation he would be stimulated to exertion; here, above all, he would have the altar at which to kneel in the highest act of worship and the splendid services of the temple. And so he would be strengthened against the trials of his lot among the people to whom he is sent, and against those other trials of the spirit. His stay need not be long; even a few days might suffice to return him to his work a new man.

But the Missionary is not the only person who would be blessed by this relief. Coming up at stated times, he would, either by express rule or in the natural course, report to the Bishop of his work, his field, and his life. The peculiar needs of the stations he serves, and his aptness to answer them, would become known; and he would be instructed by wise counsels and encouraged to go on, or be reinforced by others or withdrawn to some other place for which he would seem better fitted, as the case required. Missionaries thus organized and working from the Cathedral would in a very few years become a homogeneous body, having common interests, modes, sentiments, and aspirations. There would soon grow up among them an esprit de corps, without which no society was ever efficient.

The uses to which the Cathedral Clergy may be put in sections where the Church is well planted and rooted is admirably explained by Bishop Sweatman, of Toronto, in Canada, in his address to his Synod in 1881 A.D. Hesays, "Supposing that I had resident in Toronto, say four Canons, men of thorough practical parochial experience, of true missionary spirit, of a high order of pulpit power, of intense sympathy, and, above all, full of earnest spiritual life,—for they would need to be all this,—the value of such a body of men would be incalculable, as counselors and advisers. But—here is the point I wish to bring out—a mission in the Diocese is, for some cause, evidently in an unprosperous condition; the clergyman complains that he cannot obtain support from the people; or the Church is losing ground, and so forth. I direct one of my Canons to go to this place, to inquire into what is wrong, to stay a week, two weeks, or three weeks, to rouse up the people, and put new life into the Church's work. A young and inexperienced clergyman meets with difficulties he does not know how to deal with; he needs advice and guidance; another of the Chapter is sent to help him, to put him in the way of doing his work better; with the loving words and mature wisdom of an elder brother to give him confidence and cheer. Or a clergyman writes me for help in an emergency; his parish is invaded by a new sect, preaching strange doctrines and drawing his people away from the faith; he had spent himself in labors to counteract the mischief, but finds that it is an unequal task to cope with single-handed, or his arguments are exhausted, and he wants another mind to reinforce him with fresh arguments. Here is help for the emergency,—a well-learned, and well-equipped, and zealous member of the Cathedral Staff ready to go to the rescue. Have I justified my assertion? I feel sure that every earnest and faithful parish clergyman will confess that such a system, by which the clergy might occasionally be stirred up to more diligence, cheered in their isolation, aided in their difficulties, by a visit from a brother such as I have described, would go a long way to break down the congregationalism, to awaken the spiritual torpor of the people, to arouse to activity the missionary indifference, to systematize the inefficient diffusion of forces,—the chief difficulties and evils under which we suffer. To carry out this system fully will require means and time; but a small beginning may be made. I shall not touch this question of means; but I cannot forbear a concluding remark, that it is tantalizing to be taunted with aping titles and dignities, and at the same time to feel that no colonial Diocese ever had so nearly within its grasp the power to erect and maintain a real living Cathedral Establishment, with its active Chapter and Staff of officers, as the Diocese of Toronto with its richly endowed Church in the capital."

It needs no words to show the advantages of bringing the schools and charities of the Diocese together at the Cathedral, and conducting them by its Clergy under the eye of the Bishop.

It is a vision which may not be vouchsafed to us of this generation, but not beyond our reasonable hope: a Cathedral once more the Bishop's Church, in which the Episcopate shall be the primary function, but surrounded by a band of Clergy for its assistance, a body of well-learned, experienced, devout men, maintaining in its due dignity and beauty the worship of God; sharing the sacred sway and labors of the chief pastor in his administration in spreading the knowledge of the truth in new parts, and holding up the hands of those who are set among the people teaching and vindicating the great truths of the Gospel to those who are ignorant or perverse, training the children in the knowledge they need in this world, and the knowledge that fits them for another world, and serving the poor, sick, and unfortunate in Homes, Asylums, Hospitals, and Retreats of whatever sort.

The numbers vary according to the needs of each place, its organization as may be found convenient, the apportionment of work among them as their fitness and other conditions may require; but the whole forming a community co-operative, compact, efficient, with one heart and one mind, serving the great Bishop and Shepherd of souls with a holy fervency.

Catholic. The word Catholic, as its etymology shows, was of Greek origin. It is compounded of two words (Kata and olos, Kat' olon), and means literally "on the whole," or, as applied to the Church, "Universal." St. Cyril, Patriarch of Jerusalem, before the middle of the fourth century, and Alexander, Patriarch of Alexandria earlier in the same century, both used it. It probably came rapidly into use throughout the Church after the second General Council, held in Constantinople 381 A.D., which gives the whole article, as follows: "In One Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church."

Catholic was used commonly as one of the names of the Church from the time of the first General Council, held at Nice in Bithynia 325 A.D., though it does not appear in the original Creed of Nice. It designated those who adhered to the ancient faith as defined at Nice. They called themselves Catholics, but named the Heretics after their most prominent leaders,—e.g., Cerinthians, Marcionites, Montanists, Arians, Nestorians, Eutychians, etc.

Catholic was not long coming into all forms of the Creed, and became a significant and distinguishing title of the Church in common use both among Greeks and Latins. It was and still is accepted as one of the four notes of the Church. "The Body of CHRIST," from its very nature and constitution, was, is, and ever must continue, One, Holy, Catholic, and Apostolic; One, as being the organic body in mystical but real union with "Him, who is Head over all things to the Church;" Holy, as the depositum of the truth and dispenser of the sacraments, by which holiness is begun, nurtured, and increased: Catholic, as sent into all the world to preach the Gospel, to baptize and feed with the "Bread of Heaven" every one, and all who would be saved: and, finally, Apostolic, as built upon the foundations of the Apostles and Prophets, JESUS CHRIST Himself being the chief cornerstone."

The word has been sadly misused in the course of history, and most signally by the assumptions of the Roman Church. In very early times the Bishop of Rome was accounted one of the five Patriarchs of the Catholic Church, each one officially equal to the other. These patriarchates differed in numbers and influence; those of Rome and Constantinople being the greatest. Indeed, so long as Christian emperors ruled the Roman Empire, from the throne in Byzantium, the See of Constantinople was the chief in power, though on account of the dignity of old Rome a kind of respectful priority was allotted to the Roman Bishop. Still the assumption of the exclusive right to the name Catholic was never made by Rome in early times, and is not yet even incidentally confessed, much less allowed, in the East. Incidentally it has come into common use in the West, so that sectarians and the world call the Roman Church Catholic; but no careful and well-taught English or American Churchman ever gives her that ancient, significant, and almost sacred title.

Although the Continental Reformers did not take the term Catholic to themselves, yet the Church of England and her daughter, the American Church, have adhered to it most tenaciously. It sets forth their claim to oneness with the primitive Church. It is the sign, warrant, and assurance that their ministry is derived in unbroken descent from the Apostles; that the faith they promulgate and bear witness to is the one faith which has been from the beginning; that the sacraments they administer are CHRIST's own; wherewith He is ever present to bestow specifically the grace He attached to each; and that the HOLY SPIRIT continually indwells Her, making Her witness acceptable and Her ministrations effectual.

The term Catholic is so set forth among the gems of truth in the Creed that it demands solemn use. They who make it a designation of party, either do not recognize or feel its devotional significance, or do not perceive the fullness of its meaning. It may be contended for earnestly when denied us, as even the very name of our LORD may be; but its ordinary use is a devotional one. When spoken it should bring up in grateful souls the rich and dear consciousness that

"Living saints and dead
But one communion make,
All join in CHRIST, their living Head,
And of His life partake."

The ancient, though not primitive, application of the name Catholic to the Church and its universal use for more than fifteen hundred years, have induced the desire, which has been often warmly expressed on the floor of General Convention, to change the title of the American Church from the present "Protestant Episcopal" to "The Catholic Church in America." It is argued that we do not weakly protest against Rome, but that we firmly and resolutely reject her uncatholic assumptions. It is said that Episcopal, as a distinctive appellation, may be interpreted as a negative confession that the Episcopacy is not essential to the legitimate propagation of the Church. However the controversies about the name may fare, it is at least a fact that the American Church is, as the Creed she recites sets forth, a true and unsevered outgrowth from the stem of the One, Holy, Catholic, and Apostolic Church; and that she has the right, whether she exercise it or not, to call herself by the old name.

Her children are not disposed to lose the title to their own legitimacy. The growing knowledge and serious appreciation of the fact that they are born through and nurtured by the Bride of CHRIST is causing a wide and deep perception of the value of their Catholic heritage. They are more and more accounting the Church as in truth Catholic, and thereby perceiving more intelligently and feeling more profoundly their common union with all the early and late Christians, in life or death, who are in the immortal Catholic Church, of which CHRIST was, is, and ever will continue the Living Head.

Catholic Epistles. The Epistles of St. James, the two of St. Peter, the three of St. John, and the Epistle of St. Jude are so called. There is no very satisfactory reason for the title, which yet is felt to be most appropriate. Perhaps the title as it is translated in our Authorized Version gains its true explanation, The General Epistles, as encyclical and not to local Churches; and since it may be objected that this cannot apply to the second and third of St. John, it may be naturally not refused to these short epistles, since it is proper to the longer first epistle.

Celibacy. The virgin state; but the word is now used generally to denote the vow of never marrying exacted from members of the Roman Church, who enter either some monastic order, or take ecclesiastical office. It has no real defense, and is productive of much evil. It is true, however, that under some circumstances even St. Paul commended the unmarried state, but this has no true relation to the question. The New Testament says nothing that bears upon this except that several of the Apostles were married, and in the direction to Timothy (1 Tim. iii. 12), that the Bishop should be the husband of one wife. But there arose at an early date a strong feeling that the clergy should remain unmarried. Voluntary vows of virginity were common and increased as the Church grew, till the women were numerous enough to be put into a general organization under Episcopal rule. The tendency was strong to urge the clergy to remain unmarried. This increased so that the clergy were usually unmarried; but there was no imperative rule beyond continuous efforts by the Bishops, both East and West, to carry out this purpose, till the Civil Law forbade the priest to marry after ordination. It is needless here to recount the conditions permitted or the disabilities incurred. The Eastern Church was contented with this restriction; but the Latin Church went further, and after a long and severe struggle broke up the marriage of those in orders. It was disastrous in many ways, and the only gain was the dependence of the clergy upon the Church alone by the severance of all family ties. The Reformation was the only shock the system has received. The Church of England at once threw off the yoke, and permitted marriage to her clergy.

The person in the Roman Church who takes a monastic vow is bound by this promise, and so too every Deacon, Priest, and Bishop. It is probable that many clergy, living in apparent concubinage, were secretly bound by a marriage vow; at least, there is proof that many on their death-bed, by acknowledging the woman, attempted to establish a marriage and to salve their conscience.

Cemetery. A sleeping-place. This name was used by Christians to denote the place of burial. It was a new and beautiful use of a word that Christianity introduced. ("Death is not death among Christians, but is called a sleeping and a resting.") It was in use before the year 222 A.D. The early Church was very careful, if possible, to separate its dead from those of the heathen, and so acquired burial-grounds at the earliest opportunity. In Rome the burials were made in the underground galleries of the catacombs. The cemeteries were seized in times of persecution, but were very generally promptly restored. The word has long since lost its old sense, and now means simply a burial-place.

Censer. A light vessel, swung by chains, and in which incense is burnt. In mediæval and later times in the English Church, at the time of the celebration of the Holy Communion it is always used.

It was one of the vessels used in Jewish worship. It contained the live coals upon which incense was put to incense the altar and the sacrifice, morning and evening. The censer was specially used when the High-Priest, on the great day of Atonement, went into the Holy of Holies. Its use in the Christian Church, while indicated, is not defined at an early age. The earliest censers (thurible) mentioned weighed thirty and fifteen pounds respectively, and so could not have been swung. They were said to be gifts of Constantine to the Church of Rome.

Censures, Ecclesiastical. The penalties by which, for some notable sin, Christian laymen are deprived of communion, or clergymen are prohibited to execute their sacred office. These censures are excommunication, suspension, and interdict, and (lesser in rank) irregularity. All sentences incurred by any disobedience or sin are censures of the Church. They involve the withholding of those gifts for the spiritual life which she has to give; and if the sentence be justly incurred, the loss to the guilty party of all that they would convey. The Church may cut off from communion, or inflict lesser punishment, but she cannot expel from it and deprive the sinner of the entrance into the visible Church which the sacrament of baptism has given. She can discipline, and that, too, severely, but she cannot finally disinherit: that is the sole privilege of CHRIST alone at the day of judgment.

Central New York, Diocese of. In 1865 A.D., Bishop Coxe called the attention of his Convention to the need of greater provision for Episcopal work in the limits of his See. During 1866 A.D., the subject was further discussed, and in 1867 A.D. it was reported to the Convention by a committee appointed for that purpose that steps be taken to have the General Convention permit the erection of the counties of Broome, Cayuga, Chemung, Chenango, Cortland, Jefferson, Lewis, Madison, Oneida, Onondaga, Oswego, Seneca, Tioga, and Tompkins into a new See. A further resolution was offered looking to a Federate Council of the Dioceses in the State. The General Convention of 1868 A.D. concurred, and a primary Convention was called at Utica on November 10, 1868 A.D. Fifty clergy and eighty-seven lay deputies met in Trinity Church, Utica, to effect the organization. Rev. Dr. F. Rogers was chosen President, and Rev. A. B. Goodrich, Secretary. A minute upon the separation and cordially recognizing the pastoral care of Bishop Coxe in the past and tendering him their thanks was passed. On November 11 the election of Bishop was made the order of the day. After five ballots Rev. Dr. A. H. Littlejohn was duly elected. Dr. Littlejohn declined the election, and a special Convention was summoned on January 13, 1869 A.D. Bishop Coxe presided over fifty-seven clergy and one hundred and forty-seven lay deputies; Rev. Dr. Littlejohn preached the opening sermon. At the third ballot the Rev. Dr. F. D. Huntingdon was elected. He was consecrated in the parish church which he was leaving, Emmanuel, Boston, by Rt. Rev. Bishop Smith, on April 8, 1869 A.D. Bishops Eastburn, Potter, Clark, Coxe, Neely, and Doane joined in the act of consecration.

The Constitution which had been proposed and acted on in the previous special Convention was adopted June 14 at a special Convention in Grace Church, Utica, which Convention immediately adjourned and organized as the second Annual Convention. The reports at that Convention were chiefly upon the needs of the Diocese in the work of education, a work which has been pushed forward in that See with great energy. An excellent report was made upon Education in the Family, the Means of Church Education, the Practicability of Parochial Schools, and a statement of the resources of the Diocese in this important work. The following pregnant resolutions were adopted:

"Resolved, That the chief seminary of Christian education is the Christian family, and that all parents connected with the Church should endeavor to realize the privileges and obligations of the baptismal covenant, both as respects themselves and their children; should aim to fulfill its pledges by the faithful inculcation of those things which a Christian child ought to know and believe for its soul's health: by a watchful supervision over their children's studies, reading, and associations; and by such care, in reference to their places of resort for secular teaching, as may be necessary to guard them not only against contamination of morals, but also the undermining of their faith in the doctrines and practices of the Church.

"Resolved, That we recommend the establishment, whenever practicable, of parochial, infant, and grammar schools, at least for children from seven to twelve years of age.

"Resolved, That the clergy be requested to take cognizance and to include in their parochial reports the mention of such private schools in their parishes as may be conducted or controlled by communicants of the Church, provided the proprietors of such schools shall give their consent to the publication of such statement.

"Resolved, That as the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom, and all true morality is founded upon religion, in the judgment of this Convention any system of secular education that is not supplemented in some manner by an inculcation of the fundamental doctrines and precepts of Christianity, must in the end fail to secure the real welfare of society and the permanent prosperity of the State."

Principles as outspoken and as strongly stated as these show how thoroughly awake the Diocese of Central New York is to the current evils in the popular education, and how miserably the present system fails in meeting all the needs of a Christian commonwealth, and of giving what the Church is bound to try to give her children, the lambs of the flock of CHRIST. It is in this line that the Bishop has recently written upon the defects and dangers of the system of education the State attempts to provide. It is under such leadership that the educational efforts in the Diocese have increased and deepened.

In 1869 there were 98 parishes and missions; in 1883 there were 138; in 1869 there were a total of 83 clergy at work; in 1883 there were 96 clergy; in 1869 there were 8774 communicants; in 1883 there were 12,848; in 1869 there were 1074 confirmed; in 1883 there were 1880; in 1869 there was a total of $249,116.20 contributed; in 1883 there was a total of $292,564.75 offered for God's work.

Summary of Statistics (from Living Church Annual).—Clergy, 96; parishes and missions, 138; families, 7699; individuals, 33,362; baptisms, infants, 901, adults, 864, total, 1265; confirmed, 1880; communicants, 12,848; marriages, 432; burials, 873; parish schools, teachers, 2, scholars, 42; Sunday-schools, teachers, 1063, scholars, 8308; contributions, $292,564.75.

Central Pennsylvania, History of the Diocese of, 1871-1883 A.D. In 1866 A.D., at the next Convention after the formation of the Diocese of Pittsburg within the original limits of the Diocese of Pennsylvania, the subject of another division of the latter Diocese was brought up by a resolution and referred to a committee of seven, to report thereon at the next annual Convention. The report of the committee, when presented in 1867 A.D., showed that out of 75 parishes in the district proposed to be set off, only 29 wished division, and out of 58 clergymen, only 26 approved the measure.

At that Convention it was resolved, the Bishop of Pennsylvania concurring, that consent be given to the proposed division of the Diocese, on condition that two-thirds of the clergy and of the parishes now entitled to representation therein, and being in that portion of the Diocese proposed to be set off, do give official information to the Standing Committee of their desire for such division, and that they have provided sufficient means for the support of their Bishop, the proposed division being all that portion of the present Diocese of Pennsylvania which lies outside of the counties of Philadelphia, Chester, Delaware, Montgomery, and Bucks.

By the same Convention, all the documents touching the division of the Diocese were referred to the Committee on Division, appointed at the last Convention, and the said committee continued. It was also resolved that the committee confer with the Bishop of the Diocese of Pennsylvania and embody the result of their conference in a report to the Convention. This the committee did in 1868 A.D., and the consent of the Convention was given to a division on what is called the fourteen-county line upon certain conditions and restrictions. The conditions were not complied with, and the plan failed.

The Bishop of Pennsylvania, in the Convention of 1870 A.D., again called attention to the subject, and asked for a division of the Diocese, declaring that he should not withhold his consent from any line which the Convention, after full discussion, should in its wisdom fix upon, provided that it should leave in the Diocese of Pennsylvania not less than the five counties aforesaid.

In accordance with this portion of the Bishop's address the Convention of 1870 A.D. gave consent to the formation of a new Diocese to be thus composed; and also instructed their deputies to the next General Convention to present their resolution, duly authenticated, to that body, and request its consent to, and ratification of, the same. In June, 1871 A.D., the Bishop of the Diocese of Pennsylvania appointed the following gentlemen a Committee of Clergymen and Laymen to take charge of the preparation of the necessary documents concerning the division of the Diocese, and to lay the same before General Convention, viz.: The Rev. Messrs. A. A. Marple (chairman), Wm. P. Lewis, D.D., Leighton Coleman, R. J. Keeling, D.D., and Wm. P. Orrick; the Hon. Messrs. Frederick Watts, T. E. Franklin, Judge Elwell, Messrs. A. Ricketts and Henry Coppée, LL.D. (secretary).

In General Convention, held at Baltimore during the month of October, 1871 A.D., the House of Bishops and the House of Clerical and Lay Deputies duly concurred in giving consent to and ratifying the formation of the new Diocese from date of the 6th of October, 1871 A.D., admitting it into union with the General Convention from and after the 8th day of November, 1871 A.D., and directing that the name of the new Diocese be determined by the Primary Convention thereof, with the consent of the Bishop of Pennsylvania.

Canonical action being thus complete, the Bishop of Pennsylvania issued a call for the assembling of the Primary Convention of the new Diocese at St. Stephen's Church, Harrisburg, on Wednesday, the 8th of November, for organization, and appointed Robert A. Lamberton, Esq., of Harrisburg, to act as temporary Secretary.

In the Primary Convention 59 of the clergy were entitled to seats, of whom 57 were present, and 193 of the laity, of whom 134 were present, representing 75 parishes, situated in 26 counties. The Rt. Rev. Wm. Bacon Stevens, D.D., LL.D., Bishop of Pennsylvania, was President. There were present also the following-named visitors from the Church of England: the Rt. Rev. Dr. Selwyn, Lord Bishop of Lichfield (the Apostle of New Zealand), with his son, the Rev. John R. Selwyn, and the Very Rev. Dr. Howson, Dean of Chester, and the Rev. J. H. Iles, Rector of Wolverhampton. The Bishop of Lichfield delivered the sermon, and divine service being concluded, the clergy and lay delegates present and claiming seats in the Convention were called to order by Bishop Stevens, who introduced the English Churchmen, the Convention rising to receive them. On proceeding to name the new Diocese, the following designations were put forward by various members, viz., Central Pennsylvania, Harrisburg, Williamsport, Bethlehem, Eastern Pennsylvania, Lichfield, and Middle Diocese of Pennsylvania. On the fourth ballot the first name was chosen by a concurrence of both orders, and received the consent of the Bishop of Pennsylvania. On the evening of the first day the Lord Bishop of Lichfield and Dean Howson addressed the Convention on "The Work of Women in the Church."

The Committee on the Endowment of the Episcopate of the Diocese made report that they had obtained $41,000 in cash and pledges; that they considered it expedient to raise the sum to the amount of $75,000. The Convention resolved that until the income from the Endowment Fund should fully meet the Bishop's salary (which was fixed at $4500), an equitable assessment should be made upon the parishes for the whole amount of the same, each parish being credited upon the said assessment with the interest accruing on its subscription to the Endowment Fund; and the committee was requested to solicit additional subscriptions to that Fund.

Nominations for a Bishop being in order, the Rev. Dr. Keeling nominated the Rev. Mark Antony DeWolfe Howe, D.D., rector of St. Luke's Church, Philadelphia; the Rev. Dr. Paret nominated the Rev. George Leeds, rector of Grace Church, Baltimore. The vote of the clergy having been taken, on the first ballot the Rev. Dr. Howe was declared duly nominated by the clergy to the laity; and on the first vote of the laity, a majority having voted for approval, the Chair declared that the Rev.

Mark Antony DeWolfe Howe, D.D., was the choice of the Convention for Bishop of Central Pennsylvania. Whereupon the Rev. Dr. Paret moved and it was "Resolved, That the members of this Convention, clerical and lay, do unanimously accept the election of the Rev. M. A. DeWolfe Howe, D.D., to be the first Bishop of this Diocese; and do, without exception or reserve, earnestly entreat his acceptance of the same, pledging him in his work for CHRIST and the Church their zealous and loving co-operation."

The Convention also elected the following Standing Committee of the Diocese: Clerical members—the Rev. Messrs A. A. Marple, D. Washburn, William P. Orrick, William C. Leverett, and R. J. Keeling, D.D. Lay members—the Hon. Messrs. J. W. Maynard, V. L. Maxwell, E. O. Parry, Asa Packer, and Mr. R. A. Lamberton.

The Constitution and Canons of the Diocese of Pennsylvania were adopted by this Diocese with such few alterations as were necessary or expedient.

The Standing Committee having been instructed by the Primary Convention to take the necessary steps for the consecration of the Rev. Dr. Howe, appointed the Rev. Dr. Keeling to make the proper communications to the Standing Committees of all the Dioceses in the United States, and to the presiding Bishop. When the canonical consents had been received, the presiding Bishop, the Rt. Rev. Benjamin Bosworth Smith, D.D. (a maternal uncle of the Bishop-elect), appointed his consecration to take place on the Feast of the Innocents, in St. Luke's Church, Philadelphia. Of the House of Bishops there were present and taking part in the consecration on that day the presiding Bishop and Bishop of Kentucky, the Rt. Rev. Drs. Lee, of Delaware, McIlvaine, of Ohio, Bedell, assistant Bishop of Ohio, Potter, of New York, Kerfoot, of Pittsburg, Clark, of Rhode Island, and Morris, Missionary Bishop of Oregon and Washington Territory. The attendant Presbyters of the Bishop-elect were the Rev. Mr. Washburn and the Rev. Dr. Paret. The sermon was delivered by the Assistant and Bishop of Ohio, and the presentment made by the Bishops of Rhode Island and of Pittsburg. The Rev. Mr. Marple read the testimonial of the Convention of Central Pennsylvania, the Rev. Mr. Leverett, the certificate of the consent of the majority of the Standing Committees, and the Rev. Benjamin I. Haight, D.D., that of the majority of the Bishops.

During the twelve years of its existence the Diocese has increased in the number of its clergy from 59 to 96. Twenty-eight new church buildings have been consecrated, some of which stand noted among the rural Dioceses of the United States for their costliness and remarkable beauty. In the same period 13,945 baptisms have been administered by the parochial and mission clergy, and Bishop Howe has confirmed 8217 persons within his own jurisdiction. The whole number of parishes and mission stations is 114, containing 7486 communicants, and 12,063 Bible-class attendants and Sunday-school pupils. Forty-eight of the parishes possess rectory-houses, 12 have also school-houses, and 10 own cemeteries. In the same twelve years the total sum of offerings made in the young Diocese for all Church objects is $2,531,790.10. So vastly has the work of this jurisdiction increased that in consideration thereof, joined with the advanced age of the Bishop, who has declared his inability to fulfill all the duties of his office without the help of a coadjutor, the last Annual Convention, 1883 A.D., appointed a committee to report at the next Convention on the subject of the election of an Assistant Bishop.

Central Pennsylvania is divided into four Convocations, named respectively the Reading, the Harrisburg, the Williamsport, and the Northeastern; the Presidents of which constitute the Clerical members of the Board of Diocesan Missions. The Secretary of Convention is Mr. R. A. Lamberton, LL.D.; the Treasurer of the Convention and Episcopal Funds is Mr. P. R. Stetson; of the Board of Missions, Mr. Robt. H. Sayre; the Registrar of the Diocese is Mr. Wm. H. Chandler, Ph.D.; and the Chancellor, Hon. Thomas E. Franklin.

The Diocese has seven Church institutions, viz.: the Lehigh University, at South Bethlehem, founded and endowed by the Hon. Asa Packer, of Mauch Chunk, in 1866 A.D., of which Robt. A. Lamberton, LL.D., is President, with a faculty of thirteen members. The library building, which is one of the finest and most substantial in the country, was built by Judge Packer in memory of a deceased daughter, Mrs. Lucy E. Lindeman, and is called the "Lucy Packer Library." It contains at present 35,000 volumes, and is endowed with $500,000. Judge Packer also endowed the university with $1,500,000. St. Luke's Hospital, at South Bethlehem, incorporated in 1872 A.D., received from the same great benefactor of the Diocese an endowment of $300,000. The Bishopthorpe School for Girls, also situated at South Bethlehem, was founded in 1867 A.D. Selwyn Hall, at Reading, is the Diocesan school for boys. Cottage Hill Seminary, York, is a home school for young ladies and children. The Yeates Institute is a Church school for boys, at Lancaster. The Church Home and Orphanage, the latest established institution, is at Jonestown, Lebanon Co.

The Bishop resides at Reading, where he has a Cathedral church, the front elevation of which is regarded as being one of striking beauty. The tower contains a fine chime of bells; and the chancel—choir and sanctuary—is capacious enough to seat nearly the whole of the Diocesan staff, the Bishop and his clergy.

REV. W. B. MORROW.

Ceremony. The primary meaning is that of a corporeal act giving expression to a spiritual act. For instance, in marriage, the whole office is a series of ceremonies, but is itself a rite. In Confirmation the imposition of hands is the ceremony, but the whole conduct or action of the office is a rite. So of the other offices and sacramental acts of the Church. But this distinction cannot be always accurately followed from the lax usage of the proper terms; and the ritual is often called the ceremonial of worship. These rites, or ceremonies, are properly completely under the control of the Church, and while we may not alter aught that CHRIST has instituted by word and example, yet the Church, as a living power, and ministering to the spiritual needs of all men, must have power to alter, amend, or control rites and ceremonies suitable to the tendency of the peoples she ministers to. The ceremonial of one part of the Holy Catholic Church may be an example for, but is not an authority to, another independent part, ministering to a population with totally different habits.

The charge so often made, that the Church seized upon and used pagan festivals, while much exaggerated as to the facts, is rather a mark of her wisdom and adaptability, that she is to save men, not to cast them through some single mould. This rule holds under all circumstances. Therefore, however much individual tastes may regret the departures made in our Prayer-Book from the exact English order, the changes themselves were made upon this first and proper principle, and the fathers of the first General Convention, which adopted our present book, are to be commended for their wisdom and moderation, and were surely under the guidance of the HOLY SPIRIT.

Chaldee. The language spoken by the peoples inhabiting the alluvial plains of the Euphrates and Tigris. It was a cognate language, or more nearly a dialect of that family of the Shemitic language to which the Aramaic and the Hebrew belonged. It could not be readily understood by the Hebrews (2 Kings xviii. 26, 28). They came in direct and continuous contact with it during the Captivity. Parts of Jeremiah (ch. x. 11), of Daniel (ch. ii. 4; vii. 28), and Ezra (ch. iv. 7; vi. 18; vii. 12-26) are pure Chaldee, but many words and phrases are to be found in the later portions of Holy Scripture which are closely connected with the Chaldee.

Chalice. The Cup used in the administration of the wine in the Lord's Supper. The word is from the Latin calyx. It was made of any material accessible. At first, of glass, of wood, of silver, or of gold; but soon wood was forbidden (though still used in places till a late date), and glass, pewter, gold, silver, bronze were used. These chalices were often of very beautiful workmanship, finely polished and chased, and in many cases incrustured with precious stones.

Chancel. The space in a church which contains the choir and sanctuary, and which was generally separated from the nave by a rail or grating (cancelli), from which it derives its name. It is a characteristic difference between the Eastern and Western Churches that in the former the distinction between the bema, or sanctuary, and the choir is so much more strongly marked than that between the choir and the nave, in the latter the distinction between the nave and the choir is much more strongly marked than that between the choir and the sanctuary. (Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, Smith & Cheetham, sub voc.) Legally, the chancel is the parson's freehold, and he is obliged to keep it in repair by English Ecclesiastical Law.

Chancellor. In England he is the law officer to the Bishop, advising him in all legal matters and holding courts for him. He may be either a layman or a clergyman (Blackstone, i. 382). It was not of very ancient introduction into the English Church, being rather an imitation of the like title by the state. It includes two other offices,—Official Principal and Vicar-General. "The Official hears causes between party and party concerning wills, legacies, marriages, and the like . . . The proper work of the Vicar-General is the exercise and administration of jurisdiction, purely spiritual, by the authority and under the direction of the Bishop, as visitation, correction of manners, granting institutions, and the like, with a general inspection of men and things, in order to the preserving of discipline and good government in the Church." (Burns, Ecclesiastical Law, vol. i. 289.)

In fifteen of our Dioceses there is a law officer bearing this official title of Chancellor, who is appointed or elected to advise the Bishop and the Standing Committee upon all legal matters which affect the interests of the Church as his professional counsel may be asked or required. But his duties are by broad construction often so extended as to make him also law adviser to the Diocesan Conventions.

Chant. Vide MUSIC.

Chantry. In the English Pre-reformation Church, the endowment or founding of a small chapel or separated place in the church, for saying Masses for the soul of some person departed this life. Wolsey was in the beginning of his career a chantry priest. When such foundations were given by act of Parliament to the king, in the last year of Henry VIII. (1545 A.D.), at his death Crammer tried to obtain from Edward VI. the remnant that had not been confiscated for the relief of the poor parochial clergy, but failed.

Chapel. The derivation of the word is very doubtful. It may be from the fact that the kings of France upon their campaigns carried with them St. Martin's cloak (cappa), and the tent in which it was kept and where service was held was called the Capella. The English Church distinguishes between chapels royal, domestic chapels, collegiate chapel, chapels of ease for those parishioners who live at a great distance from the parish church, parochial chapels, which are endowed apart from the mother-church, free chapels,—i.e., exempt from Episcopal jurisdiction,—chapels belonging to guilds and corporations, and chapels which were built adjoining to the church building.

Chaplain. Originally a Priest attached to a chapel. Then a Minister rendering service to some person empowered to employ one, as an Archbishop, who may have eight chaplains, and so too others who according to their rank may maintain a proper number. Clergymen officiating in the army and navy, or in prisons, hospitals, or public corporations, who are serving Legislative bodies, are called Chaplains. So too the clergy who are appointed to examine candidates for Holy Orders are called Examining Chaplains. In fact, it is a general title applied to any clergyman serving any corporate body in his ministerial capacity.

Chapter. (Vide BIBLE.) The word is derived from the Latin Caput. It is the name for one of the principal divisions of a book;—in the Bible, one of the larger sections into which the separate books are divided. It was the work of Cardinal Hugo (1240 A.D.), who divided the Bible into convenient sections for the purposes of a Comment which he wrote upon it, and his division has been the one followed ever since.

Chapter. Vide DEAN, and CATHEDRAL.

Character. In theological language "the seal." The special graces stamped upon the soul by the gifts and graces of the various means of salvation given to us in the Church. The seal of the SPIRIT of the LORD is spoken of in such connection by St. Paul, and in one or two places in the Revelation. (Compare 2 Cor. i. 22; Eph. i. 13; iv. 30; Romans iv. 11; Rev. vii. 3-8; Rev. ix. 4; 2 Tim. ii. 19; in all of which a spiritual impress of some indelible character is more or less clearly asserted. Of these, 2 Cor. i. 22; Eph. i. 13; and iv. 30, refer clearly to confirmation.) It is not to be doubted that there is an impress made upon our spiritual nature by the gifts of Baptism, of Confirmation, and of Ordination. If the grace is given, it is bestowed once for all, however we may afterwards misuse it or abuse it.

Charge. The address of the Bishop to his Clergy and Laity. In the English Church Archdeacons do also deliver charges. In the American Church it is usually a weighty discussion of some important question relating either to the Church at large or to the Diocese. It is generally delivered separately, but is sometimes read, together with the address, containing his report of work done during the conventional year, to the Clergy and Laity in convention. Often, apart from their ability, these charges make a step forward in the Church's work.

Chasuble. An ancient vestment which was and is often worn by the Priest at the celebration of the Holy Communion. The chasuble was at first the out-of-door dress of the ecclesiastic when it had become distinctively a Church garb. But by the ninth century it became a part of the Vestment worn at a solemn service. It was circular, with an aperture in the centre by which, slipped over the head, it could be worn upon the shoulders, and it was wide enough when falling from the shoulders to cover the hands. It is one of the Vestments ordered by the famous Ornaments Rubric of Edward VI. to be worn at the celebration of the Holy Communion. It was laid aside for a long time, but has in recent years been revived. The use of it is not very general in this country.

Cherub. The wondrous spirits of Ezekiel's vision who spake not, though the beat of their wings was as the voice of speech; but there was a Voice from the firmament above them. The number in Ezekiel is four. The Cherubim were set in front of the Garden of Eden to keep it. Two were imaged over the mercy-seat of the Ark in the Tabernacle. Two of colossal size overshadowed it in Solomon's Temple. The Cherubim are first mentioned as guarding the gates of Eden. Their images were to be put upon the mercy-seat, probably in solid wrought-work. They were spoken of in the Psalms xviii. 10; lxxx. 1. In Ezekiel's first vision they are called Living Creatures and described as similar to the four Living Creatures in Rev. iv., but are identified both as Cherubim and as the Living Creatures of the first vision in Ezekiel's second vision (ch. x. 20). Mysterious and incomparable, yet likened to creatures of earth, the bearers of the Throne, voiceless, yet with harmonious flight, whose beat is as the voice of a mighty host.

Cherubic Hymn. This name is often given to the Tersanctus. But, in fact, it is a hymn which has no parallel in the Western Church. The Hymn and its preface, as it stands in the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom, is this: "Let us who mystically represent the Cherubim, and sing the hymn to the quickening TRINITY, lay by at this time all worldly cares, that we may receive the KING OF GLORY invisibly attended by the angelic orders. Alleluia! Alleluia! Alleluia!" It really is later than St. Chrysostom's day, and is an insertion, as it was composed in the time of Justinian (530 A.D.). It also has its place in the service of the protheses, and therefore cannot be identical with the Tersanctus which is sung in the Canon.

Chimere. The under robe of a Bishop. (Vide VESTMENTS.)

Choir. In the Church, the place of the choristers without the chancel-rail, but upon the dais between the nave and the chancel. But the name is transferred popularly with us to the band of singers who have charge of the music of the Sanctuary. They have a long history behind them, for they are the representatives of the organization of the singers and musicians under David (1 Chron. xxv.) and under Solomon. They were reorganized by Nehemiah (ch. xii. passim). Every choir, properly appointed, should be large enough to be divided into two parts, that whenever necessary there may be antiphonal singing. Its members, if possible, should be communicants, and should have set before them, very clearly, the duty and the glory of their work in the worship. It was customary in the early Church to set apart the singers with the charge, "What thou believest in thine heart that sing with thy lips." There are two or three fundamental principles too often lost sight of that should rule the conduct of the music by the choir. They are the leaders of the musical part of the service of God's Sanctuary; therefore they should lead in such music only as the congregation can follow. They are under the authority of the Rector, and his will should be their wish. When they are ready to keep out all light and unseemly music, and to repress all indecency and irreverence in the performance of it, they will find his authority but a name. The music, at least of the hymns and chants, should be only from some one well-known book, with which such of the congregation as choose to do so can provide themselves. It is sometimes allowed the choir to select an elaborate setting for the TE DEUM, and to sing an anthem or an offertory sentence as an offering of their musical skill to the Giver of their talent,—a very appropriate and devout custom when it is kept within due limits.

The composition of the choir is often so difficult to arrange satisfactorily that it may be impossible to put any hint here given into practice. But it would be well, whenever it can be done, to select boys with a musical ear and good voice for the choir. Two men and four or six boys would make a good basis, though it is the least number that could be used. Sixteen voices form such a mass of sound that, whenever sufficient enthusiasm is shown, the congregation will always join in. But if not, devout women can more readily be obtained who will make an offering of their work and skill. There are two or three desiderata which should be attended to in country choirs,—to have but one Hymnal from which to sing; to be taught the responsibility resting upon them; to have full punctual attendance at practice; to feel that it is little short of an insult to Him, before Whom the innumerable choirs of heaven are ever singing, to offer a hasty, ill-prepared, irreverently-performed service of song.

Chorepiscopus. Local Bishops in the ancient Church. They were Bishops having a jurisdiction in the country under the Bishop of the city who had supreme jurisdiction, but was himself under the Metropolitan. It was, in fact, a local missionary extension of the Episcopate. Its powers were defined to be nearly what our Bishops now practically exercise upon a Visitation. They confirmed, consecrated churches, appointed readers and subdeacons, but could only ordain by license from the Bishop,—i.e., they had spiritual authority, but by the terms of their work and jurisdiction only exercised it by special license. They could not administer the affairs of the Diocese, and could not intrude for any official work into a city Parish. Individual chorepiscopi assumed so much at times, and gave so much trouble latterly in the West, that they were suppressed. In the East, the Council of Laodicea (360 A.D.) dealt a blow which was followed up, till in about a century or a little more they disappeared. But there was a long, stout struggle in the West, and finally they were destroyed as an order by the tenth century, though there are instances of the office as late as the thirteenth century. Theirs was essentially a missionary extension of the Episcopate, which was suppressed with more or less difficulty when the Church became National. But an attempt to establish this order, the memory of which seems to have lingered in England, was made under Henry VIII. (1534 A.D.) by appointing several towns as seats for such Bishops, entitled Suffragan Bishops. The act, after slumbering nearly three hundred and fifty years, has been revived and has been acted upon. There are four Suffragans,—Dr. Parry, of Dover, under the Archbishop of Canterbury; Dr. How, of Bedford, under the Bishop of London; Dr. Trollope, of Nottingham, under the Bishop of Lincoln; and Dr. Bloomfield, of Colchester, under the Bishop of St. Albans.

Chrism. An anointing oil used from early time in the Church in Baptism and in Confirmation. It was more prominently used in mediæval times in the Oriental and Latin Churches. In Confirmation it has often been held by Latin ritualists that chrism is of the essence of the rite; but from the inspired record (Acts viii. 18, 19; xix. 6; Heb. vi. 2) it is certain that prayer and imposition of hands are only essential. In the Oriental Church the Priest confirms with the chrism blessed by the Bishop.

Chrisome. In the office of Baptism it was a white vesture which the priest put upon the child, saying, "Take this white vesture for a token of innocency," etc. It was ordered in the Anglo-Saxon Church (786 A.D.) that chrisomes be used for mending surplices or for the wrapping of chalices. The Prayer-Book of 1549 A.D. orders that the woman shall offer the chrisome when she comes to be churched. But if the child died before her churching she was excused from offering it. It was the custom to bury the child in the chrisome, but by an abuse of words the chrisome child meant a child that died before it was baptized.

Christian. The name given (possibly in jest) by the people of Antioch to the Disciples; but it was so perfectly appropriate that it supplanted the earlier name entirely. A Christian is a baptized member of CHRIST'S Holy Church. He can only become so by Baptism, for Baptism is the sacrament of entrance, the Door, by which we are admitted. But there has arisen a too common perversion of the term Christian in modern times, referring to the unchristian, inconsistent conduct of too many who bear the name but practically deny its power. Baptism makes a person the Child of God whether he is an obedient or a disobedient child, as birth makes a child a citizen of the state whether he prove to be a good citizen or not; or as the oath of allegiance makes an alien a citizen and gives him the protection of the state whether he prove faithful to his oath or not. Therefore to say, as many Christian people do, when bewailing their short-comings, "I wish I were a Christian," is a serious misleading phrase at least, if not involving much more. To say, "Would I were a better Christian!" is but a confession that we all should devoutly utter.

Christianity is usually defined as the Religion of the LORD JESUS CHRIST. This is correct, but not in the same sense as when we say the Religion of Buddha or of Mohammed. The origin of Christianity was, in fact, the founding of the organized Church from which, in its beginnings and in its continuance, it is not rationally separable. There can be no greater error than to regard Christianity as derived from the Bible, or the Church as a development of Christianity. It is strange that these relations are not generally or clearly understood, so patent are they to any thoughtful examination. Even the elementary doctrines common to all orthodox believers, those contained in the Apostles' Creed, were not all originally taught by the Divine Founder of Christianity in any recorded words. His birth of the Virgin Mary He does not allude to, and the great facts of His life, death, resurrection, and ascension were at most only predicted by Him. He never substituted Christianity for Judaism, nor declared the formal repeal of the law of Moses. What He did was to choose twelve men, organize them as a corporation in perpetuity, endow them with a charter, authorize them to teach certain doctrines which He had privately taught them, and which the HOLY GHOST was to recall, and intrust them with the mysterious sacramental rites of initiation (Baptism) and full membership (Holy Communion) in the society thus formed. He then made them a promise, to be and co-operate with them until the end of the world. "Receive ye the HOLY GHOST. As my FATHER has sent ME, even so send I you." There was the Charter with its enabling act. "Go ye into all the world and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them," etc. These were the mission and authority to initiate. "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." There was the promise of perpetuity and continued authority. That was Christianity when He left the world. Nothing more whatever. But that was the Church. It is clear that if all this was said to the Apostles only as individuals, no other individuals could ever lay claim to any rights or privileges under it, or to any promises made only to them. It is equally clear that if it was said to them as a chartered corporation, the rights, privileges, and promises so given can belong only to "them, their heirs and assigns," on condition of the charter not being vitiated and the corporation not lapsing. It is clear also that as the individuals were not to exist until the end of the world, the promise to be with them until the end of the world must have been made to them as a perpetual corporation. It is thus evident that all authorized and authoritative Christianity is necessarily bound up in that corporation, which is the Church. But further, it was this corporation, and this only, that formulated, elaborated, and propagated Christianity, and upon this authority alone its doctrines have been accepted. A very singular and solemn authority had been conferred upon it: "Whosoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whosoever sins ye retain, they are retained." It matters not what the exact meaning of these words may have been. They certainly conveyed a most solemn and unique authority of some kind upon those to whom they were said. That authority was to withhold or inflict some penalties upon those who should become members of the organization. But the individuals did not at once proceed to exercise such functions or to perform the duties assigned. They passed fifty days in close consultation, during which, as a recognized duty, they elected a new member to complete their corporate number. Then, always acting together, they perfected the organization of the society by selecting and ordaining Deacons, Presbyters, and Apostles (as Timothy and Titus), and by instructing these and sending them out with authority to teach doctrines and initiate members. These new Apostles were authorized to proceed in the same way to perpetuate the corporation, the original twelve exercising discipline, organizing and administering the Church, and putting into writing, personally and by the aid of two authorized assistants, the whole body of Truth now accepted as Christianity. In this organization, therefore, Christianity consisted, and must continue to consist. If the corporation has lapsed,—if the original organization has ceased to exist, or become essentially altered in its form and methods,—there can be no authorized or authoritative Christianity now among men. All this is recorded in the Bible. But it amounts to nothing unless we remember that Christianity is not derived from the Bible, and further remember how it is that we know the Bible to be true. The simple fact is, that when the Church of CHRIST was organized the Bible did not exist. Even the Old Testament, as accepted by the Jewish Church of our LORD's time, was not the Old Testament of the "Protestant" Bible. It contained what is known as the "Apocrypha;" not all together in separate books, but dispersed among the Canonical Books, and in some cases interpolating their text. It is to be carefully noted that our LORD Himself used and quoted this interpolated Septuagint Version without one recorded word of dissent. The New Testament Scriptures were not yet written. These consist of Four Gospels, written by two Apostles and two Evangelists working under their immediate oversight; the book of "Acts," written by one of these Evangelists to record the doings of the Apostles; twenty-one Epistles, being letters addressed by five of the Apostles at various times to organized Churches, or to individuals, or to the Christian society at large; and one book of "Revelation," whether a poem, a prophecy, or a rhapsody has never been fully determined. This also by the last of the original Apostles. But these "Books" were written during a period comprising at least forty years, and after probably twenty years of oral teaching. In this period there were extant (as St. Luke tells us) "many" other Gospels, and at least one other Epistle, i.e., that to the Laodiceans. Thus there was certainly no "Bible" up to the time when the last Apostle died. But there was Christianity. Hence Christianity is not derived from the Bible. But after that last Apostle was dead some organized authority—certainly not the simple agreement of the mass of Christian people—determined what was and what was not God's revealed truth to man; rejected all the Apocryphal books and passages of the Old Testament,—which our LORD Himself had not done,—all extant "Gospels" save four, and all Apostolic Epistles except twenty-one. The same authority determined the "Revelation" to be inspired Scripture. Could that authority be aught else than the continued Corporation, the Church? Not possibly. Could any higher power be claimed or exercised by a human organization, or could such organization thus act except by a conceded Divine authorization? Clearly, then, it is the Church which is acknowledged by all Christian people to have given the Bible to the world, and the terms Christianity and "the Church" are convertible. But this being so, the definition of Christianity is not complete until we determine what is meant by "the Church." About this there can be no uncertainty or indefiniteness. It must be the perpetuated Corporation established and chartered by our LORD in person, which has come down in unbroken succession from the original Corporators, with its charter unvitiated and its constitution diligently observed and regarded. It must possess the essential form of the original organization; it must hold and practice the faith and sacraments intrusted to the Apostles for preservation, dissemination, and perpetuation; it must show its authority and that of its officers derived in unbroken succession and in the prescribed form from those Apostles; and it must prove its faithful performance of all the objects for which it was organized and perpetuated. Otherwise there can be no Christianity and no divinely-administered religion or reliable Divine promises left to mankind. Wherever these notes are found there is the historic Church of CHRIST, which in its universal organization is identical with Christianity, and upon the unbroken testimony of which rests the only authority for believing and accepting the Christian Bible with all that it contains. No Christian sect or communion which lacks the Apostolic form and constitution of Bishops (or Apostles), Priests (or Presbyters), and Deacons, no properly organized Church which has vitiated the Creed or abandoned the two original sacraments of Baptism and the LORD'S Supper, nor any single and separate part of the Corporation, whether Roman, Greek, or Anglican, can justly claim to be that Church whose charter and mission was "to all nations." The Church Universal in her integrity, in her authoritative Episcopal order, in her orthodox and pure faith, and in her duly administered sacraments is the perpetuated corporation in which Christianity consists, and thus when we express our belief in Christianity we only express our belief in the ONE, HOLY, CATHOLIC CHURCH.

REV. ROBERT WILSON, D.D.

Christmas. This Feast falls on December 25. Though this date is now universally observed, yet at first there was a diversity of practice. In Egypt April 20 and May 20 were observed. In Palestine, and the East generally, the 5th of January was kept, while the West observed the present day. But about the first part of the fifth century the East accepted the Western feast-day, and it became universal. St. Chrysostom has a homily which is very important upon this topic. The outline of the reasons for supposing the 25th of December to be the true date is this: Most probably Zacharias took the place of the High-Priest upon the great day of Atonement (such substitution, when some unforeseen accident prevented the High-Priest from executing his office himself, has been abundantly proven out of Josephus and Maimonides), which fell that year upon September 23. It was while he was within the veil the message of the angel came to him. This would place the nativity of St. John Baptist on June 24; and as he was six months older than our LORD, his cousin according to the flesh, it places the nativity of our LORD upon December 25. The celebration has always been observed with great solemnity and rejoicing, though too frequently with other than sacred and festal customs. There are in other than the English Church two celebrations of the Communion, with separate Collects, Epistles, and Gospels. Whenever there are two with us, it is because of the convenience of the communicants and to shorten the length of the services. Three festivals stand in immediate connection with it: those of St. Stephen (December 26), the first martyr; of St. John (December 27), "whom JESUS loved;" of the Innocents' day (December 28), the coetanei of our LORD.

Christology is the doctrine contained in the Scriptures concerning the Person and office of CHRIST. The subject may be conveniently considered under two heads; the first containing the prophecies of the MESSIAH in the Old Testament, and the Messianic hopes of the Jew based upon them; and the second the revelation of the CHRIST made by JESUS in the New Testament, and the teaching of the Church upon the relation of the divine and human natures in His Person, together with some mention of the heresies which were the occasion of the more exact definition of this teaching.

1. The Christology of the Old Testament falls naturally into the three divisions of Patriarchal, Legal, and Prophetic Christology; just as the history of the chosen people presents the same stages, and just as the history advancing along these stages passes from outlines covering long intervals to more minute details of shorter periods, so does the doctrine of the MESSIAH in the successive divisions become more frequent, more definite, and more precise. To treat this topic at any length would require a volume, and it must suffice here merely to mention some of the chief passages of Scripture which are understood to form a connected chain of promise and prophecy concerning the CHRIST, and to indicate the outlines of the conception of the MESSIAH and His office inferred from them. The first of these passages is found in the story of the fall of man, where, with the curse pronounced upon the serpent, is joined the promise of the seed of the woman to be at enmity with the serpent: "it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel." This promise of a deliverer, which, no doubt, had a fuller and deeper meaning (than its form now conveys) to those who received it, was for them the basis of faith and hope in a SAVIOUR to come, until the promise was renewed in the blessing pronounced upon Shem, "blessed be the LORD GOD of Shem" (Gen. ix.), and in the blessing of Abraham, "in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed" (Gen. xii.), which are remarkable as having their fulfillment not at the time spoken, nor for those to whom they were addressed, but in the far future and for others, even the whole family of man. But the promise becomes much clearer in the inspired words of the dying Jacob addressed to Judah, "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be" (Gen. xlix.), centering as it does in one Person, who is to be a man of peace (Shiloh), to be a prince, and to whom the nations shall be obedient. The prophecy of Balaam (Numbers xxiv.), and the passages of the Pentateuch, which relate to the angel of the LORD (Gen. xii. 7; xviii. 1, etc.), have been thought also to refer to the MESSIAH. But the next step in the revelation of the MESSIAH, is the typical meaning of the Mosaic law of sacrifices, and of the High-Priest who offered them. Sacrifices were not a new thing with Moses, and no doubt the patriarchs who offered them did so with a sufficient conception of their hidden meaning; but the full system and elaborate ritual appointed by Moses were designed to be a shadow of the good things to come (as St. Paul declares), and to serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things. Again, after a long interval, probably because primitive tradition was forgotten, and typical meanings had become obscure, the promise is renewed by messages to the prophets continually more definite and precise. In the Psalms (xxii., lxxii., etc.), and in the prophets (Isaiah xi., liii., lxiii.; Jer. xxiii.; Zech. ix., xiii., etc.), we read fuller and more personal descriptions of the MESSIAH, which, joined with the former revelations, furnish a conception of Him as a Person who should rescue His people from sin by making an expiatory offering for it, Himself at once Priest and Victim, and after triumphing over the enemy of righteousness, and destroying his power, should rule forever as the Prince of Peace. But in this conception there were such contradictory points that the Jews, despairing of reconciling them in one person, came to the conclusion that the prophets foretold two MESSIAHS, one to suffer and the other to triumph; and missing the true sense of their Scriptures, it is probable that in time they came to look for an earthly king only, who should triumph over the nations which had conquered and oppressed them, and restore again a temporal kingdom to Israel.

2. But in the fullness of time God sent forth His SON, made of a woman, made under the Law, to fulfill all the FATHER'S promises, and to reconcile in His own Person the conflicting predictions of the birth, rank, and appearance, of the reception and treatment, of the death and burial of the MESSIAH. Him the Jews rejected, refusing to see how He made true in Himself all the words of promise; but Him have Christians—His faithful followers—ever honored with divine worship as the MESSIAH, the CHRIST of God, yet God Himself; as the SAVIOUR of men, yet a true Man. The New Testament, i.e. the words of our LORD in the Gospels, the doctrines published by St. Paul and his brother Apostles in their Epistles, supplement the revelation contained in the Old Testament, and furnish the key to the true interpretation of the prophets, as well as the basis for the Christian doctrine of the Person of CHRIST, of the SON of GOD become the Son of Man. The reader will not need any reference to these Scriptures, nor any analysis of their contents, before admitting this statement; and he will as readily admit that they contain the premises from which follow as logical consequences the decrees of the first general Councils defining the right faith concerning the Person of CHRIST. The definition of this faith, in the first days of Christianity, was negative rather than positive; the earlier Fathers contenting themselves with combating the errors of heretics on the one hand or on the other, and denying that the doctrine of the CHRIST was not as stated by them; while they did not undertake to set forth exactly what the true doctrine was, more fully than in the words of St. John, "the Word was made Flesh." Still the process of logical inference and development went on, and men saw more and more clearly how to sum up the separate assertions of Scripture—the faith once delivered to the saints—in a carefully defined philosophical statement. This, however, was not done at once, but as it were step by step, as the vagaries of heresy made more explicit definitions necessary; so that it was six or seven hundred years before the Person of CHRIST ceased to form the chief question in the Councils of the Church. The decisions of the first six general Councils (Nice against Arius, 325 A.D.; Constantinople against Macedonius, 381 A.D.; Ephesus against Nestorius, 431 A.D.; Chalcedon against Eutyches, 451 A.D.; Constantinople supplementary of Ephesus, 553 A.D.; and Constantinople supplementary of Chalcedon, 680 A.D.), the substance of which is expressed by the (so-called) Nicene Creed, set forth the Person of CHRIST as embracing truly and perfectly both the nature of GOD and the nature of man, inseparably and without confusion. It will be observed that this was the work of the Eastern Church; in the West, however, thinking men were not idle, and in like manner as the faith of the Church concerning the Person of CHRIST was thus gradually expressed with accuracy and precision, so the doctrine of His office and work was from time to time more clearly defined, as philosophical speculations ending in heresy made it desirable to do so, until the Christology of the Church was completed by the doctrine of CHRIST in His office as the Atonement for sin, the Restorer of man to the original dignity of his nature lost in Adam, and by the doctrine of Divine grace repairing human sinfulness. The subject of Christology, the doctrine of the Person of CHRIST, is sometimes treated as the development of a purely natural Messianic idea, of subjective or self-originated conception, to which there was no correspondent Divine Promise. Or it is discussed as the development of a Messianic idea which was both natural and supernatural, which was not purely subjective or self-originated, but had its origin in a Divine reality, and was fostered by a supernatural Providence until the revelation of that reality in the Incarnation,—God manifest in the flesh. Add to this second mode of considering Christology the teaching that the doctrine of the Person of CHRIST was made known to the patriarchs and prophets from the earliest ages by some knowledge of what His work should be, and the third and true method is reached; a method which has been called dogmatic, and is that commonly adopted by theological writers on Christology. For anything like a proper treatment of this subject the reader must turn to special works on Christology (Dorner, Hengstenberg), and on such subdivisions of it as the Atonement (Magee), or the Divinity of CHRIST (Liddon's Bampton Lectures): but the articles in Smith's "Dictionary of the Bible" on MESSIAH, JESUS CHRIST, SON of GOD, SON of MAN, etc., may be consulted with advantage.

Chronicles, First and Second Books of. These two books, like those of the Kings, were in the Hebrew originally but a single book, but in the Greek translation they were divided for convenience, and so the Vulgate received them; thence they passed into the modern translations as two books. They have been attributed, with almost positive certainty, to Ezra; and all the circumstances and the contents of the books agree very well with this. They contain genealogies, especially those of the Priests and Levites. They have much of a national tone in them; they give other and parallel accounts to those in the books of the Kings of the same events. In these we may see Ezra's purpose to infuse a national tone in the remnant brought back from Babylon, and the need of exact genealogical records of the Levitical families, that the details of the Temple worship may be restored to those who alone were competent to conduct them; and also to give independent and corroborative narratives of the facts recorded by Jeremiah in the books of the Kings. These facts have stood much in the way of those who wish to show that the books of Moses were an invention of a forger after the "Captivity;" for if this were so, then the books of the Chronicles are still later. To destroy the credibility of the Chronicles the date of their composition would have to be placed later still. But the date and probable authorship have been abundantly established by competent critics. The authenticity of the Chronicles has been, then, the pivot upon which a great deal of critical acumen has been expended with an equivalently valuable result. The contents begin with the genealogies from Adam; and, after a rapid outline, come on to the later history of the two kingdoms; and while not always identical with, still traverse much the same ground as those of the books of the Kings. They are not supplementary or intentionally explanatory of the Kings, having another purpose in view; but they do indirectly throw much light upon them.

Chronology is the art of recording historical events in their proper order and succession, by expressing the interval of time which has elapsed between their occurrence and the occurrence of some other event chosen as a standard of reference. To treat this subject fully some explanation of the calendar, or mode of measuring time, and regulating the year, would be proper, but limited space forbids any such digression, and attention will be given here only to a brief mention of those systems of chronology most commonly met with in history. By a system of chronology is understood a scheme of historical events arranged in their proper sequence, and at their proper intervals, either before or after a chosen standard of reference; and it is easy to see how different systems may have been suggested and adopted in ancient times. For as tribes of men at first loosely associated together gradually developed a common national life, a need would arise of some fixed point of reckoning to which to refer in recording or comparing events. The most important characteristic of such a fixed point of time would be some event associated with it, of such moment as to be generally known and long remembered. Hence we find events referred to earthquakes or eclipses, the accession of kings and other like occasions commonly known, or of common interest. Different nations would naturally have their own standards of reference, and their own systems of chronology based upon them; hence, as is well known in ancient history, the Greeks used one method of recording events, the Romans another, and the nations of the East, and of Egypt, used various systems at different times; while in modern history, Christians, Mohammedans, Hindoos, and Chinese all have their own peculiar systems of chronology. As some six or eight of these are frequently mentioned in history, it will be well to notice them more particularly, and to explain how they may be connected with the Vulgar or Christian era.

In Greece the common life of the Hellenic race was kept alive and fostered by the four great national games, of which those at Olympia seem to have become prominent at an early day. It was the custom to name these games, which were celebrated every fourth year, early in July, from the winner of the foot-race; and at a later time to record his name in the gymnasium of Olympia. The first to be distinguished by this last honor was Coræbus; and naturally the event of his triumph having a fixed name of its own, and being brought regularly to the attention of the whole people every four years, became a ready standard to which all other events might be referred. Thus originated the era of the Olympiads, which are computed to have begun 776 years before the Christian era. But as the year of the Olympiads begins in July, it is necessary in reducing Olympiads to years before CHRIST, to subtract the year of the Olympiad from 777 if the event befell from July to December, but from 776 if from January to June. For example, Rome was founded in the third year of the sixth Olympiad, in April; then taking $5 \times 4 + 3 = 23$ from 776, we have 753 B.C. for the date of the foundation of the city; but if the year of the Olympiad is greater than 776, to find the year of the Christian era subtract from it 776 if the event befell from July to December, 777 if from January to June.

The Roman system of chronology refers all events to the founding of the city of Rome, which is generally fixed in April, 753 B.C., though it is also placed in the years 752, 751, 750, and 747 B.C. A simple subtraction of the year of the city from 753 should give the year before CHRIST of any event recorded in the era of Rome; but owing to the different dates assigned for the beginning of that era, the reduction is not always attended with certainty; nor is the difficulty lessened by the fact that the Romans employed two sorts of years, the civil year and the consular year, and further that the year of Rome does not coincide with the civil year, the latter beginning January 1, the other April 21.

The era of Nabonassar is that used by Ptolemy in his records of Assyrian and Babylonian history. Its chief merit is that it begins at a definite moment of time, viz., Wednesday at noon, February 26, 747 B.C., and for that reason is famous in astronomy; but on account of a difference in length of the Julian and Babylonian years, it is no easy matter to convert dates from the era of Nabonassar to the Christian era.

Before the Exodus the Jews began their year in September; but to commemorate that event the beginning of the year was changed to about the time of the vernal equinox (Exodus xii. 2) for ecclesiastical matters, the former year being still retained in civil affairs. There is reason to believe that the Exodus formed a chronological era with the Israelites (1 Kings vi. 1), but it is well known that they recorded historical events by referring them to the year of the reigning king or conqueror. In the later history of the Jews, and until comparatively modern times, they used the Macedonian era, which they styled the Era of Contracts, because their Syrian governors compelled them to use it in making contracts. They are said, however, to use now a Mundane era, reckoning from the creation of the world, which they set about 3760 years before CHRIST. (Vide article Chronology in Dr. Smith's Dictionary of the Bible.)

The Macedonian era, just spoken of, called also the Era of the Seleucidæ, was reckoned from the occupation of Babylon by Seleucus Nicator (311 B.C.). It was for a long time in general use in all the Greek countries bordering on the Levant; but as those who used it varied much in their time of beginning the year, it is hard to determine with readiness dates recorded in it.

The Vulgar or Christian era is that in common use in Europe and America, and largely in Asia. It was proposed some 500 years after CHRIST by Dionysius Exiguus, and gradually came into use by all Christians. Being designed to reckon from the Incarnation of CHRIST, its author chose March 25 in the year of Rome 752 B.C. (?) as its initial point, but after a time this was deferred to the following January; and the Vulgar era now begins January 1 in the year of Rome 753 B.C. Besides the 25th of March and the 1st of January, the 25th of December has been taken as the beginning of the year; a fact to be remembered in reckoning and comparing dates in early Christian ages, and in late history, too, for that matter, because the 25th of March was retained as New Year's Day in England, together with the Old Style, until 1752 A.D., at which time a change of both year and style was made; hence, though we now say that George Washington was born February 22, 1732 A.D., those who recorded that event wrote it February 11, 1731 A.D. However, historical writers had already reckoned the year to begin at January 1. For an explanation of these matters, and for rules for avoiding error and confusion in dates, the reader must refer to the subject of the Calendar as treated in the various cyclopædias.

The era of the Hégira is that used by the Mohammedans, and dates from the flight of Mohammed (the Hegira) from Mecca, or rather from a day shortly before the actual flight; so that it begins July 16, 622 A.D. But it is not used in Persia, where time is reckoned from the accession to the throne of Yezdegird, June 16, 632 A.D.

It remains now to speak of an important, and at the same time very difficult, branch of chronology, viz., that of Biblical chronology. The basis of such a system is of course the text of the Bible; and it might seem at first a simple matter to reduce its records to a tabulated scheme, but there are difficulties presented by the text itself, and in addition the Septuagint, or ancient Greek version, differs from the Hebrew text; and again, the Samaritan Pentateuch differs from both these. Now two of these must have been altered, and as certain alterations are suspected in the Hebrew text, whether by design or by accident, it has become impossible to determine which of the three is right on those points where they differ. Hence there have been so many discrepant opinions and contradictory conclusions among those who have given attention to this subject, that from over-confidence in treating it in a positive manner, men have gone apparently to the opposite extreme of thinking that nothing whatever can be done with it. These remarks apply of course only to that part of Biblical chronology which cannot be corroborated by contemporary profane history; but the truth about it, as in so many other cases, lies probably between two extremes, and a careful digest of the records of the Bible will afford a system of chronology which may be accepted as final; because, though not absolutely certain for the earliest ages, it is better than any other yet obtained; and in later times is confirmed by contemporary history, and especially by the wonderful disclosures of modern research and discovery.

The different systems of Bible chronology which have been advocated by the most learned and able men may be arranged (to take no notice of the Rabbinical systems) in two classes, the long systems and the short systems; though all long systems do not agree with one another, neither do all short systems agree together. The advocates of the short systems base their calculations on the genealogies of the antediluvians and patriarchs as given in the Hebrew text (and in our version of the Bible), while those who prefer the long systems choose the corresponding genealogies in the Septuagint, which are greater by one hundred years in the age of nearly every patriarch at the time when his successor was born. For this reason, and for certain other peculiarities of interpretation and reckoning, there is a very considerable difference between the two classes of chronologies, until they practically agree in the date of the destruction of Solomon's Temple. Taking Hales as a representative of the long systems and Ussher of the short, the two may be compared by the following table of six principal dates:

	Hales.	Ussher.
Destruction of Solomon's Temple.....	586 B.C.	588 B.C.
Foundation " "	1027	1012
Exodus.....	1648	1491
Call of Abram.....	2078	1921
Flood.....	3155	2348
Creation.....	5411	4004

Out of all the many systems which have been published and advocated, that of Ussher, Archbishop of Ireland, has received the most favor, and is best known, at least to English-speaking men; owing, no doubt, to the fact that it is inserted in the margin of the Authorized Version of the Scriptures, completed and published under James I. of England; and the dates of such events as the Creation, the Flood, the Exodus, etc., are commonly given in accordance with it. Perhaps it is as well to adopt it as any, both because it is based upon the Hebrew text of the Bible, and because it has been so long received and used. But there are many able advocates of the long system, and in particular the learned writer of the article Chronology in Smith's "Dictionary of the Bible," to which reference has already been made, appears to favor the long system; and he suggests a scheme nearly the same as that of Hales as the most probable, making, however, a correction of four years in the date of the Exodus (and of the preceding dates), based upon a theory that the 14th day of the month Abib (when the Passover was instituted) corresponded to the 14th day of an Egyptian month, Phameneth, and upon the fact, as shown by astronomy, that a full moon fell upon the 14th of Phameneth in the year 1652 B.C. His statement of the dates above given would therefore be,—

Destruction of the Temple.....	586 B.C.
Foundation of the Temple.....	?
Exodus.....	1652
Abram.....	2082
Flood.....	3159 or 3099
Creation.....	5421 or 5361

The article spoken of must be again referred to for the explanation of the writer's grounds for his conclusions; and in it also will be found a full consideration of the whole subject of Biblical chronology. For the more general subject, the "Chronological Introduction to the History of the Church" and the "Church of the Redeemed," by the late Dr. Samuel F. Jarvis, may be consulted.

Church. The word has usually been derived from the Greek adjective Kyriaki, belonging to the LORD, through the Teutonic changes of (Anglo-Saxon) Circ, Cyric; O.Germ. Chirichu; Icelandic, Kyrkia; while the Latin races usually retained the other Greek word, Ecclesia. The deviation has been challenged, but not on probably accurate grounds. It has three broad uses which are quite distinct: (A) the church building; (B) the Church in a city or a Diocese (in the New Testament in a household); (C) the Mystical Body of CHRIST in its Unity; these are quite distinct and definite uses and are generally well understood. It is only to the last two that this article refers. And, first, of the Mystical Body of CHRIST, which he purchased with His Blood (Acts xx. 28). Its Founder and Foundation is the LORD Himself. "Upon this Rock I will build my Church" (Matt. xvi. 18), and that Rock is CHRIST. Before its foundation He describes it, and calls it a Kingdom, His Kingdom, His FATHER'S Kingdom, the Kingdom of God, of Heaven, which He appoints to His Apostles. Men are bidden to enter it; it suffers violence and the violent take it by force; it is an open organization, yet it works as leaven in the soul. Parables best foreshadow its varied extent, power, and gifts. A net to gather all men, good and bad; a pearl, a treasure worth all else; the service of a great King which has great responsibilities and eternal rewards; a tree which shall shadow and lodge many. It is to be in the world, not of the world, but to lift men out of the world. It is a power in the heart and life. It is a kingdom with a Divine policy and bestowing an immortal citizenship. It admits without distinction babes and old men, bond and free, simple and learned, rich and poor. It is founded on love and in love, and its citizenship is retained by loving obedience. These intimations of it are part of the training the Apostles receive. Then offering the redemption on the Cross, He rises from the dead, and upon Himself as Eternal God and Immortal Man He founds His Church. It is a Covenant through Him, a union with Him, a worship of Him. Emphatically, it is the Church of CHRIST our God, who has bought it with His blood.

But in many ways CHRIST's Church is not governed as secular kingdoms are. He governs it as its Head (Eph. i. 22, 23; iv. 1-16; Col. i. 15-22). By the HOLY GHOST (St. John xv. 7-15); by the Apostolic office (Eph. iv. 11, 12; St. Matt. xxviii. 20). For its purpose is to reconcile sinful man to the FATHER through the SON (2 Cor. v. 18, 19) by the pleading of the HOLY GHOST (Rom. viii. 26) in our hearts. It follows that the ministry of reconciliation in the Church is in CHRIST's office as Apostle (Heb. iii. 1) and High-Priest, and He must appoint His own officers, who share in His authority (St. John xx. 21). He gives gifts and offers salvation. He must select His own messengers (St. Mark iii. 13; St. John xv. 16). This Apostolic office continues while the world lasts (St. Matt. xxviii. 20). But it exists only for His purposes and His work (St. John xv. 14; St. Mark xvi. 15, 16; St. Matt. xxviii. 18-20). But again, the work is for men. It reaches from the Throne of God the FATHER, from the Holiest Presence of CHRIST's unceasing intercession, to the life and happiness of the least of His loved race of men. This wondrous organization is for the salvation of men, soul and body (Eph. ii.). This King has laid down certain conditions on which He receives our allegiance in baptism. He assigns duties and responsibilities upon His citizens. He governs by eternal law of love, mercy, and justice. He has rights, privileges, and immunities to confer, offices to grant, defenses to place about them. The conditions are faith (St. Mark xvi. 16; Rom. x. 9; Heb. xi. 6; Acts viii. 36, 37) and repentance (Acts ii. 38; St. Luke xxiv. 27; 2 Peter iii. 9). The oath of allegiance in baptism is the renunciation of the world, the flesh, and the devil, the vow of Faith and of obedience. The gifts are forgiveness (Luke xxiv. 47; Acts xxii. 16), cleansing (1 Cor. vi. 11; Titus iii. 5), a new creature (Gal. iii. 27; Col. iii. 10; Eph. iv. 24), and life immortal (Rom. vi.). This is the first sacrament (military oath) to the Captain of our salvation (Heb. ii.). By it we become citizens of His kingdom (Eph. ii. 17-22; Phil. iii. 20, 21), sons of God (Rom. viii. 14-17; 1 John iii. 1, 2; St. John i. 12), heritors of his royal rights (Gal. i. 1-7; Rev. iii. 21; Eph. ii. 6). These are the privileges and gifts with which His citizens are clothed. But in a second act He conveys His HOLY SPIRIT for guidance and help (Heb. vi. 2; Acts ii. 38; viii. 17; xix. 1-6; Eph. iv. 30), whereby we become sanctified and are temples of the HOLY GHOST (1 Cor. iii. 16, 17; vi. 19; Eph. i. 13, 14). And a renewal of our vows is appointed in the Holy Communion (St. John vi. 51, 57; 1 Cor. xi. 23-26) for forgiveness (St. Matt. xxvi. 26-28); and direct power of absolution is given to His officers (St. John xx. 22, 23), or of discipline (1 Cor. v. 4, 5; 1 Tim. i. 20) and of blessing (Heb. xiii. 20, 21; 2 Cor. xii. 14). And He governs according to a Law part of which is revealed, and part lies behind the veil of eternal life. For He cannot govern but by Law, being the fount and source of all Law to us; and by perfect purity, holiness, and justice He governs us. The Law of CHRIST is drawn in part from the Law He gave on Mount Sinai, and whose principles are immutable, and in part from His own revelation of mercy and of justice (Gal. vi. 3; St. Matt. v., vii., x.; St. Luke vi.; St. John xiii. 34, 35; xiv., xv., xvi.). As the visible Church is, as it were, a polity and a colony from the eternal kingdom in heaven, it is governed not by laws of this world, but by Laws from thence (Phil. iii. 20, 21), and the Epistles in the New Testament generally; and the Law of Faith, of Righteousness, of Sanctification, the Law of Love and Forgiveness, the Law of Justice and of Good Works, are intermingled in the sacred writings left to His Church, that they become the rule of our daily life as citizens governed by Him in His kingdom.

But this citizenship, here probationary and disciplinary, involves certain responsibilities and duties. The conditions of entrance never cease to be binding. Faith in Him as a Person having power of life and death (St. John v. 20-27; St. Matt. xi. 27-30; St. John xi. 25, 26; xiv. 6; St. Matt. xxviii. 18), as one with God (St. John, i. 1, 2; x. 28-30; xiv. 9-11), as to be worshiped (St. John ix. 35-38; St. Luke xxiv. 52). Daily repenting. Increasing life in holiness (Gal. v. 22-26; Rom. viii.; Phil. iv. 8; Rom. xii.; 1 Cor. iii. 11-23). Good works (Rom. xii.-xv. 7; Eph. ii. 10; Phil. ii. 12-15). Service to others (St. John xiii. 34, 35; St. Matt. xxv. 31-46; Rom. xii. 18-21; Gal. v. 9, 10). Service of worship (Heb. x. 24-31; 1 Tim. ii. 1-4; Phil. iv. 6, 7; Eph. v. 19, 20). We have traced out the conditions of admission, the sacraments and their gifts, the rights and privileges, the heirship, the duties, the responsibilities, the blessing, and the strength, with an abundant reference to the Scripture, which is yet infinitely fuller of all of these. But again, all these gifts are contained in one Body. Our LORD's prayer for unity (St. John xvii.) cannot be meaningless. The Scripture is full of this unity, ONE NET, ONE NARROW WAY. For there is but one Atonement, one Resurrection, one Mediator, one King, one kingdom, one citizenship, one LORD, one Faith, one baptism. For GOD is one, and our calling is one in the unity of the HOLY GHOST.

This kingdom so created, so governed, composed of such citizens and having aims not of this earth, and a certainty of duration beyond the continuance of this earth, more,—expecting only its completion when this earth shall pass away, dependent upon an immortal King who holds eternal power, who is planning, shaping, fitting together by so many modes so many diverse lower interests, sanctifying men and giving them immortal hopes, must not merely give its gifts to us upon our consent to join it, but this consent must express, on our part, a deep conviction of our needs, of our fatal danger in rejecting it and Him it represents, and of the glorious benefits it confers upon every one belonging to it. For it is a peculiar kingdom; it exists in the subjects of earthly kingdoms, a spiritual state within a secular one, lifting up and purifying the secular state; a state that binds into one all the kindreds of the earth, yet does not interfere with, nay, sanctions their political condition (Rom. xiii. 1-7; St. Matt. xxii. 21); yet binds them by an oath and by mutual pledges to the Person of their King, who rules them by the law of love and obedience. It is therefore a bounden duty to become citizens of it.

But this organization, so compacted, governed, and equipped, must be considered as a polity, having definite ends and employing definite instruments. But, it must have historic continuity. This is essential to it. It must have it, for it is part of God's plan for the world throughout time as well as for all men; and, too, it cannot fail. It may be maimed and injured at times, but it must be perpetual, and have power of self-perpetuation in its visible organization. Its assured perpetuity rests in the Person of CHRIST, its visible perpetuity in the Apostolic office, which perpetuates itself. These facts of its historic continuity, of its perpetuity under all disasters, must be necessarily noted and accepted as fundamental: first, for our own faith (Heb. xi. 10; 1 Pet. v. 4), and, secondly, as relating to the general proof of the certainty of this kingdom (Matt. xxiv.; St. Mark xiii.; 1 Cor. xv.). For its doctrines have been and are borrowed, its authority imitated, its polity copied, its laws transferred, its citizenship promised. But in the past such organizations have failed, and all similar present ones we may be assured will fail also as soon as the forces so borrowed, not being self-sustaining, shall be expended. This Body, this Church, this visible kingdom, this Divine organization, this state within all, and permeating all earthly states, yet not of them, endowed with supramental vitality, inheriting a perpetuity, must have granted to it, as a body, certain powers, both because of its Founder and because of the abiding presence of the HOLY GHOST. Its Founder had a definite purpose, the HOLY SPIRIT has a definite mission in and through the Church. Therefore it becomes a politeia in the fullest sense of the word. Every state is founded to express some mighty political truth in behalf of and through the people who compose it. This heavenly kingdom is founded that men might know the only true God and JESUS CHRIST whom He has sent (John xvii. 2). It is therefore Trinitarian, (Athan. 2 Ep. ad Serapion), because of the baptismal words, which are the germ of this principle. It must, for itself and for its citizens, obtain the defense and continual blessing of the Holy Trinity; it is the public depository and the sole defender of this Faith. Its polity is framed for that end. It involves the use of all the means which can set forth before men the truth of the doctrine, its vital relation to the lives of men, and the necessity of believing in and therefore acting on all the consequences that flow from it. It must be the keeper and defender of this Faith, neither adding to it nor subtracting from it. It must proclaim before all men this Faith, and it must not exaggerate nor yet weaken the conditions of acceptance and the gifts that shall flow from it. As its government is framed upon this fact, the Holy Scriptures are given to it as an inspired record of it, and its historic development and continuity, the history of God's teachings by it, and the results of its being received or rejected extending over a long section of its career, (a) in the Patriarchal, (b) the Mosaic, (c) the Christian revelation. This sacred inspired series of documents must be held and defended intact; and under the lines of action suggested by and contained in them, its policy must be carried out. This involves the arrangement of a Creed (Apostles', Nicene, the Psalm Quincunx Vult), the formation of a worship,—divinely indicated,—with rites and ceremonies and a ritual which shall offer to the king the renewed homage of his subjects, and also serve as an instruction and a teaching, and a public confession of this Faith in ways that shall attract all men. For as these rites, this Creed, and these documents, each, rightly used, shall train men, they mould their lives into a heavenly type, and so lift them up above other men, therefore the lives of the citizens of this kingdom should show the truth and sanctifying power of its laws, and the glorious love and mercy of its King. But the very fact of such a deposit made in a state so founded, and having its increase by a spiritual birth and given such a polity, determines for it another characteristic. It must be aggressive, for it is missionary, and this aggressiveness flows from the purest source—love. Its Founder was aggressive from utter love. The HOLY SPIRIT abiding in it is an aggressive love, and it is the sole and magnificent peculiarity of the Church to be aggressive, to seek to gather all in its fold through love.

Again, the extension throughout all races and in all states leads to another peculiarity in its Divine constitution. Intrusted with a positive Faith, having a special law, governed by a mode which possesses the greatest flexibility and power of adaptation, having a universally accepted Creed and broad foundations of a common ritual, it has points of unity and community among all these, and it is joined together by many bands and sinews to its, for the present, unseen Head. The Church as a state within other states is peculiarly placed. It has to protest boldly against sin. It has to be aggressive. These are points of moral antagonism. If, then, these widely spread parts of the Church were to be gathered as one body under a visible head, the friction, to call it by no stronger name, thus created would be a hindrance almost fatal to the discharge of its true functions. The fear of this, when as yet it could not possibly exist, led heathen emperors upon political principles of mistaken self-defense to persecute it, a danger that threatened its existence, but was divinely turned into a means of strength and of greater growth. When such an organization was effected contrary to all the traditions of its Divine founding, it has awakened the jealousy and antagonism of the several secular kingdoms, and has in itself led to assertions of the faith unwarranted, unfounded, and, were they logically carried out, subversive of its existence. This, then, leads us to the second and equally correct use of the title Church used with reference to the Church in each secular state. (B) To appoint a single visible Head when its Founder appointed none, and left no provision in its constitution for such Headship, is then opposed to and wellnigh fatal to the lofty ends for which the Church is established. But, on the contrary, in the Apostolic College together, He established this Headship; to them all in common He gave his own Apostolate (St. John xx. 21) in full. They were to be, as they yet are, in a common bond, yet as sufficiently independent to care for the necessarily separate interests of the Church in each nationality. They were to have the power of holding counsel. Nor yet was the Church solely vested in them, but also the people were to be an integral part of it. The interdependence of the several parts of the Church by their nationalities was secured through the Apostolate; the independence of the several nationalities was secured through their race or tribal peculiarities and customs,—non-essential in themselves, but the outgrowth of their mental dispositions, and of their forms of life and of government, and therefore antagonistic and creating jealousies and bickerings, were they to clash through the too close proximity of their diverse interests. So there was at the first the greatest freedom of play allowed the several portions of the Church in their own regions. Every portion was allowed to have its own modes of acting and of legislating within the great lines of a common Faith. Causes arose which providentially drew the different parts of the Church together, when it became so widely spread as to appear in danger of falling apart by its mere extent. Heresies occasioned Councils, and Councils bound the Churches together in the defense of a common Faith and in the unity of a common worship. So that it was not, it is not now, permitted us to admit a visible Head, but a visible common executive office. A bond of unity in the common Faith, common Law, which results from the needs of the time, a common worship of our one LORD. It also follows that as it exists whole and complete in each and every part, that the Episcopate held in common is equally present in each one of its members, that the Faith is complete in the Creed and the Scriptures, and the Law of government and identity of policy, both of aggression and conservation, and unity of worship, are complete in each part of the Church. So it is not arrogance, not presumption for any part of the Church to say that it is the Church as regards the nation to which it is established, and that it must be so as regards the necessity for each man to be within its pale, and the responsibility of the Church to gather into its pale all who are yet without. It follows that missionaries from one nation to another not having the Faith, when they have established the Church and given to it what instrumentalities and officers the Head of the Church has left, have thereby effected an extension of the old historic Church, and it must become national and independent, yet in closest union of all the common traditions which belong to that Church. This was precisely the principle of the national Church of America at the close of the Revolution, when, by 1789 A.D., it had received the Episcopate from the English line. Whatever the English Church had of the common Catholic Faith and use became ours as heirs taking from a common estate under a common will which had made provision for our inheriting. "Go ye into all the world." "Make disciples of all the nations." Therefore we, though but a century old, justly claim from our Founder a historic continuity in the EPISCOPATE, in the DEPOSIT of the Scriptures, in the COMMON CREDS, in the broad unity of the LITURGIES, in the government under the CANON LAW of the universal Church. We hold these by the right of a common heritage. If it be the duty of the One, Holy, Catholic, and Apostolic Church to make disciples of all nations, that portion of it becomes the national Church in that country which it enters under this historic law of independence.

The topic broadens at every step, and we must stop here, for much which could be properly said here will be found under other headings,—EPISCOPACY, BISHOP, APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION, APOSTLE, BRITISH and ANGLICAN Churches. To these the reader must go for further information. But we cannot close without repeating that CHRIST'S Church is founded upon Himself by Himself, in His Resurrection, officered by His appointment, equipped by His gifts, sent by

His mission, and having His own continual presence and the abiding indwelling of the HOLY GHOST, that He might present it to Himself a glorious Church, not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing, but that it should be holy and without blemish; and in it He cherishes each of us. "For we are members of His body, of His flesh, of His bones."

Church Congress. The Church Congress in the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States is a voluntary organization, in its membership co-extensive with the communion of that Church. In the main features of its purpose and plan similar to the kindred institution in the Church of England, its history also, although measured by fewer years than that of the former, like that has been one of half-doubtful experiment, eventually illustrated and vindicated by signal success. Originating in a small conference of clergy and laity, held in Trinity Church, New Haven, some ten years since, it took permanent form and title at a succeeding meeting, held in the parish of Christ Church, "Riverdale," New York City. At the latter meeting permanent officers were elected, as also the members of the General and Executive Committees. Sub-committees also were appointed, for the selection of topics, writers, and speakers for the first annual session, to be held in Association Hall, New York. On that occasion, in October, 1875 A.D., memorable for the Churchly order of its proceedings, the scholarly and eloquent character of the papers and addresses, and, as at all succeeding sessions, the thoroughly catholic comprehensiveness of opinion and representation at the several discussions, it wrought conviction, even in the minds of its earlier opponents, of the rightfulness, the wisdom, and expediency of such a deliberative organization within the Church in the United States.

Inclusive of the first meeting in New York, and excepting, as is now the rule of the Congress, the years in which a General Convention is held, eight sessions of the Congress, each occupying four or more days, have been held. Two of these have been in New York, and others in Philadelphia, Boston, Cincinnati, Albany, Providence, and Richmond. The opening service is uniformly that of Holy Communion, with an address by some one of the Bishops. On the same day, and at the place appointed for the discussion of topics, the Bishop of the Diocese has, with one exception, delivered the inaugural address. This has been followed by a service, memorial of deceased officials, with an address by the General Secretary.

The presiding officer at any meeting is the Bishop of the Diocese in which any Congress is held. The permanent officers are all the Bishops, thirteen of other clergy and of the laity, thirty-one as Vice-Presidents, together with a General Committee of forty, and an Executive Committee of twenty, clerical members. This latter, for convenience, is in the main composed of gentlemen residing in the city of New York, and holds its meetings semi-monthly during the greater part of the year. Vice-Presidents and members of the General Committee are, to a considerable extent, representatives of the different Dioceses throughout the country. Two Honorary Vice-Presidents, by election, are the Very Rev. Canon E. H. Plumptre, D.D., and the Rev. Archdeacon Emery, both of the English Church, and the latter one of the founders, and the present Honorary Secretary of the English Congress. The General Secretary, Rev. Geo. D. Wildes, D.D., of New York, is assisted by four clerical Secretaries, one of whom is the Secretary of the Executive Committee. A permanent Treasurer, whose office, with that of the Congress, is at 2 Bible House, completes the list of officials.

The annual meetings extend over four days, with three daily sessions, and a distinct topic, selected by the Executive Committee. Usually two writers, three appointed speakers, and such volunteers as may present cards, occupy the time of the session. All these are limited as to length; the rule is in every instance unvaried, and the expiration of the limit is signified by the bell of the Secretary. By the rules none but members of the Protestant Episcopal Church, or of Churches in communion with the same, can address the Congress, and no person is permitted to speak twice upon the same subject. All questions of order are in the discretion of the Chairman, and his decision is final. Persons offering themselves as volunteer speakers are required to send their cards to the General Secretary, and are called upon in the order in which these are received. The Chairman only is to be addressed in speaking, and no question arising out of any paper or subject can be put to vote. The rules, so fitted for public deliberation, and realized as admirable in their working, embrace also some minor specialties, completing a system of order unexceptionable in the regulation of debate.

The several daily sessions are opened with Collects and the singing of a hymn. Three of the latter are used on every occasion. Printed, as are the hymns, on programmes, with the Collects also, the large audiences, filling the music-halls or opera-houses in the various cities, have been enabled to join in response and singing with a grandeur of effect seldom realized in any other assembly of Church people.

A Local Committee appointed by the Bishop and others in the Diocese in which any Congress convenes, initiates and takes charge of the immediate local arrangements through sub-committees. The hospitalities of Church and other Christian people have been uniformly abounding and cheerfully dispensed. Not the least worthy among noticeable things is the fact that families connected with other Christian bodies have, as in England, extended generous welcomes to their homes to large numbers of attendants at the various meetings.

The Church Congress in the United States, while thus manifesting its thorough loyalty to the Church in her seemly order and rightful authority, is also a voluntary association for the free discussion of great questions pertaining to both Church and State. It lays no claim to official authority or responsibility. It takes no votes, it passes no resolutions, it seeks no influence in legislation. Represented in its membership, its debates, and its working forces by a large proportion of distinguished and influential laymen, it thus becomes representative also of the whole Church. A chief feature in its aim, and a foremost and healthful characteristic of its history, has been illustrated in bringing together men of diverse and opposing schools of thought within the bounds of the Church. Such have found themselves drawn nearer together by the close contact of the Congress platform, and, as a distinguished Bishop has well said, "The discussions, instead of widening the breach between brethren, have tended to narrow it."

The proceedings, papers, addresses, and speeches of the several sessions are embodied in annual reports, under the editorship of the General Secretary. These form a thesaurus of ripe learning, vigorous thought, and eloquent utterance upon great questions of the times, of which the Protestant Episcopal Church may well be proud. To the student in theology and its cognate topics, no less than to the clergyman and thoughtful layman, these volumes will be found most valuable.

The Ninth Church Congress is to be held in October, 1884 A.D. in Detroit, Michigan, under the Presidency of the Bishop of Michigan, the Rt. Rev. S. S. Harris, D.D., L.L.D.

REV. GEORGE D. WILDES, D.D.

Churching Office. (The thanksgiving of women after childbirth, commonly called the Churching of Women.) A deep sense of the protection of Providence in her great peril has always filled the hearts of devout mothers. While this office, then, may be founded upon the Jewish law, and continued in imitation of the purification of the Holy Virgin Mary, yet it really lies farther back, in the thankfulness of deliverance from danger. The service as it stands in our Prayer-Book is somewhat changed, but in no material point, from the English office. The Kyries are omitted, and only one Psalm (cxvi.) in place of two (the cxvii. also) in the English book. The "decently appareled," meant coming in with a veil of white material, but this is disused. The convenient place, or as the ordinary shall direct, is all that is left of the early office, before the church door. Bishop Andrews directed before the choir, Bishop Wren at the chancel rails. There is less change from the old Salisbury use than in many other services.

There should always be an offering made, whether the prayer alone is used in behalf of the woman at the place of the thanksgivings, or whether this office is used.

Circumcision. The Jewish Covenant rite of cutting off the foreskin of the male child upon the eighth day, when also the child received its name (Gen. xvii. 23; xxi. 4; Ex. xii. 48; Lev. xii. 3; Josh. v. 2).

Circumcision, Feast of. The day was kept as the octave of the Nativity at first. Of the feast of the circumcision there is early observance, but after the seventh century there appear distinct directions for it. As it fell upon the 1st of January, which was a festival of mad riot among the heathen, it was natural that it should not be kept as a feast among Christians when the excesses of the heathen were so uncontrolled. There should be a celebration of the Holy Communion upon this feast, as upon all days when any part of our LORD's life and actions are commemorated.

Circumincession. The indwelling of the Three Divine Persons of the HOLY TRINITY in each other. It is expressly taught (St. John xiv. 10-11), "Believest thou not that I am in the FATHER and the FATHER in me? . . . but the FATHER that dwelleth in me. He doeth the works. Believe me that I am in the FATHER, and the FATHER in me." So in xvii. 11, 21-23, and often implied, as in i. 1; Col. ii. 9. For in Him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily. But it is a reasonable sequence from the mysterious doctrine of the HOLY TRINITY. For though the Three Persons are distinct and separate, they are One in the Divine Nature, and the Divine Nature is entire in each Person, yet there is but one GOD; which necessarily follows from the immutability and indivisibility of the Godhead. Yet the distinction of Persons is shown by it, while the deep mystery of the Divine Unity is kept, for, saith Bishop Bull, "in order to that mutual existence (in each other) which is discerned in the FATHER, SON, and HOLY GHOST, it is absolutely necessary that there should be some distinction between those who are thus joined together,—i.e., that those who mutually exist in each other should be different in reality and not in mode of conception only, for that which is simply one is not said to exist in itself or to interpenetrate itself. . . . No similitude can be devised which shall be in every respect apt to illustrate it; no language avails worthily to set it forth, seeing that it is a union which far transcends all other unions." (Bull's Defense of the Nicene Creed, L. iv. ch. iv. § 13, 14.)

Citation. A precept or a summons from the proper officer or Ecclesiastical judge, citing the person against whom complaint is made to appear before him on a certain day at a certain place to answer to the complaints made against him.

Clergy. (Clergy, from kleros, a lot, as men having chosen GOD for their heritage.)

They were also called Canonici, from being under a rule or a canon. The name was made to include readers, acolytes, subdeacons. The title, however, properly belongs only to the three orders, the Bishops, Priests, and Deacons. In the Scriptures St. Paul, in the Epistle to the Hebrews, implies theirs to be an office of authority; so in his Epistles to Timothy and Titus. And again, St. Peter (1 Pet. v. 3) warns the clergy against a vainglorious use of their office. This rank comes out clearly immediately after Apostolic times. In the Epistles of St. Ignatius, "without these (the Bishops, Presbyters, and Deacons) it cannot be called a Church" (to the Trallians, c. ix.), and Clement of Alexandria (Stro., l. vi. c. v. in fin.). "For I suppose that the developments in the Church of the Bishops, Priests, and Deacons are imitated from the angelic glory, and of that economy which the Scriptures declare belong to those who live in the footsteps of the Apostles, in perfection of righteousness according to the Gospel." The appointment of Timothy and Titus over the Churches of Ephesus and of Crete to order and ordain, is an early proof of the development of Episcopal order in the footsteps of the Apostles. For if the Presbyters thus were competent to arrange these things and to perpetuate their order by ordination, why give Timothy and Titus such special instructions? why send them at all?" (But vide articles BISHOP, PRESBYTER, DEACON, ORDINATION.) The clergy were from the Apostolic times regarded as a separate order, with special responsibilities and special immunities. In the Acts of the Apostles (xv. 23), "The Apostles and Elders-brethren," seems to be the soundest form of the words, segregating them from the laity. The Bishop exercised the highest administrative and spiritual office, held in himself all the minor offices, and was (Rev. ii., iii.) held personally responsible for the growth, purity, discipline and orthodoxy of the Church committed to him. Certain of his prerogatives he reserved to himself, chief of which were the ordination of fit persons to the Diaconate and to the Presbyterate; and the admission by consecration of the elect to the office, to his own Episcopal rank; confirmation, excommunication. As administrator of jurisdiction he gave letters dimissory to Presbyters going to other Dioceses, administered the revenues, enforced the discipline of the Canons upon his clergy and laity, and was the officer with whom lay the last appeal in all Ecclesiastical cases in his Diocese; but if he were too arbitrary other Bishops could interfere. He sat as presiding officer in his Diocesan Synod, and had his place according to the precedence of his See (usually according to its political importance) in the Provincial Synod.

The Presbyter shared with the Bishop, or had committed to him, the right to celebrate the Eucharist, to administer baptism, to give the benediction and the absolution, to consecrate churches, and, in case of great need, to reconcile penitents. He was also Counselor to his Bishop upon all Diocesan matters.

The Deacon had the collection and dispensing of the moneys of the Diocese; he could baptize, assist in divine service, administer the cup at the Communion, could preach and aid in parochial work; but of these offices, baptizing and preaching were exercised when neither Bishop nor Presbyter were present. The clergy were supported at first, and for many centuries, from the common fund of the Diocese, which was divided usually every month. This common fund came from tithes and gifts, bequests and endowments, which were often made; the Bishop or Presbyter, if rich, often giving all of his property into the common treasury, as did Cyprian and many others.

The clergy had many immunities. Before the Empire was Christianized their immunities were only within the Church. They were supported by the Church, and were forbidden any secular employment. They received the respect and honor due to their office. After the Empire became Christian the civil law gave the Bishops certain prerogatives, as a share in municipal affairs and a power to pardon criminals, and also gave donations and revenues from the public treasury for the building of churches and the support of charitable work, till finally Bishops had their own Courts, and at last withdrew the inferior clergy from the secular jurisdiction of the courts for crimes or misdemeanors. It was one of the causes of the Reformation to do away with the abuses that flowed from the exemption of the clergy from secular trial for secular causes. The power of the clergy was always very great, as with their monopoly, as it were, of the learning of the Middle Ages, and with their authority under the laws, civil and feudal, the churches and religious houses were the seats both of learning and of asylum.

To-day, with the impressions that Independentism has made upon the minds of the majority of people, there is less than proper regard paid to the office of the clergy. While the cleric must, so far as his personal ability and character reach, only receive the consideration due him from them, yet his office and his teaching in that office need to be more reverentially received than they are. Surely something of the force of our LORD's solemn words still rests upon His officers: "He that heareth you heareth Me, and he that despiseth you despiseth Me, and he that despiseth Me despiseth Him that sent Me."

Clerk. (From clercius, a clergyman.) It is sometimes used to designate a clergyman, but has gradually received the meaning of the lay clerk, who, in the English Church, does yet, and many years ago did in the Church in this country, lead the responses and otherwise assist in the due conduct of divine service.

Clinic Baptism. Baptism administered upon a sick-bed, or to one in imminent danger of death. But since it often happened that baptism so administered was given to one who, through fear of persecution, had deferred it, the person so baptized, if he recovered, could not be admitted to any sacred office. It was one of the charges against Novatus that he had deferred baptism till he was perilously sick, and yet on his recovery, being debarred from clerical office, he procured his consecration by deceitful practices.

Cloveshoo. A Council was assembled at Cloveshoo by Ethelbald, king of the Mercians. There is considerable difficulty in determining the date, and more in identifying the place, which is thought to be Rochester or Abingdon, or, perhaps, Tewksbury. The date is given 742 or 747 A.D.; it is possible there may have been two Councils; and if so, the first was chiefly concerned in inquiring how matters of religion, especially the Creed, were ordered in the early Church in Britain, and in confirming the privileges of the Church. In the Council of 747 A.D. two letters were read from Zacharias, "the Pontiff and Apostolic lord to be venerated throughout the world," and it is "acknowledged that the recital of these documents, in which he exhorts the English of every degree to reformation, under the threat of an anathema, was in obedience to his 'Apostolical authority.'" Thirty Canons were passed at this Council, in which clergy and laity are enjoined to more careful living, and greater diligence in public worship and in the observance of holy-days.

Not long after this Council certain Dioceses were taken from the Province of Canterbury and joined together into a new Province for an Archbishop of Lichfield. But Kenulf having annexed Kent to the kingdom of Mercia, and wishing to conciliate the clergy of his new territory, seconded Athelhard, the Archbishop of Canterbury, in his wish to recover these Dioceses to his Province. The matter was pressed at Rome, and Leo III., on attaining the popedom, gave his consent that the new archbishopric should be abolished. This was done accordingly by a Council held at Cloveshoo in 803 A.D., which decreed "that the Archiepiscopal See, from this time forward, should never be in the monastery of Lichfield, nor in any other place but the city of Canterbury." Two other Councils were held in Cloveshoo in 822 and 824 A.D.

Coadjutor. He was a Bishop ordained to assist another Bishop in case of infirmity or old age, was to assist him as long as he lived, and to succeed him when he died. In our Church he bears the title of Assistant Bishop.

Cœna Domini. The Supper of the LORD,—i.e., the Holy Communion.

Collect. Collects are short, comprehensive prayers, which are found in all known Liturgies and public devotional offices. There is no certain explanation to be given of the origin of the word, only that it is very ancient, as is the Collect itself.

(a) The oldest Liturgies contain prayers upon this model, but in the Greek Liturgies it is called the Ectene—intense prayer—or the Exapostellaria. The latter being originally a kind of precatory hymn invoking the grace of GOD, which is a characteristic of the Collect. The oldest collections of offices contain numerous short prayers. These sacramentaries of Leo I., Gelasius, and Gregory I. contain the originals of the major part of our present Collects, with some notable exceptions. As for the model on which they are framed, we may compare them with the two short prayers recorded in the Acts (i. 24, 25; iv. 24 sq.), to which they bear much resemblance, but they may be compared at an humble distance with the compactness and terseness of the LORD's Prayer. There is so definite and concise a structure in the Collect that it may be reduced as it were to rule. The Collect is said to contain,—

First, a single period; forming a single intense sentence.

Secondly, only a single petition is offered in it.

Thirdly, our LORD's mediation or atonement is pleaded; or, it closes with an ascription of praise to GOD.

These mark its difference from the long rhetorical prayers with which the Eastern Liturgies are filled, and their intensity and terse pointedness make them very marked. They are the arrows of prayer which Tertullian says Christians shot towards heaven.

The structure of the Collect may be seen by studying the similar points of two beautiful ones composed—the first by St. Gregory, about 600 A.D., and the other by Bishop Cosin, 1660 A.D.—a thousand years apart,—the Collect for Whitsunday by St. Gregory, and the Collect for the sixth Sunday after Epiphany by Bishop Cosin. They are both noble prayers, worthy of the holy men who composed them.

Invocation.

Reason on which the petition is founded.

Petition.

Benefit.

GOD,

who as at this time didst teach the hearts of Thy faithful people by sending to them the light of Thy HOLY SPIRIT, grant us by the same SPIRIT to have a right judgment in all things, and ever more to rejoice in His holy comfort, whose blessed Son was manifested that He might destroy the works of the devil and make us the Sons of God and heirs of eternal life, grant us, we beseech Thee, that having this hope we may purify ourselves even as He is pure, that when He shall appear again with power and great glory, we may be made like Him in His eternal and glorious kingdom,

O GOD,

Ascription or merits pleaded.	through the merits of CHRIST JESUS our SAVIOUR, who liveth and reigneth with Thee in the Unity of the same SPIRIT, one God, world without end.	where with Thee, O FATHER, and Thee, O HOLY GHOST, He liveth and reigneth, ever one God, world without end.

(b) The title Collect does not belong only to the proper Collect for the Sunday or holy-day, but is also given to the two prayers immediately after the Creed in morning and evening prayer, to the five at the end of the Communion office, and also to the special prayers in the several offices in the Prayer-Book as may be rubrically noted therein. There are one hundred and eleven Collects in our Prayer-Book. Eighty-five belong to special Sundays and holy-days, with Epistle and Gospel, and therefore imply a Communion. Seven others, for occasional services, have also Epistle and Gospel for the same end. The remaining nineteen belong to special services, but without any Epistle or Gospel following.

College. (From the Latin collegium, a community.) It was an old Roman rule that not fewer than three persons could form a college. Hence it needs at least three Bishops to form a house competent to transact business and to administer affairs. Corporations are in England often called colleges. The House of Bishops is also the College of Bishops.

Color. Colors were not used in the Church at first with any but the most general reference to their symbolism. The reference to the spiritual meaning attached to the several hues in common use was of the most general way. The modern use seems to date from the time when vestments and altar-cloths and Ecclesiastical decoration received a remarkable development, 850-1300 A.D. It was also the date of the greatest development of Church architecture. In the Mosaic ritual God directed the use of color: The blue and the white, the purple and the scarlet, of the Tabernacle hangings, and of the veil of the Most Holy Place; the gold, the blue, the purple, scarlet, and white of the Ephod; the gold chains, the many-hued breastplate, the mitre of blue, the curious girdle of the dress of the High Priest; the white robes of the ministering Priests. Occasional allusions to the purity of white (Ps. cxxxii.) and the symbolic hues in Ezekiel's vision (Ezek. i.) occur. But there and in the New Testament there is little allusion to symbolism of color, except in the Revelation (ch. iv. 3-5; xxi. 19-22). Color was used as a matter of course, but there was apparently no figurative, but only a decorative use of it at the different seasons of the Church's year. Of course vestments were of some color, but apparently of white, seldom of any other hue. But from the ninth to the thirteenth century there was a development of the meaning to be assigned to colors. Throughout Europe there was a great variety of usages, some of which may be preserved in the Sarum use. However, there is no law or authoritative rule upon the use of colors in the Church of the Anglican communion. The inventories of Edward VI.'s Commission show a variety of usages in the colors of the vestments and in the altar-cloths. The Sarum use had probably a larger influence than any other in England, but its rubrics were not rigidly enforced. So we may suppose that in reality the earlier English Church practically continued the earliest prominent use of white, at least in her vestments. After the Reformation white was ordered for the vestments of the Holy Communion. The Bishops wore a white rochet and a scarlet chimere. But as good old Bishop Hooper thought scarlet too gay a color for a Bishop,—probably connecting it with the scarlet woman of Revelation,—black was afterwards substituted. The stoles are usually of black. The old Sarum colors, which prevailed in the English Church till the Reformation, and were in use in very many places after till 1640 A.D., were as follows:

From Christmas to Septuagesima, for Sundays, white.

From Septuagesima to Easter-eve, for Sundays, red.*

From Easter to Whit-Sunday, for Sundays, white.

From Whit-Sunday to Christmas, for Sundays, red.

All-Saints' days not martyrs, and festivals of our LORD, white.

Martyrs, Invention of the Cross, etc., red.

Black was not used, at least by order, except in services for the dead. White and red are the only colors spoken of in the rubric of the Sarum missal. The inventories of the vestments in the return made in 1549 A.D., give blue as the color next frequently used, but green and yellow are also found. The colors for the altar-cloths very probably followed the sequence of the colors of the vestments ordered for the seasons. That some series of colors appropriate to, and symbolic of, each season of the Christian year should be used is reasonable enough. It is used with much variation, indeed, everywhere in other parts of the Church, and such a usage is not contrary to, or interfered with by, any rubric or order in the Prayer-Book. The white linen for the vesting of the Holy Table for the Holy Communion is the proper and rubrical color at the celebration of that sacrament. Whether Sarum or Rome, or the Eastern use, or the caprice or taste of influential individuals be the rule followed, as taste develops and more surely as reverence for God's house, and care for its decent order and the honor to be paid Him in it, deepens, there must be a desire to use all proper and fit symbolism. As God Himself has indicated the law of its uses, we can safely follow its suggestions, under our constituted authorities. It has already found expression in the generally correct, though wholly unauthoritative, directions found in many of the Church almanacs. It is a feeling which should be guided and trained rather than discouraged or repressed, or it may fall under the direction of some undisciplined taste or aimless caprice, or ignorant wilfulness. Either of these tempers lead to disorder, and might possibly lead to disobedience to lawful authority.

Appended is a part of the temperate statements made in Scudamore's "Notitia Eucharistica":

"The English colors appear to have been as follows:

"White, daily from the eve of the Nativity to the octave of the Epiphany inclusive, except when another color is especially appointed, as below; also daily from Evensong to the Friday before Whitsuntide inclusive; on Trinity Sunday and its Eve; the conversion of St. Paul, the Purification of St. Mary; the Annunciation, St. John Baptist, St. Michael, and all Saints, with their Eves; and the colors retained when they fall on a Sunday.

"Red, on all Sundays except those for which white is ordered, as above; on Ash-Wednesday, Maundy-Thursaday, Good-Friday, Holy Saturday, till Evensong, all Whits week, with the Saturday before; the Festivals of Martyrs, whose death is commemorated unless falling between Easter and Pentecost.

"Orange tawney (croceus) was prescribed for the Festivals of all Confessors.

"Green, or blue, on week-days from the octave of the Epiphany to Septuagesima Sunday; from Trinity Sunday to Advent, except on Festivals, their Eves and Vigils.

"Violet, brown, or gray, on week-days from Septuagesima Sunday to Maundy-Thursaday, and throughout Advent, except on Festivals and their Eves; also on the Ember-days and the Vigils of the Purification, the Annunciation, the Ascension, and the fasted Vigils of Saints' days." (Scudamore's Notitia Eucharistica, p. 108 sq. q.v.)

It is said that cloth of gold supersedes all other colors.

Colorado, The Missionary Jurisdiction of. Colorado, Wyoming, and New Mexico were part of the jurisdiction of the Northwest under Bishop Talbot, 1859-65 A.D. Bishop Randall was elected for these Territories in October, 1865 A.D. The name of Colorado was, popularly, Pike's Peak. Settlements began in 1859 A.D. Wyoming was not known under that name till after Bishop Randall took charge. These three Territories formed one jurisdiction during Bishop Randall's eight years' Episcopate. The following year, October, 1874 A.D., New Mexico and Arizona were made a separate missionary district, the Bishop of Colorado continuing to have jurisdiction in Wyoming. During Bishop Talbot's six years' charge of the Northwest the Church was established in Denver, 1860 A.D., Rev. J. H. Kehler, rector; in Central City, 1864 A.D., Rev. Francis Granger, rector; and in Idaho Springs, 1864 A.D., Rev. William O. Jarvis, missionary. The two former parishes had secured church buildings. Of course other points were visited by the Bishop and his clergy.

Bishop Randall began his work (consecrated December 28, 1865 A.D.) with characteristic energy in the spring of 1866 A.D. With an increase of missionaries he pushed on the work of the Church at new points,—Nevadaville, Black Hawk, Georgetown, Pueblo, etc. In 1867 A.D. he took steps looking to the establishment of a school for girls. In 1868 A.D. he began like efforts for a boys' school. The former was built in Denver in 1868 A.D. The latter at Golden in 1869 A.D. In 1870 A.D. he built, in connection with the boys' school, a school of mines, the Territory contributing most of the cost of its erection, afterwards deeded back to the Territory, and now one of the best of the State institutions. In 1871 A.D. he secured the means, $10,000, from Nathan Matthews, Esq., for the erection of Matthews Hall for a divinity school at Golden. The girls' and the boys' schools were named respectively for Mr. John D. Wolfe and Mr. Geo. A. Jarvis, who largely aided in their foundation. In 1873 A.D. a wing was added to Wolfe Hall, and an Episcopal residence erected in Denver. Bishop Randall, during his active Episcopate, increased the number of parishes and missions to nineteen or twenty, and erected twelve churches. Besides these he bought and converted into chapels two or three saloons or "stores," for temporary use, in places that subsequently became depopulated. In 1881 A.D. work was begun on behalf of the Christian education of the Shoshone Indians in Wyoming, and a teacher, a layman, was employed. He had resigned, however, before the Bishop's death, on September 28, 1873 A.D., and the work was temporarily suspended.

Bishop Spalding (consecrated December 31, 1873 A.D.) entered upon the work in February following. Some of the clergy had left or had abandoned their posts; there were seven at work. Matthews Hall had seven divinity students under a competent instructor, with nothing to support them. Debts to a considerable amount had accrued against the school, and the income from pupils was greatly deficient. The financial panic beginning in the fall of 1873 A.D. was severely felt here from 1874 to 1878 A.D. It was with no little difficulty and not without the generous aid of friends of missions that all indebtedness was met and the schools put upon a better basis. Wolfe Hall from 1876 to 1882 A.D. was more than self-supporting. By liberal aid from Miss Wolfe and others, and the earnings of the school, enlargements were made in 1878-80 A.D., costing $18,000. Jarvis Hall and Matthews Hall were both destroyed by fire in May, 1878 A.D. The insurance, $8903.72 on Jarvis Hall, $6430.51 on Matthews Hall, and $989.34 on the library, was all that was left us. The site was abandoned and reverted to the donor under the terms of the deed.

These schools were the next year removed to Denver. Jarvis Hall rebuilt here has had much better success. It is under the most effective organization and discipline under the wardenship of Dean Hart of the Cathedral, assisted by five masters. Its specialty is the fitting of boys for the best colleges. The girls' school is one of the best in the country; the principal, Miss F. M. Buchan, is assisted by a corps of ten teachers. The studies embrace all those usual in such seminaries, music and art being specialties. Both schools greatly need better and ampler buildings, and libraries and apparatus for scientific studies.

When the present Bishop took charge the work was confined to the two principal towns in Wyoming, Cheyenne and Laramie City, and to the eight or nine principal places east of the main range of the Rocky Mountains. For four or five years, during the "hard times," the growth of population though steady was not rapid. The Church was making real progress, though the first object was to strengthen the foundations already laid, and to set in order the things that were wanting. A memorial church to Bishop Randall, Trinity, was built in Denver, 1874 A.D., churches in West Denver, Greeley, Cañon City, Boulder, Rosita, were erected, and the churches at Colorado Springs and Central City were completed. All inhabited parts of the jurisdiction were often visited and missions established wherever practicable. In 1878 A.D., with the discovery of the silver mines of Leadville and the impetus given to railway building, a new era of temporal prosperity was dawning. The church built in that city cost $15,000, on which a debt remained of $3000. The Church has been planted in Ouray, La Plata, San Juan, Rio Grande, Conejos, Custer, Saguache, Gunnison, and other counties, and strengthened in Pueblo, El Paso, Boulder, Wild, and Arapahoe Counties in the more eastern parts of the State. Seven parishes are self-sustaining. In Wyoming three new missions are well established on the Union Pacific Railroad, and at Lander, in Sweetwater County, while the parishes of Cheyenne and Laramie City are self-supporting. The Indian Mission at the Shoshone and northern Arapahoe Agency is under the charge of an able missionary, who is about to build a chapel. The government is building a school costing $12,000. Three more churches are to be built in Wyoming and several in Colorado, if the means can be secured, in 1884 A.D.

The Cathedral was begun in Denver in 1880 A.D., and ready for use in November, 1881 A.D. It will seat 1200. Its cost was $90,000, some $25,000 of which came from the sale of lots owned by the congregation. The Bishop secured and gave the site, its value at the time being $12,000. The corporation, which is the board of trustees of the schools and mission and most parish and other property, the title of which is "The Bishop and Chapter of the Cathedral of St. John the Evangelist, Denver, Colorado," was organized as early as 1879 A.D. The Cathedral organization is practical and effective.

In February, 1879 A.D., St. Luke's Hospital, Denver, Colorado, was organized. A suitable block of four acres, with a large frame building originally used as a hotel, was purchased and put in order, with accommodations for thirty-five to forty patients. The property is valued at $12,000, and the debt thereon is $4000. The hospital is under strictly Church management, and its benefits are extended to all without regard to sect or religion. It has treated over seven hundred patients and is under excellent management. It will long need aid in its charitable work. It has strong claims on Eastern communities, whence many of its patients come.

Bishop Spalding has been in charge of the jurisdiction ten years. The gains are as follows:

The population of Colorado and Wyoming in 1870 A.D. was 50,000, in 1880 A.D. 214,000. The per cent. of increase was 328. It was hardly to be expected that in so new and rapidly growing a frontier country we could keep pace with the secular growth. In some respects we have fallen short. In other important respects our statistics show a greater proportionate growth of the Church than of the Territories.

In 1873 A.D. the number of Church families reported was 360. In 1883 A.D. it was 1921; increase, 433 per cent. The number of souls for whom the clergy were caring was, at the respective dates, 620 and 13,141; increase, 2019 per cent. The infants baptized were, in 1873 A.D. 117; in 1883 A.D. 390; increase 233 per cent. Of adults in the years respectively, 17 and 61; increase 258 per cent. In 1873 A.D. there were confirmed 48; in 1883 A.D. 127. Since June 1, 20 more have been confirmed, making the number for the last year 147; but these are not counted, not being yet reported. Without these the increase is 164 per cent. In the ten years previous to 1874 A.D. 466 were confirmed. From then to June 1, 1883 A.D., 1081; increase, 131 per cent. The gain in the number of communicants is also especially gratifying. There were reported, in 1873 A.D. 550; in 1883 A.D. 2112; an increase of 284 per cent. So of Sunday-school teachers and scholars; in 1873 A.D. the report gave 658; in 1883 A.D. 2082; a gain of 216 per cent.

The ordinations to the priesthood and diaconate number 32. There had been previously ordained in and for Colorado 13; an increase of 146 per cent. There were here 12 churches; the report now shows 32; increase, 166 per cent. Three of those built before 1874 A.D. are unused; not one built since is unserviceable. The usual proportion—not greater than in Eastern dioceses—will, in time, from decay of towns and changes of population, become useless. There were, ten years ago, 2 rectories, omitting 1 that was subsequently alienated and lost by the vestry; there are now 16; a gain of 700 per cent. The number of sittings in the churches at the former date was 1600; at the latter date, 8281; an increase of 417 per cent. There were 7 clergymen at work in the jurisdiction. There were two or three others not belonging here or not employed. The report now shows 28; a gain of 300 per cent. The number of parishes and missions was 19. It are now 53; per cent. of increase, 179. There were 2 self-supporting. There are now 9; increase, 250 per cent. The offerings for all purposes of the jurisdiction have increased in much greater proportion. They were, 1873 A.D. $5086; in 1883 A.D. $52,509; a gain of 932 per cent. The value of churches and rectories was, at the first date, $26,300; at the present, $249,350; increase, 848 per cent. The Episcopal residence was worth $9000. Its value now is $25,000; increase, 177 per cent. Wolfe Hall (building, grounds, and furniture) was valued at $30,000. Its value now is $80,000; an increase of 166 per cent. Jarvis Hall had cost, with its furniture and apparatus, $13,781. Notwithstanding the disastrous fire, which left only the insurance of $8903.72, the value of its present lands and buildings is $50,000; an increase of 310 per cent. Matthews Hall, at Golden, cost $10,000. Matthews Hall, in Denver, is worth $15,000; increase, 50 per cent. Jarvis Hall endowment for theological education was estimated, in 1874, at $12,000. Nine years later its value is $75,000; an increase of 477 per cent. The increase in value of all our school property is from $73,000 to $220,000,—201 per cent.

Such have been some of our gains. It is a fair showing. It gives good grounds for encouragement and confidence as to future growth and prosperity. There is much that cannot be gathered from statistics. The great results for which we should be, above all things, solicitous, the coming of CHRIST's spiritual kingdom, the souls gathered in and saved in CHRIST and built up in Him and edified, the fulfilling of the number of His elect,—no figures can tabulate these more substantial gains.

Very little special aid has been received during the last three years from individuals or parishes at the East. And yet the missionary ground now open to us and inviting us is four times as large as it was ten years ago. To keep our present missionaries will require $1000 more than the Board of Missions appropriates, and with several mission chapels to build at once, and many in the near future, there are no funds available but such as may be secured by solicitations. Mistake is made in withholding assistance that may, unless corrected, be fatal to our continuing to lead in pioneer work as in the past—to our becoming strong as heretofore, relatively to all other Christian bodies, in the vast wildernesses that are yet to be evangelized within the limits of the two jurisdictions. We are not receiving more than a fourth part of the amount of aid that is given to each of two or three leading denominations for Colorado and Wyoming. And we are expected to be even more successful than they! Whether our friends who have hitherto helped the work in this portion of the great New West come to see and rectify the mistake or not, it is clearly our interest and our duty to rely more and more for the support of all our work upon the active efforts and generous offerings of our own people. Our strength is in what we do and in what we are.

We cannot expect the same proportionate increases as in the past. There is much in the immediate outlook that is discouraging. The times are again becoming hard. There is no sale for mines. Owners of valuable properties are unable to develop them. We are discovering by sad experience that the work in all our mining districts, and these embrace a large portion of the country, must always be of a missionary character. The population in mining districts is migratory. Miners are hard-working men; dependent for daily bread upon daily wages. The few who acquire wealth move to lower altitudes and to cities that promise greater comforts and advantages. Still we shall have for generations good towns in the mining regions, and it is in these that much of our best work must be done.

The jurisdiction of Wyoming, as separate from Colorado, was established by the House of Bishops in October, 1883 A.D. The Missionary Bishop of Colorado is the Provisional Bishop. But little has been done for Wyoming by the Church at large. It being now the latest formed of the missionary districts, it is to be hoped that its needs will excite new interest. They are chiefly for the building of churches and parsonages and the support of missionaries.

RT. REV. J. F. SPALDING, D.D.

Colossians. This Epistle to the Colossians—one of the three doctrinal Epistles which St. Paul sent out to the Churches from his own hired house in his first imprisonment—forms a strong link in the chain of doctrinal statements he makes concerning the Church as the body of CHRIST, the fullness of Him that filleth all things. It is not merely a restating of what had been eloquently put forth in the Epistles to the Ephesians, but it was something more, or rather different. The dangers of the Church at Colossæ required him to warn them of their being misled and drawn from the unity of the Faith (cf. ch. i. 23, with ii. 8 and 18-23), dangers which have not ceased to assail the members of the Church, to alienate them from their true LORD and Head. In it he uses terms which passed into early Liturgic usage (ch. ii. 13-15 and St James' Liturgy). There is considerable resemblance upon many points in this Epistle compared with the doctrines and the directions upon our social duties which occupy the Epistle to the Ephesians. These are largely repeated in this Epistle; indeed, there are nearly forty places where the two Epistles coincide and mutually illustrate each other; but the Church at Colossæ had many evils of a local character to contend with. Under a pretended philosophy and spiritual wisdom, the heresies of will-worship and of worship of angels, and a pretense to pierce into things hidden, some claimed a false humility and made a show of asceticism. A claim to supernatural powers and to a supernatural knowledge is ever most attractive to many minds, and the Colossian Christians were in great danger of being greatly misled. St. Paul wisely and boldly meets the danger by using the words which might have, and afterwards did, become freighted with false meaning, such as the word "fullness," and by setting forth the true supernatural teaching of CHRIST. He recounts his own former preaching upon the fullness of the reconciliation our LORD has effected. He warns them that these teachers do not hold fast by the "Head from which all the body by joints and bands, having nourishment ministered and knit together, increaseth with the increase of God."

He foresaw so much of the later Gnostic vagaries, and met them by using the word "fullness" (pleroma), and by reciting the heavenly orders and ranks, so anticipating the æons of these Gnostics; the will-worship, the claim to an esoteric knowledge, the vain deceits of later heresies, are all, as it were, provided for by the Apostle's peculiar phraseology.

The Epistle bears every mark of the Apostle's own hand. It is within the broad scope of the Apostle's thoughts and teachings before alluded to and elsewhere implied, but here in the leisure of the prison brought together and set forth with his own peculiar enthusiastic energy. The Apostle, chained to his guards, has lost none of the energy and force which he possessed when free, and he was as fully alive to the needs of the Colossians as though he were present and ministering to them. The practical hortatory portion, which occupies the last two chapters, is Pauline throughout in the clearness, directness, and delicacy with which sin is reproved and love, forbearance, and forgiveness are urged. The salutation and messages are all unmistakably from him who forgot no friend and overlooked no need of the Church to which he was writing.

Comes. An old collection of Epistles and Gospels, which has been ascribed to St. Jerome (380 A.D.), but may be probably later. It contains the Epistles and Gospels very nearly as we now use them, and whenever it disagrees from the Roman rite it agrees with the English use, except when the Reformers (1549-52 A.D.) or devises (1662 A.D.) may have arbitrarily changed. The Comes is mentioned as far back as 471 A.D. Its arrangement corresponds to the Salisbury use so very closely, and differs from the Roman use in so many ways, as to show that it was received and appropriated independently of any Roman influence. Several slight circumstances point to the probability that it belongs to St. Jerome's time at least. Before his time there was no special series of selected Scriptures; after the date above given the Scriptures begin to be cited as though such a lectionary were in use, by St. Ambrose, Augustine, Leo, etc. In the part appropriated to the saints none are commemorated after St. Jerome's day. Therefore it is exceedingly probable that this selection of Epistles and Gospels came to us from the East through the Gallican Church, and may have been in use before the days of Augustine of Canterbury.

Commemorations. (Vide DIFTYCHS.) In England, at Oxford and Cambridge, certain commemoration days are kept, on which the names of all known benefactors to the universities are proclaimed, special psalms and lessons appointed, and special collects and versicles recited. These days were observed before the Reformation.

Commendam. A living given in charge to a clergyman till a proper pastor is appointed. A living is then held in commendam. They are held by Bishops whose incomes are of small amount.

Commendatory Letters are very ancient in use. Such were the letters Apollos brought from Ephesus to the Church in Corinth and Achaia, and such that St. Paul referred to in 2 Cor. iii. 1, as well known and of constant use (cf. 1 Cor. xvi. 3). (For further notices, see LITERÆ FORMATVS.)

Commentaries. Expositions or explanations of Holy Scriptures. It is one of the most difficult tasks ever set before men, since it is so difficult to grasp the whole nexus of revelation, to understand its exceeding breadth and yet its positiveness, to reach up to its strictness and yet its love, its unswerving statements yet its tenderness to all mankind. The task requires a prayerful, submissive mind, and a thoroughly trained logical power, and a full command of all the important learning that can illustrate or explain the Holy Scriptures. It demands that Scripture shall be diligently compared with Scripture and not against Scripture, and that there should be no prepossessions, no theories formed to be narrowly carried out, and above all that the expositor should lay down for himself and strictly adhere to the rule that the Church is the keeper and witness of Holy Writ.

For this purpose much of the ancient commentaries is most useful. St. Chrysostom and Augustine and Jerome form a valued series. Origen has some very valuable expositions, but is not to be trusted. Theophylact has compressed much of St. Chrysostom and added useful comments of his own.

The "Critici Sacri" is the work of Bishop Pearson and other English divines. But it is useless to go on with the list, so many new and valuable commentaries have appeared. Perhaps for general use the Cambridge Bible for the use of schools, published in separate volumes, on each book of the Old and New Testaments, is the best for those who wish for special commentaries upon single books.

Burton's "Plain Commentary" and Isaac Williams's "Devotional Commentary" are beyond praise. The "Speaker's Commentary," and Alford on the New Testament, are excellent. But while admitting the excellence of separate writers, it will be well to take only those who adhere most strictly to what has ever been received in the Church.

Communion Office. An office in the English Prayer-Book appointed for Ash-Wednesday. It is one of the last remnants left of the older penitential offices that carried out the disciplinary system of the early ages. Then offenders were deprived for a given length of time of their rights and privileges in the Church, not only till they proved their repentance but till the set time was expired. The English office has adapted the very old Salisbury service for Ash-Wednesday, prefacing it with an address and a recital of the curses of Mount Ebal, and then with an exhortation uses the older service very nearly as it stood. It was an endeavor to preserve something of the old disciplinary system and to remind men, by its reciting the denouncing of God's anger and judgments against sinners, that justice has not lost its stern vigor. The service was dropped out of our Prayer-Book, but the three last prayers were transferred to their present place after the Ash-Wednesday Collect, and the seven Penitential Psalms (with the oversight of omitting the 51st Psalm) were ordered for the proper Psalms for the day. The oversight occurred by not noting that it was used at length in the Communion, and therefore was not put into the table for proper Psalms for Ash-Wednesday.

Commissary. An officer sent by a Bishop to make inspections of parishes for him and to report thereon.

Common Prayer. In its proper place will be found the history of the Prayer-Book. But here it is well to mark the meaning of the word Common, what belongs to, and is to be used by, also that it may be joined in and understood by the congregation; not only that, but that all have a common share in its petitions, so that none are left out, of all estates and conditions of men, and that there are in it no petitions that any one may refuse to say Amen to, and that there are in it all the parts of worship and praise and confession, as well as of prayer, which all can join in, and in which, as Christians holding a common heritage, all can claim a portion. It is Common in the highest and noblest sense of the word.

Communion. Vide LORD'S SUPPER.

Communion (Holy), Office of. The earliest descriptions which we have of the Communion office of the early Church prove that from the beginning it contained these parts: The reading of Holy Scripture, with exhortation based upon it; the kiss of peace, with prayer for all men; the offering of bread and wine; the thanksgiving, ending with the Triumphal Hymn ("Holy, holy, holy"); the recital of the words of Institution; the Oblation of the elements to God, and the Invocation of the HOLY GHOST upon them; the administration of the consecrated elements in both kinds; the dismissal of the people (presumably after a thanksgiving). There is no ancient Liturgy* in which these parts do not appear, whatever else may be added, and no description of one which does not seem to imply them all. And, besides, they are always found in the order in which they have just been mentioned, the only variation of importance being that the great Intercession for all men, and especially for the whole Church, occupies different parts of the service. In the Liturgy of the Greek Church it has stood for many centuries after the Invocation of the HOLY GHOST,—that is to say, at the end of the consecration; in the ancient Liturgy of Gaul and Spain, which is believed to have been brought almost in Apostolic times from Ephesus, it stands early in the service, soon after the lessons from Scripture; in the Roman Liturgy, which, though much older than the doctrine of transubstantiation, and bearing in its text no indication of it, yet shows many traces of being mutilated and confused, it is divided. One other difference may be noted here as of interest in the study of our own service: the Greek Liturgy has no proper Prefaces to the Triumphal Hymn; the Gallic or Ephesine (so called) has more than a hundred and fifty for different occasions; the Roman was once as rich in its variations, though now it has but eleven.

Our Liturgy came to us from the Churches of England and Scotland, and it was theirs by descent from the Church of ancient days in England, modified in Scotland by Eastern influences. It is impossible to go into its early history here. It must suffice to say that the Liturgy of the Church of England was never identical with that of the Church of Rome, and that it always showed that it was in part an inheritance from the Church of Gaul, which had, in its turn, taken its form of Eucharistic worship from the East. At the time of the Reformation there was first added to the Latin form of Consecration an English form for the preparation of the communicants, and for administration to them; then a complete service was published in English (in 1549 A.D.), adding to the defective Roman form certain things from the ancient Liturgies, though not in the ancient order, together with certain others peculiar to itself; and then (in 1552 A.D.) the service was put into nearly its present shape, the form of the prayer of consecration being carried back more nearly into conformity with the Roman, in part, as it seems to the writer, from a feeling that a wrong order had been adopted three years before. The American Liturgy is taken almost exactly from that in the English Prayer-Book, with the important exception that the Prayer of Consecration follows the Scotch form,—not that in the Scotch book of 1637 A.D., which never went into use, but that which was taken from primitive sources by the non-jurors in 1718 A.D., and which was borrowed from them by the Scotch Bishops.

These things being premised, the meaning of the several parts of the service may be readily seen. First, after this recital of the LORD's Prayer, and the Collect for Purity as preparatory to the whole service, comes, as in the earliest days, the reading of Holy Scriptures. The lesson from the Old Testament (called in some services the Prophecy) is with us invariable throughout the year, consisting of the Ten Commandments, which also serves, a proper response being provided to lead to a confession of sin and a prayer for grace. The Epistles and the Gospel are two lessons from the two parts of the New Testament, and are read by us in accordance with a very ancient calendar, which the Church of Rome has confused, as she has almost everything else in the Liturgy. To these the Collects, most of which are also very ancient, serve as a fitting and devout introduction. The Creed is the profession of our Faith as based on the Scriptures, parts of which have just been read, and the Sermon is an explanation of them and an exhortation based upon them. The offering of alms shows our charity, corresponding to the kiss of peace; and the offering of bread and wine is like the ancient presentation of the first fruits of the earth. The Prayer for the Church Militant is our great Intercession, keeping the position which it had in the old Liturgy of Gaul, and reminding us that English Christianity came in part from the East, and very probably from Ephesus and from St. John. The Exhortation is a continuation of the Sermon, having for its purpose to begin the special preparation of the people for receiving the Holy Sacrament.

It leads to the Institution, which is followed most naturally, we may say necessarily, by a humble Confession of sins and an Absolution, the latter having its most solemn form—that of a prayer. The Comfortable Words which follow are peculiar to our office and to those from which it was taken, and are in a translation made (it is thought) by Archbishop Cranmer expressly for the first English Prayer-Book; they serve to confirm the faith of the worshippers in God's promises of pardon. Then comes a form of words which can be traced back to the very earliest days, brief versicles and responses preparing the way for the Angelic or Triumphal Hymn (it is not strictly correct to call this the Trisagion); and in certain days the form of thanksgiving is made longer and adapted to the special commemoration, our number of proper prefaces being, however, probably owing to Roman influences, very small. The Prayer of Humble Access comes in as a parenthesis, though very suitably, between the Triumphal Hymn and the lofty strain of praise with which the Prayer of Consecration begins (which, by the way, first appears in the Scotch service of 1764 A.D.). The essential parts of this prayer are, through God's good providence, in their proper order, in our book, as they were in every ancient Liturgy, as they are to-day in those of the Greek Church, and as so many of the earnest divines of the Church of England have wished that they might be in hers. The Words of Institution are followed by an Oblation of the elements to God, as a memorial of the one sacrifice of CHRIST; and after it is the Invocation of the HOLY SPIRIT, which completes the Consecration. But the prayer goes on with a brief intercession, which reminds us of that in the Greek Liturgy, an offering of the souls and the bodies of the worshippers to God, a prayer that their sins may not prevent the acceptance of their worship, and a doxology, which latter is prolonged and echoed in a hymn. Then comes the administration in both kinds, according to CHRIST's institution. The Post-Communion, as it is called, is more elaborate in our offices than in almost any other. It includes the LORD's Prayer as offered by those who have now renewed their covenant with God, a prayer of Thanksgiving, the venerable Gloria in Excelsis, and the Blessing of Peace. No other service than the English and our own has the LORD's Prayer in this part of the service, all others placing it before the Communion. The other peculiarities of our Liturgy, which we share with those from which it is derived, are the Comfortable Words (a peculiarity of which we have no need to be ashamed), and the position of the Gloria in Excelsis; and in regard to the latter, though there are reasons for placing it as the Hymn of the Incarnation, at the beginning of the offices, as in the English service of 1549 A.D., use seems to commend its present position very strongly. The place of the Prayer of Humble Access in our books, as to which we follow the English, makes a break in the strain of thanksgiving, which is not found in the ancient offices; but it is, as has been said, of the nature of a parenthesis, and most fittingly expresses the feeling of humility with which we take upon our lips the praises of God.

It does not come within the scope of this article to speak of the rubrics of the service or of the doctrines of the Eucharist.

Communion in One Kind. The administration only of the bread and not the wine in the LORD'S Supper. This practice, which is contrary to the express command, "Drink ye all," and to the continual usage of the Church everywhere else, has been the rule of the Roman Church for the last seven hundred years only.

Communion of Saints. The latter part of the IX. Article of the Creed. It forms a complement to the former part,—the Holy Catholic Church, and serves to partly explain it. It was a later addition to this Article. It adds to and carries on the confession of the outer visible union with CHRIST in the Holy Catholic Church, and confesses the inner mystical union with Him. It is best understood in this connection with the first verses of the first Epistle general of St. John, and adds the doctrine of the union of all his saints living and departed, which is brought out so nobly in the eleventh and twelfth chapters of the Epistle to the Hebrews, especially in the 22d and 24th verses of the twelfth chapter, which form an inspired exposition of its true meaning in the Creed.

Communion-Table. The name synonymous with the altar in the Christian Church. The Order for the Holy Communion in the Prayer-Book calls it, as does the Greek Church, the Holy Table and the LORD'S Table, and so in the Ordinal. In the form for the Consecration of a Church or Chapel, which was compiled by the Bishops of this Church in 1799 A.D., the altar is called the Communion-Table. In the Office of Institution, framed in 1804 A.D. and revised in 1808 A.D., it is called Altar. It is both an altar and table, for as the place for offering the oblation of bread and wine it is an altar, and with respect to the feast it is a table. In the New Testament the use is indifferent in the few allusions made to it. Heb. xiii. 10: "We have an Altar whereof they have no right to eat which serve the Tabernacle." 1 Cor. x. 21: "Ye cannot be partakers of the LORD'S Table and the table of devils," "where what was on the table of devils was from the altar of devils." And throughout table and altar are used indifferently. In strictness the table is the LORD'S Table, the Holy Table, not the Communicant's Table, so that the term Communion-Table is incorrect.

Compline, in the English Church, before the Reformation, was the last service of the day. When the two services of Morning and Evening Prayer were arranged, the services of the first hours were joined together to form the morning services, and the Vesper and Compline of the last hours were conjoined into a fixed form for the Evening Prayer. It was not intended that the public worship should interfere with the use of private prayer, an idea which has often been put forth, but she intended that the public worship should be common, and "understood of the people."

Conception. The truth of the conception of CHRIST by the operation of the HOLY GHOST is of fundamental importance to the Christian. Unless it be so, the ancient prophecy (Is. vii. 14) has failed, the records of the Evangelists St. Matthew and St. Mark are false, the first chapter of St. John meaningless, and our faith vain; not merely this, but the whole career of the Christian Church an effect without a cause, if CHRIST is not the pre-existing Eternal SON of GOD, of one substance with His FATHER, begotten of His FATHER before all worlds.

Conclave. A room that can be locked, then an assembly-room, and, lastly, the assembly itself, generally the assembly of Cardinals, and more especially that assembly convened for the purpose of electing a new Pope. Up to the eleventh century the people as well as the clergy had a voice in the election, but under the guidance, it is said, of Hildebrand, afterwards the famous Gregory VII., Pope Nicholas II. arranged that the Cardinals, i.e., the Presbyters of the Cardinal Churches, should hold the election to the exclusion of the rights of the other parties to the election, 1059 A.D. The election is conducted under certain very minute rules, the chief of which is the absolute seclusion of the Cardinals from all external communication.

Concomitance. The doctrine that in transubstantiation the Blood inheres in the Body in the Eucharist, and therefore that there is practically no withholding of the grace and value of the Cup in the Communion. This strange and erroneous doctrine was invented to parry the proofs that the Cup must by the New Testament rule be given to the laity in the administration of the LORD'S Supper.

Concordance. (From concordare, to agree.) A dictionary and reference book of all the words which occur in an author. It is most generally applied to a verbal concordance of the Bible. There are many concordances, some of subjects (topical) and others of words (verbal), in the Hebrew, Greek (Septuagint), Latin (Vulgate), English, French, and German. Those in English claim our attention. The earlier concordances were quite defective, as they gave but the leading words. But they were superseded by the great work of ALEXANDER CRUDEN (1737 A.D.). It is in many respects the completest, and is arranged in very convenient form. It was incomplete in proper names, but that has been supplied in late editions. The most ambitious, and in many respects the most exhaustive, concordance is the recent one by Dr. Young, of Edinburgh, 1879 A.D. It gives the Hebrew and Greek words. It arranges these by subjects under the separate use of each word, not merely as noun or verb, etc., but in its several senses. It is probably the most perfect concordance that can be prepared.

Concordat. An agreement between powers relative to some subject. This word is usually restrained to agreements made between the Papacy and the contracting power acknowledging the Roman obedience, and it will be found that very often it was entered into to prevent the government from asserting and enforcing the just independence of the national Church. Such is the history of at least one concordat in France, the Pragmatic sanction (1516 A.D.), under Francis I., who was in correspondence with Melancthon. A second concordat was formed between Napoleon I. and Pius VII., which, however, did not give anything to the Roman See. It is now in force, after having been abrogated in 1817 A.D. to give place to a vain effort to restore the concordat of 1516 A.D. The interval between these concordats is filled with most instructive history. So in Spain the liberties of the Church were secured in the concordat of 1762 A.D., but in 1851 A.D. another not so favorable was made. But Portugal is noted upon the Peninsula for the firmness with which it has defended the practical independence of the Portuguese Church. In Germany the efforts of Joseph II. produced a great deal of excitement, but the intervention of the French Revolution and the treatment Napoleon inflicted upon Pius VI. produced a reaction in favor of the Roman See, and concordats were formed with the several states of Germany more or less favorable to the Roman See. The most favorable one (Austria in 1855 A.D.), proved to be a failure; many provisions in it could not be carried out, and those which were worked unfavorable results politically, so that in 1870 A.D. it was abolished. The history of the concordats from 1516 A.D. to the present day is the history of the effort to reconcile the National Historical Independence of the several Churches of Europe with the desire to remain, for varying, and often narrow, political reasons, in the obedience of the Roman See.

Condignity. A topic in the prereformation discussion as to the relation of works done before, and those under the gracious influences of God. Some works, it was held by some, could be done so well that thereby a man could deserve salvation (congruity). On the other hand it was contended that a man under only divine influence could deserve eternal life (condignity). The error in each case was the insisting (whether wittingly or not) that man could deserve or merit eternal life. Compare the XIIIth of the Articles upon this.

Confession. A word used with a wide signification and many applications. It means an acknowledgment of either an act or a belief, therefore it may be used to signify (a) The acknowledgment of any sin or sins. (b) The avowal of a belief. (c) The public documents containing such avowals which have been put forth with authority. It often is used simply as meaning auricular confession of sins to a priest.

Confession of Faith. The great Confession of Faith is made in the Creed. The Church can recognize no other Confession of Faith, though documents bearing that title have been put forth, and the XXXIX. Articles of the English and American Churches are popularly so styled. It is really an error, though the XXXIX. Articles contain decisions upon theological points and protests upon errors in vogue at the time (1562 A.D.), and upon some points of Church Polity. The Confession of Faith is properly the one made at Baptism: "Dost thou believe all the Articles of the Christian Faith?" Anciently it was necessary to recite the Creed at that time. But this does not cover all that is now placed under this title. It refers now to those documents which were published during the first century of the Reformation (and is made to include those since), containing declarations upon points of faith, protests against errors, or malpractices in religion, and assertions upon controverted or undetermined articles. The first and most notable of these is the Confession of Augsburg, presented to the Emperor Charles V. (June 25, 1530 A.D.) in full diet at Augsburg. It was read to the Diet in German, and made a very deep impression. This and its Defense (Apologia) against the attempted refutations of Eck, Cochläus, and other Roman theologians have become one of the standard authorities of the Lutheran Communion. The Calvinistic Confession of Basle, which took shape from a speech by Œcolampadius 1531 A.D., and was written out by Myconius in 1534 A.D.; the Helvetic Confession of 1536 A.D., in Basle, to unify the Swiss Reformers; the Genevan Catechism, the work of Calvin, 1536 A.D., takes rank as a confession,—are documents of this rank for the Calvinistic communion on the Continent; the Westminster Confession of Faith for the Presbyterians. These constitute only a very few of the many symbolic books,—i.e., collections of standard Confessions of Faith of the various religious bodies which receive them.

Confession of Sin. It is one of the essentials of repentance. "I said, I will confess my transgressions unto the LORD; and thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin" (Ps. xxxii. 5). It is, however, a question as to manner and before whom this confession of sin is to be made. As to manner, it is to be complete and unreserved, so far as memory and conscience can render this confession; the Holy Scriptures are full of it, and so are the writings of all the best and holiest men of all times. This confession is to be unshrinking in owning the character and heinousness of sin. But before whom is this to be made? To GOD beyond a doubt; but David's confession, which was finally recorded so fully, and for all ages, in the 51st Psalm, was first before Nathan: "And David said unto Nathan, I have sinned against the LORD, and Nathan said unto David, The LORD also hath put away thy sin." Here we see confession before a Priest and absolution, but it is equally clear that it was open, and before all who were present in the Royal chamber, and that this was no secret confession, concealed, and never to be divulged. There is no example recorded of such auricular confession in the Bible; on the contrary, the most open and public acknowledgment of wrong-doing is urged, not only in the Psalms, the great Penitential authority for the Church, but also by the conduct of the Primitive Church during the first centuries, when she kept up her strict discipline (vide DISCIPLINE) in accordance with the precept of St. James: "Confess your faults one to another, and pray one for another that ye may be healed." With these and other directions before us (St. Matt. iii. 6-8; Acts xxx. 18, 19), we may compare (not contrast) our LORD's commission in St. Matt. xvi. 19; xviii. 18; and most explicitly repeated in St. John xx. 23: "Receive ye the HOLY GHOST: whose soever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whose soever sins ye retain, they are retained," made to the eleven Apostles, as a committal of His own authority as Son of Man to forgive sins. This in nowise conflicts with the public confession, nay, rather agrees with it. Indeed, while it was clearly recognized that there were cases in which it were better that there should be no public confession,—we are not speaking of the ordinary wearing fretfulness of daily occurrence,—yet these were few and of rare occurrence, and they were exceptional cases. But we have full and clear information as to this. In this line and upon the best precedents the Church has given her children the public confessions of sin she places in her public formularies. They are three; the one in the Morning and Evening Prayer, the one in the Communion service, and the Prayer in the Ash-Wednesday service. Other confessions, in phrase, not in form, occur in the Collects; but these are the outlines upon which the Church instructs her children to frame their self-examination and confession, and she looks for an honest and devout desire on their part to give a hearty meaning to the lowly words she puts into their mouths. The public use of forms of confession was not intended to interfere with any private and devotional forms for the closet.

But while the Church thus publicly and openly avows her use of public confession, she does not interfere with the unburdening of the heart and its troubles to her ministers. Confession in private is urged upon the condemned convict in his cell, and at the close of the exhortation in the Communion service she uses these words: "And because it is requisite that no man should come to the Holy Communion but with a full trust in God's mercy, and with a quiet conscience, therefore, if there be any of you who by this means cannot quiet his own conscience herein, but requireth further comfort or counsel, let him come to me or to some other minister of God's Word and open his grief, that he may receive such godly counsel and advice as may tend to the quieting of his conscience and the removing of all scruple and doubtfulness." So far she exhorts and advises the confidence which should ever exist between a faithful Priest and his people in any case of conscience or of scruple. The use of absolution under such cases must always be decided by the circumstances. (Vide ABSOLUTION.)

CONFESSIO (AURICULAR), that is, confession into the ear of the Priest, who is bound to absolute secrecy, and who is at liberty to question the penitent in any way upon any part of his or her conduct. The practice arose upon the cessation of making public confession, and grew gradually till, after having been recognized by the Western Church, in several enactments of local Synods it was enjoined as a necessary preliminary to receiving the Communion and as obligatory on every one once a year on pain of excommunication, and therefore refusal of Christian burial. (IV. Council of Lateran, Can. 21, 1215 A.D.)

Confessor. One who at the risk of his life confesses his faith in CHRIST. For the use of the word, compare St. Matt. x. 32, and 1 Tim. vi. 13. The confessors were held in great esteem, and obtained so much influence that St. Cyprian, while admiring them and their constancy, had to oppose their ill-advised relaxations of the discipline of the lapsed. The title confessor properly belongs to him who at any time at the danger of his life because of it has confessed his faith in the LORD JESUS CHRIST.

Confessor. The title given to the Priest who hears confessions.

Confirmation. The imposition of the Bishop's hands, whereby the gift of the HOLY GHOST is given to the person confirmed; the strengthening of the soul by the graces of the SPIRIT. It bore several names in the works of the Fathers,—e.g., the Seal, the Chrism, the Imposition of Hands. The seal from Eph. iv. 30; the chrism from 1 John ii. 27; the imposition of hands from Heb. vi. 2. The term confirmation or strengthening appears to come from Eph. iii. 16. The rite without doubt was typified by the descent of the HOLY SPIRIT upon Him at our LORD's baptism. He declared constantly that He came not only for the Redemptive acts which He alone could effect, but also to give the HOLY GHOST, which gift, including all other gifts in that, He gave to the Apostles when He breathed on them, and afterwards when at the day of Pentecost He sent Him upon the Apostles.

It was emphatically the Rite for that gift, as Baptism was the appointed Sacrament for our entrance and birth into CHRIST; so it was implied in St. Peter's words: "Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of JESUS CHRIST for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the HOLY GHOST. For the promise is unto you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off, and to as many as the LORD our GOD shall call" (Acts ii. 38, 39). Now this promise is the pouring out of the SPIRIT, as St. Peter in the first part of his sermon had shown. The words of St. Peter imply then, that those who should be baptized were also to be confirmed. So, too, when Philip the evangelist went down to Samaria and baptized he could not confirm, but the Apostles sent Peter and John thither to confer that grace (Acts viii. 14-17). So, St. Paul confirmed the disciples at Ephesus (Acts xix. 6), a gift to which he repeatedly refers in his Epistle to the Ephesians (ch. i. 13, 14; iii. 16; iv. 4, 30). So laying on of hands is made a foundation act (Heb. vi. 2). So the anointing and sealing of the HOLY SPIRIT in 2 Cor. i. 21. There is a series of texts which derive their chief if not their full sense from this laying on of hands; the foremost places are the viii. chapter of Romans, Galatians vi. 6-8, and the references in 1 Corinthians to the body being the Temple of the HOLY GHOST. In the study of these passages comparison should also be made with the two leading prophecies, the text from Joel ii. 28, 32, and Isaiah xi. 1, 2.

It is not at all necessary to bring a long array of quotations from the Fathers to prove the fact that Confirmation—the laying on of hands—was the practice of the Church from the first. It may be necessary, however, to remark that Confirmation followed baptism immediately, and for that reason is the less often alluded to in the earliest Patristic writings, since it was, as it were, bound up in baptism. With baptism and Confirmation followed the receiving the Holy Communion, and so was not dwelt upon as discursively as other rites of the Church. The ancient formulas used both laying on of hands and the unction with consecrated oil. The laying on of hands was with the words, "Almighty Father of our LORD JESUS CHRIST, who hast regenerated Thy servants by water and the HOLY GHOST, who hast given them remission of all their sins, do Thou, O LORD, send upon them the HOLY GHOST, Thy Comforter; and give them the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and grace, the spirit of knowledge and true godliness. Fill them with the spirit of the fear of God, in the name of our LORD JESUS CHRIST, with whom Thou livest and reignest ever God with the HOLY GHOST for ever and ever. Amen." Then the Bishop signed them on the forehead with the chrism, saying, "The sign of CHRIST to eternal life. Amen." (The Gelasian Sacramentary, c. 500.) This form, as we see, is directly on the same line as our own service, with the one important omission of the chrism.

In our office the versicles are from the ancient Salisbury use. The words which accompany the act of the laying on of hands are drawn from several sentences of Holy Scripture. The Collect was framed after the pattern of one by Hermann, Archbishop of Cologne (1545 A.D.). The rubric on the admission of those ready and desirous of being confirmed to the Holy Communion was taken from a Constitution by Archbishop Peckham, 1281 A.D.

The blessings of Confirmation are to be received with a prepared and devout heart, not hastily or without instruction. To this end it is usual to deliver lectures upon Confirmation as a necessity in the Christian life, and because of its Apostolic appointment in the economy of the Christian Church, upon the duties of a devout and prayerful preparation, together with instruction about the Church and her office, and the duties laid upon the person confirmed in that act. These blessings and the position of this holy rite are well set forth in a homily dated before the Reformation: "In Baptism he was born again spiritually to live, in Confirmation he is made bold to fight. There he received remission of sin, here he receiveth increase of grace. There the Spirit of God did make him a new man, here the same Spirit doth defend him in his dangerous conflict. There he was washed and made clean, here he is nourished and made strong. In Baptism he was chosen to be God's son and an inheritor of His heavenly kingdom; in Confirmation God shall give him His HOLY SPIRIT to be his mentor, to instruct him and perfect him, that he lose not by his folly that inheritance which he is called unto. In Baptism he was called and chosen to be one of God's soldiers, and had his white coat of innocence delivered unto him, and also his badge, which was the red cross, the instrument of His Passion set upon his forehead and other parts of his body; in Confirmation he is encouraged to fight and take the armor of God put upon him, which be able to bear off the fiery darts of the devil and to defend him from all harm, if he will use them in his battle and not put himself in danger of his enemies by entering the field without them."

It is often asked, Is Confirmation as necessary to salvation as Baptism? A careful examination of the Scriptures quoted and referred to above—especially the viii. of Romans and the iv. of Ephesians—will show that it is, for it is part of the means of grace for our resurrection (cf. Rom. viii. 11; Eph. iv. 30).

Congregation. A word to which several meanings are attached. In the Old Testament it means (as does also the word Convocation) the whole people, whether in the wilderness, where they were always easily gathered, or in Canaan. It meant either a Congregation for worship, or a Congregation for deliberation, and so generally represented by the heads of the families. In the New Testament it meant the Ecclesia, whether merely a local congregation or the whole body of the Faithful. But except in one place the Ecclesia is translated Church in the A. V. In later Church usage it was restricted to the local gathering or to the organized body receiving ministrations from a Pastor. It is a modern error, refuted by all early Church History, to give to the Congregation the formative voice, and to make it the source of authority to its officers. Throughout the New Testament, the Apostles exercised independent authority and ordained as men answerable to God for their authority. So, too, in the subapostolic record in Rev. ii. and iii. The Congregation had many privileges, which of need modified the action of the ruling body. The officers were not despots, but acting in God's behalf to the Congregation, and bearers and executants of His Covenant. They exist only for the sake of the Congregation, but from God. The Laity in Congregation had the right to nominate to the vacant Bishopric, to assent or object to the ordination of Deacons (Acts vi. 3) or Presbyters (1 Tim. iii.); as largely controlling the finances its influence was weighty. St. Cyprian's consultation of the Congregations in Carthage is a good illustration. But these primitive Congregations were not so wholly regulated as our own modern ones are; the clergy being more a body gathered around their Bishop, and directed by him, than a number of Presbyters and Deacons scattered over the Diocese and holding their Parochial cure at the hands of the Congregation. The Congregations themselves were not so markedly parted, even when much more scattered, and certainly in the city Churches, though there were many Churches and Congregations, they really formed for all minor legislative purposes but one body.

But our Congregations now are nearly identical with their Parishes. A Congregation may contain many individuals other than those in nonage, who cannot take any part in the management of the affairs of the Parish, or may be merely attendants on the services. But apart from these, generally a Congregation is made up of persons permanently members of the Parish, and for all proper purposes the two names apply to only one body. Yet in some particulars the modern Congregation is still endowed with the same privileges as the older. In an ordination the consent of the Congregation is

had. The Congregation being offended by the scandalous conduct of a member he is proceeded against; and the Congregation has to be satisfied of his repentance and amendment. (Rubric to the Holy Communion.) In the Prayer-Book throughout, the people present at a service are distinguished from the Congregation. So properly at the office of Consecration of a Church or Chapel. As the Church is consecrated for the Parish, the Congregation, not the People, is the term used. So, too, in the office of Institution, in the Prayers and in the first of the two closing Rubrics.

In the Digest of Canons the words "Parish or Congregation" seem to imply a slight difference in the use of the two, the one not completely coinciding with the other. The Vestry sign testimonials as representatives of the Parish or Congregation (Tit. i., Can. ii., § 3; Can. vi., § 2). A clergyman can be rector of a Parish or Congregation (Tit. i., Can. xiv., § 2, § 4). The term "Congregation" is a broader term here than "Parish," for a Congregation must exist in a Parish, but a Congregation may not be organized into a Parish, therefore all general directions about music, about Congregations within the Territory of one Bishop placing themselves under the jurisdiction of another, use simply the term Congregation. The mere gathering of a Congregation needs the authority of no Canon, but when this Congregation attempts to organize, then it must take the steps pointed out by the Canons, both of the Church at large and the special ones of the Diocese, in order to become a Parish. Still, since the Parish is a regular organization, and the Congregation is a body with looser cohesion, and since for certain purposes the Church rightly speaks of the Congregation, the Parish, which can often act solely through its representatives, the Vestry, must in some capacities act as a Congregation also.

Connecticut, Diocese of. Connecticut was not, like some of her sister colonies, first settled by companies of Churchmen, nor had she, like others, royal governors who brought with them the forms of the national Church and in some sense established it within their jurisdiction. To be sure, the Rev. Messrs. Hooker and Stone, who led the settlers of Hartford in 1635 A.D., and the Rev. John Davenport, who was the founder of New Haven in 1638 A.D., had all received Holy Orders in the Church of England; but it was far from their purpose to build up in the forests of Connecticut and by the side of her pleasant waters a Church which should extend to a new land her doctrine, discipline, and worship. It need hardly be said that the colonists were of one mind with their teachers, that it was intended that each of the towns which were organized in the early days should contain (or, to use the words of the theory, should be) a "Church of Christ," of the pure Congregational type. Yet it was as early as 1664 A.D., a year before the New Haven colony was united to Connecticut,—Saybrook had been merged in this latter at an earlier date,—that William Pitkin and others petitioned the General Assembly in regard to privileges which they claimed as members of the Church of England, but which were withheld from them by the ecclesiastical authority here. But the first expression of a wish for the services of the Church seems to have come from a few Churchmen in Stratford about 1690 A.D., though it does not appear that any petition for a missionary was made till 1702 A.D., in which year two missionaries of the recently founded Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, the Rev. Messrs. George Keith and John Talbot, visited New London and preached there. Three years later, the Stratford Churchmen applied to the Rev. Mr. Vesey, rector of Trinity Church, New York, for his assistance, and in 1706 A.D. the Rev. George Muirson, missionary at Rye in New York colony, began to officiate for them, being ably encouraged by a layman whose name should always be held in honor, Col. Caleb Heathcote. In April, 1707 A.D., the parish of Christ Church, Stratford, was roganized; but Mr. Muirson soon died, and it was left without a settled clergyman for more than fifteen years. In 1708 A.D. occurred two events of interest in the ecclesiastical history of Connecticut; the Congregational and the Presbyterian elements in the colony were united under the Saybrook platform of government, and the General Assembly included in the act which authorized it a clause for "the relief of sober dissenters," not freeing them from taxes for the support of the standing order, but removing the penalty for non-attendance at its services. But we do not hear of any sign of activity and hardly of life on the part of the Church until on Trinity Sunday, 1722 A.D., the Rev. George Pigot took charge of the parish at Stratford.

In this year (1722 A.D.) is properly dated the foundation of the Church in Connecticut; yet not from Mr. Pigot's labors, but from a most remarkable event, which is almost, if not quite, unparalleled in history, and which had its origin in the influence of "the first missionary of our Church in Connecticut, the Book of Common Prayer," and in particular of a copy of it which belonged to Mr. Smithson, of Guilford. That book had been studied, while he was yet a boy, by Samuel Johnson, who was graduated at Yale College and became for several years its tutor, and then Congregational pastor in West Haven, being held in high reputation for his abilities and his learning. With him other ministers of the standing order had joined in the study of the questions suggested by the Prayer-Book; and they had met in the college library to read and to discuss such books as Archbishop King's "Inventions of Men in the Worship of God," Scott's "Christian Life," and other writings of English divines. Among these ministers were Mr. Timothy Cutler, the Rector of the College, for ten years (1709-1719 A.D.) pastor at Stratford; Mr. Daniel Brown, its only other officer of instruction; Mr. James Wetmore, of North Haven; Mr. Jared Eliot, of Killingwood; Mr. John Hart, of East Guilford; and Mr. Samuel Whiteley, of Wallingford. The result of their studies appeared on the day after the Commencement in 1722 A.D., when the seven ministers just named made a declaration that "some of them doubted of the validity, and the rest were more fully persuaded of the invalidity, of the Presbyterian ordination in opposition to the Episcopal." The declaration caused great consternation and excitement. A public disputation was held, which was moderated by Governor Saltonstall, himself a Congregational minister, who had had great influence in the framing and adoption of the Saybrook platform, and who, it may be noted, had entertained Keith and Talbot at their visit to New London twenty years before. The result was that some of the doubters were persuaded to remain in their former positions; but Messrs. Johnson, Cutler, and Brown were not moved from their determination to seek holy orders at the hands of a Bishop; they sailed for England, where they were ordained in March, 1723, and they were soon followed by Mr. Wetmore. Mr. Brown died in England soon after his ordination, but the others returned as missionaries of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, Mr. Johnson being authorized to take up the work at Stratford, while Dr. Cutler (he had received the Divinity degree at Oxford) was sent to Boston, Mass., and Mr. Wetmore to Rye, New York. The progress of the Church in Connecticut was worthy of this wonderful beginning. Based on earnest conviction, fostered by earnest devotion, led by men of learning "well reported of among all the people," who testified their sincerity by giving up all they had and risking the dangers of six thousand miles of sea-voyage, besides the no less real dangers of pestilence and the violence of enemies, it was strong and courageous in itself, and it commanded the respect of its adversaries. With scarce an exception its clergy were natives of the colony and educated among their own people; at first they came from the ranks of the ministry of the Congregational order or from among those who were preparing for it; and all that was excellent in the character or in the religious convictions of the people was exhibited in them. In Connecticut, if anywhere, the Church was accepted on her own merits, and on her own merits she stood. Within eleven years after Johnson's return to Stratford five other parishes were organized: one at Fairfield in 1727 A.D., another at New London under Samuel Seabury (father of the Bishop) in 1732 A.D., at Newtown and Redding under John Beach, and at Hebron in 1734 A.D., and in 1736 A.D. it was estimated that there were seven hundred Church families in the colony. Meanwhile, in 1727 A.D., the Legislature had passed a law which allowed the members of any settled ecclesiastical society to pay their ecclesiastical taxes for the support of their own services instead of those of the standing order. The visit of Dean Berkeley to America had not been without its effects in Connecticut. He had resided in Rhode Island from 1729 A.D. to 1731 A.D., and though he was disappointed in his project of establishing a college in Bermuda and founding Bishoprics in the colonies, his influence had been great, and the books which he gave to Yale College and the scholarships which he endowed there extended that influence after his return. Soon great theological and religious controversies were rising in the colony. A period of irreligion and ungodliness had come upon the descendants of the pious settlers; and then in 1740 A.D. the great awakening began. In the midst of the excitement Mr. George Whitefield visited the eastern part of Connecticut and gave much encouragement to the "New Lights," as those were called who favored a change from the former religious beliefs and methods. Many irregularities attended the whole movement; and the strange speeches and actions of Whitefield and James Davenport, encouraging separation, and after a while finding it necessary to purify the separatists, distressed and alarmed devout people and threw many into a most unnatural and unhealthy frame of mind. The harm produced by the New Lights or feared from them was so great that in 1742 A.D. the law in favor of sober dissenters was repealed. In all these troubles the calm teaching of the Church was able to save many from undue enthusiasm or from utter recklessness, and her influence was constantly on the gain. Thirty years later, in 1774 A.D., the Congregationalists estimated that the Episcopalians, with their twenty clergymen and forty churches, were one-thirteenth part of all the inhabitants of the colony. It need hardly be said that all along the need of a Bishop was keenly felt, and petitions were sent again and again to the Bishops of the English Church,—formally as early as 1742, and in a more informal manner in the letters and reports of the missionaries. Many brave lives were sacrificed, one-fifth part of those who left Connecticut to apply for holy orders never returning. The cause of American Episcopacy had friends in England, but the constant reply to the petitions was non possumus. Then came the political troubles and the war of the Revolution. Most of the clergy were faithful to the British crown, as well from principle as from the obligation of their ordination vows, and persisted for a time in the use of the Prayer-Book with all the state prayers. Their sufferings were great and were patiently endured, and they suffered sometimes as much from the violence of the British troops as from the patriotism of the revolutionists. During the war two of the clergy died, three went within the British lines, and one to England, leaving thirteen within the limits of the State, and one in Great Barrington, Mass., which was reckoned ecclesiastically with Connecticut. Of these fourteen, it is worthy of mention, twelve were born in Connecticut, one in New Hampshire, and one in New York, and none of them had had any other than Episcopal ordination, though two had been Congregational licentiates.

A preliminary treaty of peace was signed November 30, 1782 A.D., and news of it was received on this side of the ocean early in 1783 A.D. The Connecticut clergy doubtless thought much on the course of events and consulted with each other; and they were ready to act. Moreover, they were alarmed at the tenor of a pamphlet published by the Rev. Dr. (afterwards Bishop) White in 1782 A.D., advocating, at least as a temporary expedient under their existing circumstances, the adoption by American Churchmen of a Presbyterian form of government. They therefore came together at the earliest possible day. Ten of the fourteen clergymen met at the rectory in Woodbury on the festival of the Annunciation in 1783 A.D., the rector, the Rev. John Rutgers Marshall, probably presiding, and the Rev. Abraham Jarvis acting as Secretary. They decided to do two things: to elect a Bishop and to reply to Dr. White's pamphlet. Their first choice for the Episcopate was the venerable and honored Rev. Jeremiah Leaming, till lately of Norwalk, a defender of the Church and a sufferer for her sake; and, in case (as seemed likely) his age and infirmities should force him to decline the burden, they decided to ask the Rev. Dr. Samuel Seabury to undertake it. Dr. Seabury was the son of a faithful clergyman, a native of New London, of strong and vigorous character, well known and highly esteemed in the State. The Secretary was to go to New York, to consult with Mr. Leaming and Dr. Seabury, and to arrange as to testimonials and letters of commendation; and the clergy directed him to instruct the one who should go to England to ask for consecration, that, if his petition was unsuccessful there, he should go to Scotland and seek the Episcopate at the hands of the bishops of the disestablished Church in that country. The clergy also authorized Mr. Jarvis to write a letter to Dr. White, pointing out the dangerous consequences of the ideas which he had advanced in his pamphlet, assuring him that they were utterly opposed to the principles of Connecticut Churchmen, and urging that at least nothing of the kind ought to be advanced until a request for the Episcopate had been made and rejected. It was found that Mr. Leaming felt it impossible for him to accept the election which was offered him; and Dr. Seabury sailed for England not far from the time when the formal proclamation of peace was made, and arrived in London July 7, 1783 A.D., several months before the evacuation of New York. The story of his sojourn in England cannot be told at length here. The English Bishops sought and obtained from Parliament permission to ordain Deacons and Priests for the United States; but the Erastian notions which prevailed in this Church, the machinations of English politicians, and the arguments of influential Congregationalists in Connecticut prevented the consecration of a Bishop. Yet Dr. Seabury waited for more than a year, till at last, losing all hope of an English consecration, he decided to act upon the instructions given him at the time of his election, seconded as they were by the advice of English friends, and to make application to the Bishops of the Scotch Church. The answer came from them almost at once, that they would freely give him what they had, "a free, valid, and purely Ecclesiastical Episcopacy," and he turned his steps to Aberdeen.

There, on Sunday, November 14, 1784 A.D., in the chapel within Bishop Skinner's house in Long Acre, the worshiping-place of a large congregation, he was consecrated Bishop of Connecticut by three of the four Bishops of Scotland,—the Rt. Rev. Robert Kilgour, Bishop of Aberdeen and Primus, the Rt. Rev. Arthur Petrie, Bishop of Ross and Moray, and the Rt. Rev. John Skinner, Bishop Coadjutor of Aberdeen. On the following day Bishop Seabury signed a "Concordate" with his consecrators, in which they covenanted communion in faith and in ecclesiastical matters, and Bishop Seabury promised to use his influence for the introduction of the Scotch Eucharistic office into his Diocese. The Bishop returned to Connecticut to find but nine clergymen left, one having gone to another State and four having withdrawn, under British influence, to Nova Scotia. On the 2d of August, 1785 A.D., the clergy met their Bishop at Middleton; on the 3d they formally acknowledged and received him, and he ordained four candidates to the diaconate; on the following day he delivered his primary charge; and on the 5th a committee was appointed to act with the Bishop in setting forth such changes as should be thought necessary in the Prayer-Book, in consequence of which appointment a few amendments, relating to the State prayers, were duly published a week later. There was a strong disinclination to make any other changes in the services, and it does not appear that any action was taken upon the further recommendations of the committee. But almost immediately after the publication of the "Proposed Book" drawn up by the Philadelphia Convention of 1785 A.D., and probably in consequence of it, Bishop Seabury set forth and recommended for use a Communion office, almost identical with the Scotch office, differing from the English in matters of arrangement, and especially in having a distinct and formal Oblation and Invocation in their primitive order after the words of Intitution. (This Scotch office must not be confused with that in the so-called Archbishop Laud's book of 1637 A.D., which was quite different; it is a lineal descendant of the Non-Jurors' office of 1718 A.D.) Many things seeming to prevent a union between Connecticut and the Dioceses to the south, the clergy, in February, 1786 A.D., decided to elect a coadjutor Bishop, thinking that it might be necessary to have a complete College of Bishops in the Scotch line; and Mr. Leaming and Mr. Mansfield both declining, Mr. Jarvis was elected. But he did not decide at once, and the whole project was abandoned, when, after much prayer, much correspondence, and much patience, a union was effected with the Dioceses which had secured Bishops from England. The Rev. Messrs. Bela Hubbard and Abraham Jarvis were chosen to accompany the Bishop to the Convention at Philadelphia at Michaelmas, 1789 A.D.; and on the 2d of October they became members of that body, Bishops Seabury and White organizing as the House of Bishops. At this Convention the Prayer-Book was revised, and the sound and moderate views of the Bishop of Connecticut had great weight in the revision. Especially do we owe it to him that the prayer of Consecration in the Communion office was taken almost exactly from the Scotch service. On the 30th of September, 1790 A.D., the clergy of Connecticut voted to confirm the doings of their proctors in the General Convention (the Rev. James Sayre being the only dissident) and to adopt the new Prayer-Book; but the use of Bishop Seabury's Communion office was not altogether abandoned for some thirty years. In the same year a College of Doctors was established; but it is not mentioned after 1792 A.D., having been displaced by the Standing Committee, which was first chosen in 1791 A.D. The members of the Standing Committee were all clergymen; and it has been the uniform law of the Diocese to this day, with the exception of the year 1818 A.D., that they should all be chosen from the clerical order. Delegates of the laity had met with the clergy in 1788 A.D. to consult concerning the Bishop's salary; but the laity were not summoned to sit in Convention till 1792 A.D., when it was necessary to elect deputies of each order to the General Convention. This was, therefore, in one sense the first Convention of the Diocese; the convocations of the clergy began many years before a Bishop was elected, and continued to be held regularly for many years after. The revival of the Church in Connecticut under Bishop Seabury was most real and permanent. To increase and confirm its prosperity, he felt it necessary to establish an institution for Church education, and in 1788 A.D. steps were taken for the foundation of an Episcopal academy, which was permanently located at Cheshire in 1796 A.D. Though sometimes called Seabury College, a collegiate charter could not be obtained for it from the Legislature. In the midst of active work for the good of his diocese and of his parish in New London, Bishop Seabury died on the 25th of February, 1796 A.D. He had ordained forty-eight Deacons and forty-three Priests, and had confirmed a very large number of persons in Connecticut, Rhode Island, and elsewhere. It may be noted that he had been Bishop of Rhode Island since 1790 A.D., though there was no union of the Dioceses.

The Rev. Dr. Abraham Jarvis was chosen in May, 1796 A.D., to succeed Bishop Seabury, but he declined the Episcopate, as did also the Rev. John Bowden, principal of the Episcopal Academy. In June, 1797 A.D., Dr. Jarvis was again elected; and on the 18th of October he was consecrated in Trinity Church, New Haven, by Bishops White, Provoost, and Bass. His Episcopate of sixteen years was a quiet one, except for the persistent annoyance caused him by Ammi Rogers, whom he had deposed from the ministry. The establishment of the Churchman's Magazine in 1804 A.D. and the securing of additional facilities for the work of the academy at Cheshire, were among the signs of growth and prosperity. The trustees of the Bishop's Fund were chartered in 1799 A.D., though they were not organized till 1813 A.D. Bishop Jarvis died May 3, 1813 A.D., and, chiefly for financial reasons, there was much delay in the choice of a successor. In 1815 A.D., the Rev. John Croes was elected, but he was soon after chosen to New Jersey, and accepted that Diocese; and in the following year Bishop Hobart, of New York, was "requested to visit and perform the Episcopal offices in this Diocese," which he accordingly did, confirming very large numbers of persons in different places. Meanwhile, matters were ripening in Connecticut for the mixed political and religious revolution of 1818 A.D., in which year, by the adoption of a State Constitution (though by a small majority), the establishment of the Congregational order was broken. This event was preceded and followed by a long war of pamphlets, in which the champions of the Church showed zeal and ability. The revolution did much to strengthen the Church in material things, though it brought into the civil membership of its parishes many who did not become communicants. The Bishop's Fund was increased in part by a gift from the State of one-seventh of the amount repaid by the general government on account of money paid out during the war of independence, and in part by another grant from the Legislature, and on the 2d day of June, 1819 A.D., the Convention proceeded to the election of a Bishop. Thirty-three clergymen and fifty-four lay delegates were present, only five of the latter being from parishes on the east side of the Connecticut River. The choice fell upon the Rev. Dr. T. C. Brownell, an assistant minister of Trinity Church, New York, sometime professor in Union College, and he was consecrated in Trinity Church, New Haven, on the 27th of October, by Bishops White, Hobart, and Griswold. Bishop Brownell entered upon his work with vigor, and aided it by timely publications of much value. He was deeply interested in education, and in 1820 A.D. the General Theological Seminary was removed to New Haven, where it remained about two years. Renewed attempts were made to secure a charter for a college, and at last, in 1823 A.D., the religious bodies other than the Congregationalists uniting with the Church, Washington College was incorporated by the Legislature, and Bishop Brownell was chosen its first president. In 1845 A.D. its name was changed to Trinity College. A Christian Knowledge Society for discussing missionary purposes had been chartered in 1818 A.D., and a Church Scholarship Society for assistance to young men in their studies for the ministry was founded in 1827 A.D., while in 1855 A.D. a charter was obtained for the Fund for Aged and Infirm Clergy and Clergymen's Widows. Bishop Brownell's Episcopate is a long record of faithful labor and wise counsel on his part, and of rapid growth following the blessing of God upon it. In 1831 A.D. he retired from the presidency of the college that he might devote all his time to the work of the Diocese. At the end of a quarter of a century from the time of his consecration the number of the clergy had increased to a hundred, and among them were many whose names were prominent in the church,—none more so than that of the learned Dr. S. F. Jarvis. At the Convention of 1851 A.D. the Bishop asked for an assistant, and the Convention elected the Rev. John Williams, President of Trinity College, who was consecrated in St. John's Church, Hartford, on the 29th day of October. Bishop Williams remained for three years at the head of the college, and a theological department grew up there under his supervision, which was removed in 1854 A.D., when he resigned the presidency, to Middletown, where it was incorporated as the Berkeley Divinity School, and it has been no unimportant part of the work of Bishop Williams's Episcopate that he has trained there so many of the clergy of the Church. The educational equipment of the Diocese was completed in 1875 A.D. by the establishment of St. Margaret's Diocesan School for Girls in Waterbury. After 1859 A.D., Bishop Brownell was not able to attend the Conventions, and on the 13th of January, 1865 A.D., he died, having held the Episcopate for more than forty-five years, during the latter twelve of which he had been presiding Bishop of the Church in the United States. During the thirty-two years which have passed since Bishop Williams's election the number of confirmations has been about 31,500, the proportional increase in the number of communicants has exceeded that of the population of the State and that of any other religious body within it, the present number being about 22,000, and the number of Deacons ordained has been 283, or about one-fifteenth of the whole number of the clergy now in the country. The number of clergy canonically resident in the Diocese at the time of the last Convention was 187. The contributions reported for the preceding year for parochial expenses and salaries were about $400,000; for diocesan missions and other charitable objects within the Diocese, $23,000; and for Church and charitable objects without the Diocese, $14,000. It should be noted here that in 1865 A.D. the question of a division of the Diocese was discussed; but since the following year nothing has been heard of it in the Conventions. Until 1878 A.D. the organization of all the parishes had been by State law under the Congregational form as ecclesiastical societies; in that year legislative authority was obtained for organization in a more churchly way and under the provisions of a Canon.

Two simple facts go a long ways in showing the influence of the Church in Connecticut. The one is, that, at least since 1790 A.D., the public fast has been annually appointed by the Governor of the State on Good-Friday; the other, that there are within the limits of the State but two houses of worship of the Unitarian denomination.

REV. PROF. S. HART.

Consanguinity. Relationship by blood, as compared with AFFINITY, or relationship by marriage. Blood relationship within certain degrees has always been held an impediment to marriage. What those degrees are, beyond what the Civil Law has determined, has not been authoritatively settled by the Church in this country, though the Bishops have recommended, without endeavoring to bring the matter up in form, the adoption of the English Law, which is based upon the Levitical Table (Lev. xviii. 6-21).

Conscience. Few words in any language are used with a greater variety of meanings or with more indefiniteness of signification than the word conscience. When the translation of our Bible that is now in use was made, and for many years afterwards, we had but the one word conscience for the two classes of mental phenomena, which we now indicate by the two forms of the words,—conscience and consciousness. By the latter we mean, primarily and in the strictest sense, the means, or process rather, by which we know, immediately, what is going on in our own minds,—our thoughts and feelings, our purposes and aims, our hopes and fears,—as when we say I am conscious of perusing this paper, of remembering an event that occurred yesterday, and so forth. Thus, in a secondary sense, we mean by the word the knowledge itself, which we have by this means, and we speak of the knowledge as a matter of consciousness,—or as being “in consciousness,”—and finally, with a wider departure from the more strict and proper sense of the word, we often speak of the objects that are perceived or known as matters of consciousness. This is especially a view and a use of the word to which Sir William Hamilton has given rise and which he has brought into a certain degree of currency and recognition.

But by the word “conscious” we mean primarily our means of knowing what is right and our duty. Thus we denote the knowledge itself by the word; this latter use of the original word—that is, the significations that we now denote by conscience—prevailed in the earlier part of our history, and the latter—that is, what we now mean by consciousness—did not begin to attract any considerable amount of attention, and consequently did not need a separate term to denote it, until quite recently, and in fact not until after men had begun to study mental philosophy more carefully and more distinctly as a matter of observation and careful analysis. The word “conscience” occurs in our English Bible some thirty times, while the word “consciousness” does not occur at all. There are, however, several places in which this latter form of the word would better express the meaning than that one which is used; thus, St. Paul (1 Cor. viii. 7) says, “for some with conscience of the idol eat.” It would be better “consciousness of the idol,” or knowledge of the fact that it is an idol. So again (2 Cor. i. 12), St. Paul says, “the testimony of our conscience,” when, in the more modern use, most persons would say consciousness,—that is, “we are conscious, or know from consciousness,” “that in simplicity and godly sincerity we have had our conversation in the world, and more abundantly to you-ward.”

It is hardly worth while to attempt, in this place, to describe or discuss all the theories that have been proposed with regard to the nature and functions of conscience, in this more restricted and most proper sense and use of the word. Bishop Butler, something more than a hundred years ago, gave great currency to the use of the word, and a far greater precision to its meaning, than it had had before. His view is that every created being has in its nature an indication of the end and purpose for which it was created, and, if a living being at all, it has certain faculties and instincts which, when taken together with a knowledge of its constitution, indicate very clearly how it should live and what it ought to do in order to accomplish the proper end of its being. Thus, as the eyes, ears, etc., of man not only enable him to see and to hear, so also they very clearly indicate that he ought to use these sense-organs, and take good heed to, and make proper use of, what he sees and hears, etc. This is an inward faculty to indicate what he ought to do with reference to the higher or moral qualities of the actions from among which he is to make his choice and determine what he will do. "Now," says the Bishop (Sermons on Human Nature, ser. ii.), "obligations of virtue shown, and motives to the practice of it enforced, from a review of the nature of man are to be considered as an appeal to each particular person's heart and natural conscience, as the external senses are appealed to for proof of things cognizable by them." And he claims that we have as much right "to argue from these inward feelings to conclusions about our duty as from what we learn by the eyes and ears in regard to objects in the outer world. A man can as little doubt," says he, "whether his eyes were given him to see with as he can doubt of the truth of the science of optics deduced from ocular experiments. And allowing the inward feeling, shame, a man can as little doubt whether it was given him to prevent his doing shameful actions as he can doubt whether his eyes were given him to guide his steps."

The question is sometimes raised and discussed, whether the conscience is a separate faculty of the mind or not. But the question itself implies a mistake with regard to the mind,—a misconception with regard to its nature and modes of operation. The mistake arises from the notion that the mind is made up of parts or "faculties," as the body is made up of organs, each one of them performing a separate task or function, as the heart, the lungs, the stomach, in the body; or that, as we have different organs of sense for the various kinds of knowledge that we get of the objects around us, as the eyes for their colors, the ears for their sounds, etc., so the mind must have faculties for each one of its kinds of activity, as one faculty for perception, another for imagination, and so on, including conscience among them as the faculty that sees and distinguishes between right and wrong. This, however, is acknowledged to be a mistaken view as soon as the attention is carefully drawn to the subject. The mind is one, and while it uses the eyes to see with and the ears for hearing, and the brain as its organ and instrument of thinking, remembering, etc., it is itself one, undivided and indivisible, so far as we know anything on the subject.

If, then, there is no faculty of the mind that can be called conscience in this sense, what we call conscience must be the result of natural instinct and education or acquired mental habit. There are those who would claim that conscience is "the voice of God within us," and in a certain sense,—and that, too, a very important sense,—which we will consider very soon, this view is undoubtedly correct. This was the view taken by Socrates, the first and the greatest of the Greek philosophers who distinctly considered the subject. He called it his "good spirit," that was always in him, guiding him to a knowledge of his duty and restraining him when he had a thought of doing what he ought not to do. I think there can be no doubt that St. Paul had very much the same view,—that is, St. Paul believed and taught that every man has within him a light and a guide to right and duty, which he regarded as the voice or influence of God,—the HOLY GHOST.

What we thus call conscience, in our modern use of the word, as it seems in the light of the latest and best discussions of the subject, is the result of three elements:

(1) There is a natural instinct in man which is analogous to the instincts that guide the brutes in all they do,—which in man is a guide in the higher walk of conscientious motives and voluntary choice, into which the brutes can never enter. He feels a conscious approval of certain feelings, as love, good will, generosity, and, in fact, all the feelings and motives that we call good and virtuous; and, on the other hand, a conscious disapproval of their opposites, as enmity, spite, and such like. Here man approves or disapproves of himself and of his actions according as they proceed from motives of one or the other of these two classes. This is the foundation, the ineradicable and the indestructible basis of morality among men.

(2) There is, secondly, another element in conscience; for conscience is not all feeling,—it is insight or knowledge as well. It is very manifest that we have very early an insight into the nature and tendency of actions, we see what effect they will have, considered irrespective of any motives that may prompt us to perform them. Good motives sometimes lead to wrong actions. Hence we judge actions not only by the motives that they may proceed from, but also and as well by the consequences to which they may lead. And the two methods are usually and for the most part in harmony and lead to the same result. But it often happens, in the course of our experience, that our motives or feelings in regard to an act or a course of actions changes with our experience and a better knowledge of the consequences that flow from it. The first fruits or effects of an act may be such as we can approve, while a knowledge of the more remote consequences are such as to be vastly more important, and such in their character that no good man can choose the act with the motives which should actuate him or such as his conscience can approve.

(3) But, in the third place, a large element of what we ordinarily call conscience is the result of education and of acquired habit. We are told early in our lives that some things are wrong, and that we must not do them, and that others are right, and that we ought to do them. And thus we grow up with many principles or rules of action,—many of the dictates of our conscience, as we may call them,—which are the result of education and habit, without any clear insight or knowledge of the reasons why the course of action to which they lead ought to be regarded as right, rather than avoided as wrong. What we thus learn to do as right and duty we grow up with the habit of regarding as right and part of our duty,—part of the dictates of conscience.

Of the three elements thus named as entering into what we call conscience, the first constitutes what we sometimes call man's moral nature, which was undoubtedly at first pure and upright. But it is a question to be considered, and one of great practical importance, how far it has been corrupted or depraved by the fall. That it has been corrupted or deadened by the inherited depravity of our nature admits of no doubt. But how far and in what respects it is to be distrusted on this account is a question that we need not now discuss or consider. The second element named above constitutes what we sometimes call "reason," or "the light of nature." And this most assuredly is never infallible in any one of us. Invaluable as a guide it is undoubtedly, and by means of it we are often able to rise above the notions and principles of action that prevail in the community where we live, and thus to do something towards introducing a better state of morals among our friends and neighbors. We become reformers and help to elevate the lives of men to a higher plane. The third element constitutes what we call education, and in this there is always one part that consists of the religious views that we have inherited, or rather have been taught as a part of our education. But the community where we live is never altogether perfect and our teachers are never infallible.

Now it is a question whether over and above these three elements, or as acting in and through the first and second named, there is any special Divine influence to be recognized and taken into the account. It would seem to be the teaching of St. Paul that there is such an influence even among the heathen who know not CHRIST. "For when the Gentiles, which have not the law, do by nature the things contained in the law, these, having not the law, are a law unto themselves: which show the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing witness, and their thoughts the meanwhile accusing or else excusing one another" (Rom. ii. 14, 15). And then, too, in special cases, as that of Cornelius (Acts x.). And so likewise with the unconverted and the unregenerate in Christian lands, the disposition to faith and repentance that leads them to accept the Gospel would seem to be ascribed to the HOLY GHOST as something more and different from either of the natural elements of conscience that have been described above. But to those who have been admitted to the covenant relations with God there is promised a spiritual guidance in answer to prayer and obedience,—to those who will seek it and use it according to the terms and promises of God as revealed in His Holy Word. This influence comes, for the most part, if not wholly and exclusively, in and through what we call the conscience, and cannot always be discriminated from the other elements, especially the first and second that are named.

And if the Holy Scriptures speak of the influence of the HOLY GHOST leading us to think and to do those things that are right, they also speak of an Evil One who sometimes puts bad thoughts into our minds and leads us to do that which is wrong. Thus (Acts v. 3), "Peter, said Ananias, why hath Satan filled thine heart to lie to the HOLY GHOST?" And so also do the Scriptures speak of a "defiled conscience" (Titus i. 15), and of "a conscience" that is "seared with a hot iron" (2 Tim. iv. 2). Of the first we know nothing, perhaps, by the light of nature or reason alone, but of the latter we have abundant proof and illustration in the experience of life. The man who disregards his conscience soon comes to have no conscience at all, especially with reference to the wrong that he is doing. The conscience not only becomes "defiled," so as to guide us wrongly, and to evil, but it becomes dead,—seared as with a hot iron, so that it is insensible to guilt.

From these considerations it is very manifest that although conscience is both the voice of our nature—that nature which God hath given us—and also a special guiding influence of the HOLY GHOST, as the voice of God within us, it is not so distinct or unmixed with other influences and elements that it can be regarded as in all respects infallible. Hence the wisdom of the apparent paradox: "Man is always wrong when he does contrary to the dictates of his conscience; but he is not always right when he follows its dictates."

To understand and appreciate this paradox we must consider the difference between the guilt or innocence of the man on the one hand, and the rightness or wrongness of his acts on the other. Usually we regard a man as innocent who acts from proper and commendable motives, with due deliberation and caution, after having taken all the means in his power, or all that the occasion requires, to inform himself as to his duty, although, even under these circumstances, and with all these precautions, he may be so unfortunate as to do that which ought not to be done and which he may afterwards see occasion to regret. If, in this case, we regard the man, we should say that he was innocent and to be pitied, and we may believe that, in the sight of God, he is so; while, if we look at the act alone, and judge by its character and consequences, we should not hesitate to pronounce him guilty; he was guilty of the act, though guiltless of any bad intention or sinful motive.

With this understanding, the last part of the paradox is readily admitted as resulting from the fact that no one is infallible. He may think he is right when he is clearly in the wrong. He may be conscientious when he is actually doing a very bad thing; as was St. Paul when, before his conversion, he persecuted the Church. He thought then, as he says, that he "ought to do many things contrary to the Name of Jesus of Nazareth" (Acts xxvi. 9), and he expects pardon and favor because he did it ignorantly.

The justice of the other part of the paradox appears from the fact that a man's conscience is not a mere part of himself, like his feet, his hands, or his eyes, but it is himself, acting, or rather thinking, in a certain way, and about a certain class of things. Hence, in this view of conscience, he who acts according to his conscience is doing what, with the best means of judging and deciding at his command, he thinks he ought to do; and he who acts contrary to his conscience is doing just that which he thinks he ought not to do. Hence in doing so he is wrong, not necessarily in regard to the act he performs,—that may be all right, just the thing one ought to do,—but wrong in that he is violating the conditions of his moral nature, the means of cultivating his conscience and of keeping it alive, sensitive and true to its duty and its functions. Hence, if he follows his conscience, although the act may be wrong, he is growing and gaining in the strength of his moral nature. And however man may regard his act, we may well believe that God looks upon it with favor and will forgive it, even if He does not reward the man for the good intentions he had, even though he falls into error and does the thing he ought not; for error it may be, but sin it can hardly be called, however man may regard it.

Conscience is thus seen to be a growing faculty or grace. It grows with our moral nature. It becomes not only clearer in its indications and directions with regard to what it is our duty to do, but it also becomes much stronger and more powerful as a motive. It becomes quick, too, in its actions, as quick as the lusts of the flesh or the passions of our baser nature. It becomes a realization of God's law written and engraved on our hearts. It becomes the instinct of our second nature acquired through grace, and the struggle of the spirit against the flesh in this our warfare of life. And it may—and will finally if we go on faithful to the end—become stronger and more controlling, even as a mere matter of instinct, than any of the lusts or appetites of our baser natures.

Consent of Antiquity. Generally refers to the evidence which the writers of any one age of the Church testify to any fact or series of facts or any doctrine. The rule which has been accepted as the true test by the controversial writers of the English Church is the ancient rule of St. Vincent of Lerins,—Quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus," "What has been always held, held everywhere, held by all." Very many doctrines and practices break down as binding everywhere. In fact, the Canon of Scripture is fairly included, since it was inherited from the Jewish Church, and so additions to it could not be binding while yet the true Canon, which was mixed up with the apocryphal books in so many places, was yet contained in the lists. But the Canon of Holy Scripture has a perfectly satisfactory history. The CREEDS satisfy perfectly this rule. The LORD's day has this seal. The Apostolic rule over the Church has this seal upon it. The doctrines bound up within the words of the Creed are sanctioned by it. The two sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper, the rite of Confirmation, the use of Liturgies,—these all show the threefold stamp of the consent of Christian antiquity.

Are they therefore binding? Yes. For while these have not the very words of CHRIST ordaining them,—apart from the two sacraments,—yet they are so interlaced and so dependent the one on the other, that the witness that they were in use and order from Apostolic times makes them binding. Since the Canon of Scripture is proven by this very consent, exhibited in this threefold way, and all else depends upon Scripture for its ultimate authority, there is a binding force in this consent. Other usages may be harmless, and may be accepted by some part of the Church, but they depend upon local authority, and may be laid aside by the exercise of the same authority that created them; but no interpretation of doctrine and no new teaching can be binding, no matter how universally accepted and enforced at some one time. We can show the date of the new teaching upon Purgatory, therefore it was not always held. We can show the date of the teaching of Transubstantiation. It too fails, for it was not always held. So of the government of the various sects. It was not known in antiquity. It is an innovation, therefore it has no authority.

Consistory. The Court of a Bishop, in which the principle is that he is surrounded by the representatives of the clergy of his Diocese. In modern times the Consistory Courts are held by deputy, the Chancellor of the Diocese, or the Commissary acting for him, being the sole representative of Bishop and clergy. The Pope's Council of Cardinals is so called. Many important actions can only be taken in Consistory.

Constitution, Apostolical. A book of great value in the evidence it bears to the practices of the primitive Church, but whose actual date cannot be ascertained. A large portion of it—the first six books—was compiled, probably from materials of various dates, before the year 300 A.D. There are two different forms in which it appears, and quotations from it in Epiphanius and others do not agree with what we have in many places. It seems very likely that the compilation varied in several sections of Asia Minor. There is also a very old Syriac and an Æthiopic translation of these six books. They contain directions upon almost every topic of discipline and usage in the Church, and form a useful collection of evidence as to the practice in the third and fourth centuries. They claim to have been written or contributed to by the Apostles themselves. There is a parallel line of teaching (though but little direct similarity) in the "Pædagogus" and "Stromata" of St. Clement of Alexandria (190 A.D.). The seventh and eighth books were added later, and form a sort of Pontifical (i.e., collection of offices of Episcopal ministration) for the Eastern Church. The Clementine Liturgy closes the eighth book. It is often supposed to have been the work of some ritualist, and never put in use, but Daniel (Codex Liturgæus, Onent. Fasc. i.) tries to show that it was in common use in Antioch in St. Chrysostom's time before he arranged his own Liturgy. The following outline gives some idea of the work. The Constitutions profess on the face of them to be the words of the Apostles themselves, written down by the hand of Clement of Rome. Book I. prescribes in great detail the manners and habits of the faithful laity. Book II. is concerned chiefly with the duties of the Episcopal office, and with assemblies for divine worship. Book III. relates partly to widows, partly to the clergy, and to the administration of baptism. Book IV. treats of sustentation of the poor, of domestic life, and of virgins. Book V. has mainly to do with the subjects of martyrs and martyrdom, and with the rules for feasts and fasts. Book VI. speaks of schismatics and heretics, and enters upon the question of the Jewish Law, and of the Apostolic discipline substituted for it, and refers incidentally to certain customs and traditions, both Jewish and Gentile. Book VII. describes the two paths, the one of life, the other of spiritual death, and follows out this idea into several points of daily Christian life. Then follow rules for the teaching and baptism of catechumens and liturgical precedents of prayer and praise, together with a list of Bishops said to have been appointed by the Apostles themselves. Book VIII. discusses the diversity of spiritual gifts, and gives the forms of public prayer and administration of the Communion, the election and ordination of Bishops and other orders in the Church, and adds various ecclesiastical regulations. (Smith's Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, p. 119, Am. ed.) "With much alloy there is much of the most venerable antiquity in these remains" (Prof. Blunt, Eccl. Hist.).

Constitution, Church. A constitution is a form of Church law passed by the authority of a single person. A canon is the result of legislative deliberation. Constitutions were common in the English Church, such as the Constitution of Lanfranc, 1078 A.D., the famous and important Constitutions of Clarendon, 1164 A.D., the Constitutions of Othobon, 1268 A.D. But the present sense of the word is borrowed from the political use common to England and America now. It means a charter containing all positive fundamental law needed for the creation, well-being, and government of the body enacting or receiving this charter. In the case of the Church, however, this charter of fundamental law has no creative force, for the Church has her foundations of God, and the Constitution is merely declarative of the Church's rights, privileges, immunities, and duties. So as she conforms so much in her adaptability to all conditions of men, she is here (as in no other country) governed by the Constitution of the General Convention in her national capacity and by the several Diocesan Constitutions in her local and diocesan work.

Constitution of the Church. In order to comprehend the scope and bearing of the Constitution of what by a strange misnomer is called the "Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America," it is essential to consider the source of all legislative and governmental authority in this and in every other National or Provincial Church; also in whom, and how, that authority is vested; and herein particularly whether any part or feature of that authority comes from Diocesan delegation, or, on the other hand, whether all such functions are not inherent in the Bishops by virtue of the commission granted by our dear LORD JESUS CHRIST to His holy Apostles and their successors "even unto the end of the world." And, in considering these propositions, there must be kept clearly in view the distinction between inherent functions themselves and the mere matter of arrangement of territorial lines within which to exercise the same. The Church was founded by ALMIGHTY GOD Himself; hence is Divine. From Adam to Jacob it was patriarchal and embraced in particular families. The external government was paternal, the father being by Divine appointment teacher and ruler of his household and descendants, dictating to them the true worship of God, transmitting His blessings, pronouncing His judgments, and, as prophet, declaring His promises and threatenings. The Fathers or Patriarchs were not only princes and governors, but also were Priests of the Church. Except when otherwise especially appointed of God, the eldest son of the Patriarchal family was by Him set apart and consecrated to be Priest in the Church, endowed with the princely prerogative of being lord over his brethren, and succeeding his father in chieftaincy and government.

After Jacob, God established the Levitical Priesthood, choosing out of the Twelve Tribes of Israel that of Levi to govern and minister in holy things; and in this tribe He likewise instituted superiors and inferiors, in respect both to declaring the sentence of the law and in serving at the altar. Not only were Priests set above the Levites, but Priests above Priests (Num. iii. 6, 9, 10; iv. 15, 19, 20, 27; xvi. 1, 10). The chiefest dignity was that of High-Priest. By Divine appointment he was "chief over the chief" of the "Levites," and had "the oversight of them that" "kept the charge of the sanctuary" (Num. iii. 32). He was ruler and was "over" both Priests and Judges in Jerusalem "in all matters of the Lord" (2 Chron. xix. 8, 11).

As the Patriarchal Church and ministry developed into the Jewish, so did the Jewish into the Christian, the latter, however, into a vastly more perfect condition. The Church is and always has been one. Its identity and perpetuity have been from the beginning. The functions and ministrations of the Priesthood have varied with the different dispensations, but, nevertheless, its identity has been preserved. The threefold orders of Bishops, Priests, and Deacons, of the New Dispensation, answer and, in some sort, are referable to the Divine Priesthood of High-Priests, Priests, and Levites under the Mosaic Law. The Christian Priesthood was foretold in the prophecy of Isaiah: "They shall declare my glory among the Gentiles, and I will also take of them (the Gentiles) for Priests and for Levites, saith the Lord" (Isaiah lxvi. 19, 21). The word "Priests" as here used, included the two orders of High-Priest and Priest. Aaron was High-Priest; yet he was sometimes called merely a "Priest" (Num. xvi. 37). St. Clement of Rome, the martyr, who lived and labored with the Apostles, who was a "fellow-laborer" with St. Paul, and whose "name is written in the Book of Life" (Phil. iv. 3), in speaking of the Christian ministry, identifies it with the Levitical. He says of the former: "To the Chief-Priest his peculiar offices are given; and to the Priests their own proper place is appointed; and to the Levites appertain their proper ministries" (1 Ep. Cor. c. xli.). Our blessed LORD came not to "destroy the law" "but to fulfill" (St. Matt. v. 17). The Law of Moses remains in full force except so far as in the new order of the Christian Dispensation it became essential to abrogate it. The law was abrogated as to circumcision (Acts xv.) and as to animal sacrifices (Heb. x. to verse 27), but not in regard to the orders of the Priesthood, nor as to the pre-eminence of the High-Priest. "The Law of Moses was observed by JESUS when on earth; neither were any precepts abolished afterwards, except those which had no inherent moral character in them. . . . That part of the law the necessity of which was taken away by CHRIST, did not contain in it anything of its own nature virtuous; but consisted of things indifferent in themselves and therefore not unalterable." (Grotius, De Veritate, lib. v. sec. vii.) Now the holy triplet of the Priesthood was an essential part of the system under the Old Dispensation. CHRIST came not to destroy this essential part, but to fulfill and render it more perfect. True, the Priesthood itself was changed under the Christian Dispensation, but not the orders of the Priesthood. "Perfection" did not come "by the Levitical Priesthood," and "the Priesthood being changed" (not the orders thereof) has now become "an unchangeable Priesthood" (Heb. vii. 11, 24). It follows that in fulfillment of the Law the Priesthood of Bishops, Priests, and Deacons, in their more perfect relation than that of the Levitical ministry, is to be perpetual "even unto the end of the world." These three orders, thus to be perpetual, involve a priori superiority and inferiority of functions; which being true, the possessor of the superior must of necessity be the ruling or governing power.

Of the Christian ministry our dear LORD was the first and the great High-Priest. He was "the Apostle and High-Priest of our profession" (Heb. iii. 1). "He glorified not Himself to be made an High-Priest; but He that said unto Him, Thou art my SON; to-day have I begotten Thee" (Heb. v. 5). But after Him the High-Priests were and are "taken from among men." "Every High-Priest taken from among men is ordained for men in things pertaining to God, that he may offer both gifts and sacrifices for sins: and by reason thereof he ought as for the people, so also for himself, to offer for sins. And no man taketh this honor unto himself, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron" (Heb. v. 1, 3, 4). Now the great High-Priest and Bishop of the Church, and in whom was and is merged or absorbed the Priesthood in all its grades, while He was fulfilling His visible ministry here on earth, reproduced the Priesthood in its three distinct orders, "taking of the Gentiles for Priests and for Levites." He Himself being the first order, "callesth unto Him whom He would; and they came unto Him. And He ordained twelve that they should be with Him, and that He might send them forth to preach," etc. (St. Mark iii. 13, 14). Thus ordained, "they went out and preached that men should repent" (ch. vi. 12). And they baptized. "Jesus Himself baptized not, but His disciples" (St. John iv. 2). They afterwards "gathered themselves together unto Jesus and told Him all things, both what they had done and what they had taught" (St. Mark vi. 30). They were then further instructed in "the mysteries of the kingdom of God" (St. Luke viii. 10),—that is, the Church. Up to this time the "twelve" evidently had not been advanced beyond the second order in the ministry. "After these things the LORD appointed other seventy also" (St. Luke x. 1). They were not of equal degree with the twelve. Manifestly they were of the third order,—that of Levites or Deacons. Immediately before foreshadowing His death, our LORD, addressing St. Peter with the other disciples, promised "the Keys of Power" in these words: "I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven" (St. Matt. xvi. 19). To all His disciples on another occasion He said, "Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven, and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven" (St. Matt. xviii. 18). After His resurrection and just before the ascension, He commissioned the eleven (Judas had betrayed Him), "As my Father hath sent me, even so send I you. And when He had said this, He breathed on them and said unto them, Receive ye the HOLY GHOST; whose soever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whose soever sins ye retain, they are retained" (St. John xx. 21, 23). St. Matthew's account of the commission is, "And JESUS spake unto them saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the FATHER, and of the SON, and of the HOLY GHOST; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world" (St. Matt. xxviii. 18, 20).

By this commission the eleven were advanced from their former degree in the ministry to the Apostleship or Chief-Priesthood, not only endowed with "the power of the Keys," but having the Master's pledge to be with them and their successors "even unto the end of the world." Our LORD, having now relinquished His visible ministry, and the Apostles having been by Him further instructed "of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God" during the forty days between the Resurrection and the Ascension (Acts i. 3), their first official act was to start the line of Apostolical succession. Judas, who had been numbered with the twelve and "obtained part of this ministry," having "by transgression" fallen, it was commanded that "his Bishopric let another take." Accordingly, the Apostles, that another might "take part of this ministry and apostleship," "gave forth their lots; and the lot fell on Matthias; and he was numbered with the eleven Apostles" (Acts i. 15, 26).

The twelve Apostles correspond to the twelve Patriarchs; and they were promised by our LORD that they should "sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (St. Matt. xix. 28; St. Luke xxii. 30). A "throne" is an emblem of power; and it will be noted that the Apostles were not only to sit on "thrones," but were to "judge" the tribes of the Church. This same authority of "judging" the Church here on earth was also committed to their successors, as we have seen, "even unto the end of the world." Hooker has it that the "seventy" became Presbyters or Priests under the Apostles (Book v. c. lxxviii. 5). But whether so or not, the latter "ordained them Elders" (i. e., Presbyters or Priests) "in every Church" (Acts xiv. 23), and "seven men of honest report full of the HOLY GHOST and wisdom," Stephen and Philip among them, were also chosen and "set before the Apostles," at their command, "and when they had prayed they laid their hands on them" and ordained them Deacons (Acts vi., and see also Acts viii. 5, 12, 18, 37, 38, and 1 Tim. iii. 8-13). Thus we have Apostles, Priests, and Deacons in the Christian ministry, upon the type of and answering to the High-Priests, Priests, and Levites of the Levitical Priesthood. St. Jerome, in the fourth century, wrote: "We know from Apostolic tradition taken from the Old Testament, that what Aaron and his sons and the Levites were in the Temple, the same the Bishop and the Presbyters and the Deacons may claim to themselves in the Church" (Epist. lxxxv., Hieron ad Evang., tom. ii. 311). Again he says, "What Aaron and his sons were, that the Bishops and Presbyters are" (Hieron ad Nepotianum, Epist. ii., tom. i. 5, 14). Tertullian, in the second century, speaks of the "High-Priest, who is the Bishop" (De Bap., c. 17). Isidore of Pelusium, in the fifth century, wrote, "The Bishops succeeded the Apostles,—they were constituted through the whole world in the place of the Apostles. Aaron, the High-Priest, was what the Bishop is; and Aaron's sons prefigured the Presbyters" (Lib. ii. c. 5).

That the Apostleship was not limited to the eleven is abundantly evidenced in the New Testament itself. Matthias, Paul, Epaphroditus, Timothy, Titus, Sylvanus (Silas), Barnabas, Andronicus, and Junia, if not others, are shown by the inspired Record to have filled the Apostolic office, in addition to the eleven. This line of succession, thus recorded in the Sacred Volume, has been continued in unbroken chain down through the ages, so that our American Bishops of the present day can trace their orders and authority, step by step, from SS. Peter and Paul, through the Roman and English channels, and from St. John, through the Gallikan Bishops, and from St. James, Bishop of Jerusalem, down through Bishop David, of the Diocese of St. David, in England; all with just as much unerring certainty and precision as the line of the sovereigns of England or of the Presidents of the United States can be traced. (Vide Chapin's Primitive Church, ed. 1842, pp. 280-359, and article APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION.) The office of "Bishop," mentioned in the New Testament, was not primarily that of an Apostle. A "Bishop," as there signified, was merely a "Presbyter" or "Elder" with respect to his orders; though there is high authority for holding that such officer was possessed of a higher dignity than he who was designated merely as a "Presbyter" or "Elder," undoubtedly that of primus inter pares. But very soon after the original Apostles passed away, they who succeeded to their ordinary functions (not extraordinary, such as the power of working miracles), by way of fixing pre-eminent distinction upon those earlier Chief Priests of the Christian ministry, left the title of "Apostles" to those holy men, and assumed to themselves the name of "Bishop," though the ordinary functions of the office continued the same. The office continued,—the name only was changed. St. Hilary, the Deacon, in the fourth century, said, "They who are now called Bishops were originally called Apostles; but the holy Apostles, being dead, those who were ordained after them could not arrive at the excellency of the first; therefore they thought it not becoming to assume the name of Apostles; but dividing the name Presbyter and Bishop, they left the Presbytery the name of Presbyter, and they themselves were called Bishops" (Comm. 1 Tim., iii.). Theodoret, about 420 A.D., wrote, "Epaphroditus was called the Apostle of the Philippians, because he was intrusted with the Episcopal Government as being Bishop. For those now called Bishops were anciently called Apostles; but in the process of time the name of Apostle was left to those who were truly Apostles, and the name of Bishop was restrained to those who were anciently called Apostles. Thus Epaphroditus was the Apostle of the Philippians, Titus of the Cretans, and Timothy of the Asiatics" (Theod. in 1 Tim., c. iii. 1). Eusebius, early in the fourth century, said, "St. Peter and St. John, though honored of the Lord, yet would not themselves be, but made St. James, surnamed the Just, Bishop of Jerusalem" (Eccl. Hist., lib. ii. c. 1). St. Cyprian said, "The Lord Himself chose the Apostles, that is, the Bishops" (Cyprian, lib. iii., Ep. 9). The early commentator, under the name of St. Ambrose, remarked, "The Apostles are Bishops" (in Ephes., c. iv. t. v. 354). Grotius, in his note on Acts xxi. 18, says, "He of the Apostles who was at Jerusalem performed the office which afterwards the Bishops did, and therefore he called together the Presbyters," etc.

The identity of the office of Bishop with that of Apostle being thus apparent, let us now consider the functions of the office, especially with reference to their law-making and governing aspect, with which this paper is more directly concerned.

The Apostles whose successors the Bishops are, and are to be, "even unto the end of the world," were commissioned by the blessed SAVIOUR Himself, as we have seen, unto whom was given "all power in heaven and in earth." After the promise to them of the "keys of the kingdom of heaven" and the pledge, "Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven," and when the Great High-Priest relinquished His visible ministry, they were by Him solemnly commissioned in words before quoted: "As my FATHER hath sent me, even so send I you. . . . Receive ye the HOLY GHOST. Whosoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whosoever sins ye retain, they are retained;" "And lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." He who had "all power" over His Church, which He was "sent" to establish, and over the subordinate ministry whom He was "sent" to appoint, and did appoint, declared to His Apostles, "As my FATHER hath sent me (to send you, etc.), even so I send you" (to send others, etc.). Can it be doubted, for one instant, that, under their commission, the Apostles (who, after our Lord's visible ministry, became the High-Priests of His Church) had authority over the subordinate ministry in all matters of discipline and government? It was through the Apostles (as it is now through their successors) that all official functions flowed to them whom they ordained; and upon every principle of right reason, they who confer official functions must necessarily possess authority, within their jurisdiction, to govern and discipline subordinates to whom such functions are so imparted.

Whatever else the words of the commission quoted may import, there can be no manner of question that they bear direct reference to government and discipline in the Church here on earth, both of the clergy and laity; and this authority, conferred upon the first Apostles, beyond all controversy was intended to flow down in and through their successors "even unto the end of the world." St. Paul consecrated Timothy to the Apostolic office, and gave him charge concerning his government of the Church of the Ephesians to "stir up the gift of God which is in thee by the putting on of my hands" (2 Tim. i. 6); "Preach the word; be instant in season, out of season: reprove, rebuke, exhort with all long-suffering and doctrine" (2 Tim. iv. 2); "against an elder receive not an accusation, but before two or three witnesses" (1 Tim. v. 19);—"that is, receive not a judicial complaint," "but before two or three witnesses;" "lay hands suddenly on no man" (v. 22); "let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of double honor" (v. 17); "rebuke before all" (1 Tim. v. 20); "abide at Ephesus that thou mightest charge (command) some that they teach no other doctrine" (1 Tim. i. 3). That St. Timothy was an Apostle is shown by St. Paul's own words in 1 Thess. i. 1 and ii. 6. Eusebius says, "St. Luke, in the Acts of the Apostles, makes mention of several who were his companions, as of Timothy and Titus, of which the first was made Bishop of Ephesus, as Titus also was of the Churches in Crete" (Euseb. Hist. Eccl., lib. iii., c. 4, p. 58). The commentator, in St. Ambrose's name, in the fourth century, wrote: "St. Paul, having ordained him Bishop, writes his first epistle to him to give him instructions concerning his Episcopal office; and this epistle was written to instruct Timothy in his own person, and all other Bishops in him for their department in the Episcopal office." (Ambrosii in Ep. i. ad Tim., c. vi. See also, to substantially the same effect, Tertullian contra Marcion, lib. v., and St. Chrysostom in Homil. 10 in Tim. t. IV. Op.) Epiphanius says, "The divines speech of the Apostle teacheth who is a Bishop, and who a Presbyter, in saying to Timothy, a Bishop, 'Rebuke not a Presbyter, but exhort him as a father.' 'How could a Bishop rebuke a Presbyter, if he had no power over a Presbyter?' As also, 'Receive not an accusation against a Presbyter, but under two or three witnesses'" (Epiphan. adv. Hæres., lib. iii.; Hæres., lxxv., Par. 1622, t. i. p. 909).

This chiefly in the highest order of the priesthood appears also in the case of Titus. St. Paul says to him, "For this cause left I thee in Crete, that thou shouldst set in order the things that are wanting, and ordain elders in every city as I had appointed thee" (Titus i. 5); "Speak and exhort and rebuke with all authority" (ch. ii. 15); "a man that is an heretic, after the first and second admonition, reject" (ch. iii. 10). St. Jerome says, "Timothy was ordained Bishop of Ephesus by blessed Paul; and Titus, Bishop of Crete, preached the Gospel there and in the islands round about" (Hieron. Catal. Scriptor Eccl., t. i., 265). The Ambrosian commentator remarks, "The Apostle had consecrated Titus to be a Bishop, and therefore he warned him to be careful in ecclesiastical ordination" (Ambrosii in Ep. ad Tit. Præfatio, t. v. 419). Theodoret writes, "Titus was a notable disciple of Paul, and ordained by Paul Bishop of Crete, and authorized to make the Bishops that were under him" (Theod. Apud Œcumen. in Præfat. Epist. ad Titum. Œcumen. Op. Lutet., Par. 1631, t. ii., 285). From St. Chrysostom's account it appears that Titus was Archbishop of Crete, having other Bishops under him. (An Archbishop has no greater spiritual authority than any other Bishop. His functions as Archbishop are such only as are conferred by legislation of the Church, and sometimes of the State also, where union of Church and State exists. They are merely supervisory. He is only "chief among equals,"—i.e., equals in spiritual functions. Vide ARCHBISHOP.) St. Chrysostom says, "Titus, without doubt, was approved of for his worth, when the whole island of Crete, and the superintendency over all the Bishops thereof, was committed to his charge" (Chrysost. Homil. I. in Tit., t. iv. p. 384). Theophylact states, "That Titus was the most approved of any that attended on St. Paul, and on that account was made Bishop of the great island of Crete, and that he not only had the superintendency over all Crete, but the ordination of the Bishops thereof was committed to his care" (Theophylact in Arg. in Epist. ad Tit., 887 Op.).

As to the authority of Bishops as rulers and governors of the Church on earth, there never was any question for over fifteen hundred years after CHRIST. Sufficient already appears in this article to show this authority; but it will not be unprofitable to cite further authorities bearing on the subject. St. Ignatius was a companion of the Apostles and a disciple and pupil of St. John. About 70 A.D. he was made Bishop of Antioch, the metropolis of Syria, where the disciples were "first called Christians," and occupied that See for about thirty-seven years, when he suffered martyrdom at Rome, 107 A.D., only a very few years after the death of the Apostle St. John. This Apostolic saint and martyr wrote thus: "What is the Bishop but a one who hath principality over all, so far forth as man can have it, being to his power a follower even of God's own CHRIST?" (Ignat. Ep. ad Trall., c. vii.)

Again: "It will become you to run together according to the will of your Bishop, as also ye do. For your famous Presbytery, worthy of GOD, is fitted as exactly to the Bishop as the strings are to the harp" (Ep. ad Eph.). Again: "It will therefore behoove you, with all sincerity, to obey your Bishop," . . . "because he that does not so, deceives not the Bishop whom he sees, but affronts Him that is invisible." . . . "some call indeed their Governor, Bishop; but do all things without him. But I can never think that such as these have a good conscience, seeing they are not gathered together thoroughly, according to GOD's commandment" (Epis. ad Magn.). And again: "I exhort you that ye study to do all things in a Divine concord; your Bishop presiding in the place of GOD; your Presbyters in the place of the Council of Apostles, and your Deacons, most dear to me, being intrusted with the ministry of JESUS CHRIST" (Epis. ad Magnesians). Once more: "For whereas, ye are subject to your Bishop as to JESUS CHRIST, ye appear to me to live not after the manner of men, but according to JESUS CHRIST" (Ignat. Epis. ad Trall.).

St. Polycarp, the "Angel" or Bishop of Smyrna, referred to in Revelation ii. 8, was likewise a disciple of the Apostle St. John, and is said by his disciple St. Irenæus (lib. iii. c. 3, sec. 4) to have been made Bishop of Smyrna by the Apostles themselves. Between 107 and 116 A.D. he wrote his Epistle to the Philippians, subjoining the Epistles of St. Ignatius above referred to, with others, commending them as "treating of faith and patience, and of all things that pertain to edification in the LORD JESUS CHRIST" (Ep. Polyc. ad Phil.). St. Irenæus, in the second century, wrote: "We are able to enumerate those who were appointed by the Apostles Bishops in the Churches, and their successors, even down to ourselves, who never taught nor knew of such things as are madly dreamed of by these men" (i.e., the heretics). . . . "If this had been so, then specially and chiefly would they (the Apostles) have delivered them to those to whom they committed the Churches themselves. For it was their wish that they should be eminently perfect and irreprehensible in all things, whom also they left to be their successors, delivering (tradentes) to them their own office of gov- ernment," etc. (Irenæi adv. Hæres, lib. iii. c. 3). Speaking of the Church of Rome, Irenæus says, "The blessed Apostles, therefore, founding and instructing the Church, delivered to Linus the Bishopric, to govern the Church" (Idem). Tertullian, the latter part of the second century, said, "The High-Priest, who is the Bishop, possesses the right of conferring baptism, and after him the Presbyters; but not without the authority of the Bishop" (Tertull. de Baptismo, c. xvii., 263). Origen, early in the third century, remarked, "More is required of me (a Presbyter) than a Deacon; more of a Deacon than of a layman; but of him to whom the ecclesiastical government over us all is committed, more still is required" (Origen in Jerem., Homil. ii. t. i. Oper. 114). Again: "The power of the keys, as promised to St. Peter, in Matt. xvi. 18, 19, the Bishops of the primitive church apply to themselves. . . . It is orthodox for those Bishops so to do," etc. (Idem, tom. xii., 279.) St. Cyprian, the latter part of the first half of the third century, observed, "It is not a matter left to our own free choice whether the Bishops shall rule over us or no, but the will of our LORD and SAVIOUR is, that every act of the Church be governed by her Bishops. . . . The Church is founded upon the Bishops, by whom every ecclesiastical act is governed" (Cyp. Ep. 27, edit. Pamel., or Ep. 33, edit. Oxon., sec. 1). In another place he speaks of a Bishop as "the leader of the people, the pastor of the flock, the Governor of the Church, the Bishop of CHRIST and Priest of God" (Cyp. Ep. lxvi., ed. Erasm., lib. iv. Ep. 9).

Eusebius (who lived 270–340 A.D.) says, "Irenæus succeeded to the Bishopric of the Parish (i.e. Diocese) of Lyons, which Promethæus had ruled" (Ecl. Hist., Book v. c. 5). St. Jerome, in the last of the fourth or first of fifth century, wrote: "As with the King, so with the Bishop; or rather, still less to the Bishop than to the King, since one rules over willing, the other over unwilling, subjects" (Ep. ad Nepot., c. vii., 11). The Ambrosian commentator, writing in the fourth century, said in regard to St. Timothy, "With great vigilancy and providence doth the Apostle give precepts to the ruler of the Church; for in his person doth the safety of the people consist" (Ambros. in 1 Ep. ad Tim., c. vi. t. v. 410).

The "Ancient Canons," referred to in the office for "Ordaining or Consecrating a Bishop," and which were enacted during the purer days of the primitive Church, throw important light upon the subject under consideration. The "Apostolical Canons," so called, some ancient authors insist are genuine enactments of the Apostles themselves; but Beveridge and a majority of the most learned writers on the subject hold them to be a "collection of Canons enacted in different Synods, about the close of the second century and early part of the third." The XXXIXth of these reads thus: "Let not the Presbyters or Deacons do anything without the sanction of the Bishop; for he it is who is intrusted with the people of the LORD, and of whom will be required the account of their souls." The LVth is as follows: "If any of the clergy insult the Bishop, let him be deposed: for thou shalt not speak evil of the Ruler of the people." The Canons of the Undisputed General Councils are enactments which had the approval of the entire Christian world in the time of the primitive Church; which latter, according to our own Homilies, was "pure and uncorrupt." These and all other acts of such General Councils, and also all Canons of Provincial Councils during the period known as that of the primitive Church so far as they bear upon the matter at all, without a single exception, recognize the unquestioned power or authority inherent in the office of Bishop in all matters of government and discipline, including, of course, the enactment of laws. The Vth Canon of Nice relates to the "clergy or laity who have been excommunicated" or "cast out" by their own Bishops. The Vth of Ephesus makes provision concerning any "who have been condemned for their wrong practices . . . by their own Bishops." The IXth of Chalcedon recognizes the Bishop's judicial chieftancy in ecclesiastical matters. The VIth Canon of Gangra (a Provincial Council) provides that "if any one shall . . . presume to perform ecclesiastical acts without . . . the judgment of the Bishop, let him be anathema." Many other Ecumenical Canons, and many of those of Provincial Synods having (like Gangra) Ecumenical sanction in the first Canon of Chalcedon, might be cited, showing the jurisdiction of Bishops in ecclesiastical government and discipline; but these will suffice.

Some additional authorities of later periods, however, may, in this connection, be consulted with profit. Gregory the Great says, "The Bishops now in the Church hold the places (of the Apostles). They which have that degree of regiment have authority to bind and loose" (Greg. M. in Evang., lib. ii. Homil. xxvi. t. i. Col. 1555, sec. 5). Theophylact remarks, "They have power to bind and loose, which have the grace of a Bishop's office, as Peter had" (Theophylact. in Matth. Com., cxvi. 24). Richard Hooker tells us, "In process of time the Apostles gave Episcopal authority, and that to continue always with them which had it. . . . The Apostles, therefore, were the first which had such authority, and all others who have it after them, in orderly sort, are their lawful successors. . . . They whom we now call Bishops were usually termed, at the first, Apostles, and so did carry their very names in whose rooms of spiritual authority they succeeded" (Hooker's Works, Book vii. c. iv., 3). Again: "The Bishop's pre-eminence, we say, therefore, was twofold: first, he excelled in latitude of order; secondly, in that of power which belongeth unto jurisdiction. Priests in the law had authority and power to do greater things than Levites, the High-Priests than inferior Priests might do; therefore the Levites were beneath the Priests, and Priests inferior to the High-Priest by reason of the very degree of dignity, and of worthiness in the nature of those functions which they did execute, and not only for that the one had power to command and control the other. In like sort Presbyters having a weightier and a worthier charge than Deacons had, the Deacon was in this sort the Presbyter's inferior; and where we say that a Bishop was likewise ever accounted a Presbyter's superior, even according unto this very power of order, we must of necessity declare what principal duties," etc. (Idem, Book vii. c. vi. 1, 3). Van Espen, the great Canonist, says, "III. It appears, also, from many testimonies gathered from antiquity, that Bishops, at that time, incurred into all crimes, even those concealed (occulta), and also instituted process, that they (the Bishops) might impose penalty according to the convicted crime. IV. But this is especially to be noted what Morinus says, that Bishops exercised their jurisdiction then for all crimes, in a sacramental relation, as we now say" (Van Espen's Canons and Laws of the Church, Part III. Title vi., 42). Again: "III. Therefore from Canon Law and our daily use in speaking, those are called Judices Ordinarii who do not receive their jurisdiction from any special delegation or commission, but by force of their own dignity or office. Hence the Canonists define the Ordinary as one who has jurisdiction by his own right (jure suo),—a Bishop in his own Diocese" (Idem, Part III. Tit. v. c. ii.,—De Judice Ordinario). "A Bishop is a minister of God, unto whom with permanent continuance there is given not only power of administering the Word and Sacraments which power the Presbyters have, but also a further power to ordain ecclesiastical persons, and a power of chieftly in government over Presbyters as well as laymen, a person to be, by way of jurisdiction, a pastor even unto pastors" (Eccles. Pol., Book vii. sec. 2; 1 Gibson's Codex, xvii.; Stillingfleet's Ecl. Cases, vi., et seq.). "The very office of Consecration warrants every Bishop, in the clearest and fullest terms, to obtain authority by the Word of God for the correcting and punishing such as be unquiet, disobedient, and criminous,—i.e., for the exercise of all manner of spiritual discipline within his Diocese" (1 Gibson's Codex, xviii.). In the office for "the Consecration of Bishops," the Bishop-elect is required to promise that he will "diligently exercise such discipline as by the authority of God's Word and by the order of this Church is committed to" him. And in the same office is set forth a prayer for the Bishop-elect to ALMIGHTY GOD, that "he may faithfully serve Thee in this office to the glory of Thy Name, and the edifying and well-governing of Thy Church."

We have now seen how the Patriarchal Dispensation developed into the Mosaic, and the latter into the Christian; also how, in the matter of government and discipline, the Chief Priesthood of the Christian ministry is in harmony with, and in some sense took character from, that of each preceding dispensation. And we have likewise seen how the Commission of our blessed LORD to His beloved Apostles, and their successors in office, has been understood and construed and acted upon, in the Christian Church all through the ages, as constituting them chief rulers in matters ecclesiastical. But the functions exercised by a Bishop are not merely his own, but those of the College of Apostles, whereof he is one, whom he represents within his jurisdiction, and from or through whom he derives the authority of his office. "Episcopatus unus est cujus a singulis in solidum pars tenetur." The government of a Bishop, however, was never intended to be arbitrary or irresponsible. He must answer to his peers for misconduct; but, to our shame be it said, there is no other branch of the Church on earth where practically he is under so little restraint against oppression and wrong as in this land of boasted justice; nor does the history of the Christian Church through all the centuries furnish another instance wherein the inferior clergy have been or are so powerless as are ours to resist the tyranny of a despotic Bishop, no provision for appeal being made, or other adequate remedy provided.

While the authority of the Episcopate in solidum is exercised by a single Bishop over the inferior clergy and the laity in his Diocese, yet the same authority subsists in the College of Bishops of a Provincial (which in this country is the National) Church over each individual Bishop thereof, and also, under the regulation of law, over his Diocese as well. Such Bishops have the inherent authority to make laws for the government of all the various Dioceses of their Province or organized jurisdiction, and the Bishops thereof, so far as the same may be consistent with Divine and Catholic law, notwithstanding the distinctive jurisdiction devolving upon each Bishop; and, by Ecclesiastical Law, no vacancy in a Bishopric can be filled except in virtue of their authority. Moreover, in a proper case, they may deprive one of their number of his individual jurisdiction. Thus it will be perceived that there is and can be no such thing as an independent Bishop or an independent Diocese, any more than a member of the human body can be independent of the particular body to which it belongs. The member being separated, its functions cease, and it must die.

For the more efficient exercise of the inherent authority and functions of the Universal Episcopate, the primitive Church (being that nearest to the time of the visible ministry of our LORD) established a distributive system or economy of Church government, which at a very early day was conformed, for its lines of territorial jurisdiction, to the civil divisions of the Roman Empire. This system was not only recognized by, but entered into the law of the Universal Church, as is evidenced by very many enactments of the Undisputed General Councils, and also by those of Provincial Synods having Ecu- menical confirmation. It is not important, for the purposes of this article, to trace the details of this system; but it should be stated that the Province was an essential factor. It consisted of an aggregation of Sees (now also called Dioceses) having its Synod of Bishops, over which the Metropolitan presided, and which enacted laws, heard appeals, etc. Prior to the General Council of Nice, two or three Bishops might consecrate a Bishop, but, by the IVth Canon of Nicæa, it was decreed that "It is most proper that a Bishop should be constituted by all the Bishops of a Province; but if this be difficult on account of some urgent necessity, or because of distance, three at least should meet together, and the suffrages be taken, those of the absent Bishops also being communicated in writing, then the ordination should be made," etc. By the XXIIIrd Canon of Antioch (approved by the Ecu- menical Council of Chalcedon) it was enacted that "It shall not be lawful for a Bishop, even at the close of life, to appoint another as successor to himself; and if any such thing should be done, the appointment shall be void. And the Ecclesiastical Law must be observed, that a Bishop must not be constituted otherwise than with a Synod and with the judgment of the Bishops, who, after the decease of a former Bishop, have the authority to promote the man who is worthy." The succession in the Episcopate, therefore, cannot be kept up, within the lines of law, by less than three Bishops acting in concurrence with the judgment of the other Bishops of the Province. Thus three Bishops are necessary to perpetuate their own order; and no perfect National or Provincial Church can exist with less than three.

In harmony with these propositions, and no doubt recognizing them as fundamental, those who acted in the matter did not formally adopt the Constitution of the "Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States" until after the requisite number of Bishops had been consecrated in order to the organization of a Provincial Church in this country. On the 5th day of August, 1789 A.D., the following resolutions were passed by the Convention, Bishop White presiding:

"Resolved, That a complete order of Bishops, derived as well under the English as the Scottish line of Episcopacy, doth now subsist within the United States of America, in the persons of the Right Rev. William White, D.D., the Right Rev. Samuel Provoost, D.D., and the Right Rev. Samuel Seabury, D.D.

"Resolved, That the said Bishops are fully competent to every act and duty of the Episcopal office and character in these United States, as well in respect to the consecration of other Bishops, and the ordering of Priests and Deacons, as for the government of the Church, according to such rules, canons, and institutions as now are, or hereafter may be duly made and ordained by the Church."

Three days thereafter the Constitution was formally adopted and signed by the members of the Convention; but it then had no operative effect except as an agreement by the consenting Dioceses to a National or Provincial union and jurisdiction on the terms and conditions expressed in the instrument. In other words, the Dioceses in effect thereby merely consented to provincial jurisdiction on the conditions indicated. The breath of life was afterwards infused into the Constitution by the assent thereto of the Bishops; without which assent the instrument would have had no vitality. There was no pretense of conferring functions on the Bishops. Any such attempt by the Dioceses or their representatives would have been gross impertinence. On the contrary, the effect of the Constitution was and is, by the voluntary assent thereto by the Bishops, to limit the exercise of their inherent functions in the aggregated or National jurisdiction, according to the terms of that instrument, and, among the rest, to bind them not to exercise their law-making authority without the advice and consent of the clergy and laity as represented in the House of Deputies, which latter body are, by the Constitution, in reality made the Bishop's Assessors, or Council of Advice, with permanent continuance as such, and with the right to initiate and veto measures. But no measure can have the force of law without the Bishop's assent.

As shown by the writings of St. Cyprian and other Fathers, and by the proofs in Van Espen, Provincial Councils of the Church were probably not held until about the middle of the second century; prior to which time, each Bishop made all the rules or laws for his Diocese. The clergy then formed his Council of Advice, and as such were convened whenever the Bishop desired; but they had no control. And a Bishop may still make rules for the government of his own Diocese, so far as the same may not be inconsistent with superior law, and except so far as by constitutional restriction, enacted by his own consent or that of a predecessor, he may be prevented from asserting this prerogative of his office. (See Stillingfleet's Eccl. Cases, 336.) Originally, when Provincial and other Councils came to be held in the early Church, Bishops only were received to membership; but afterwards others were admitted, only, however, as advisory members, and never being entitled to vote. No Canons or other measures were enacted except by the voice and vote of the Bishops; nor has there ever been to this day, nor can there be, any valid Church legislation without Episcopal sanction.

It will be perceived that constituting the House of Deputies as an advisory body to the House of Bishops in the General Convention is not out of harmony with the spirit of primitive custom; but the negative on legislative action, which by concession the Bishops have accorded to that body, is a departure from such custom. Nevertheless, in this feature, the principle is not contravened that validity of ecclesiastical legislation depends upon the assent of Episcopal authority.

It follows from what has been said that the General Convention derives none of its powers by delegation from the Dioceses, and that the Constitution takes all its vitality through concession of the Bishops in respect to the exercise of their inherent functions within the National or Provincial jurisdiction consented to by the Dioceses, and under the limitations imposed. In the State, under our theory of government in this country, power ascends from the people; whereas, in the Church, it descends from above. The Priest takes so much as he possesses of the power of the Keys and other functions (such as authority to administer the sacraments) by delegation from or through the Bishop; but he is endowed with no inherent legislative function. Neither Priest nor layman possessing any inherent authority of legislation, no Diocese, in its own right, can have any such power. Whatever part it may take in making Diocesan law is by virtue of Episcopal consent, as in the case of the House of Deputies in General Convention; and no enactment of a Diocesan Convention or Council can have validity without the Bishop's approval. The Dioceses, of their own right, possessing no functions of legislation, of course can impart none by delegation. In other words, they cannot impart what they do not possess.

Accordingly, and manifestly in recognition of the fundamental principles herein set forth, there is no attempt in the Constitution to delegate or even to enumerate powers. That instrument assumes that the needed powers exist, and in this regard, deals only with the manner of exercising them. The language is not in all cases felicitous. For instance, in the 3d Article it is provided that "The Bishops of this Church, when there shall be three or more, shall, whenever General Conventions are held, form a separate House, with a right to originate and propose acts for the concurrence of the House of Deputies," etc. At first blush, this would seem like an attempt to confer on the House of Bishops "a right;" but, on reflection, it will be seen that the provision is simply an infelicitous expression of the method adopted for ascertaining the consent or "concurrence of the House of Deputies," without which, by operation of the Constitution, the Bishops have agreed that their legislative "acts" shall be inoperative. All laws must be construed in view of surrounding circumstances existing at the time of their enactment, particularly with reference to pre-existing laws in pari materia; and especially must be construed in subordination to existing fundamental law. Therefore it would do violence to all rules of construction to hold that those who framed this provision intended by it to confer, in any degree, the right of legislation upon the Bishops, which already existed in virtue of law higher than any Constitution ever framed by man. The emphatic and objective point at which the provision is directed, therefore, is the concurrence of the "House of Deputies."

But another provision of this Article is of such a character as to require special notice. It is this: "And in all cases the House of Bishops shall signify to the Convention their approbation or disapprobation (the latter with their reasons in writing) within three days after the proposed act shall have been reported to them for concurrence; and in failure thereof, it shall have the operation of a law." This provision of the Constitution contemplates the possibility of an act having "the operation of law" without the approbation of the Bishops; hence itself is "unconstitutional," as being in direct conflict with the fundamental or Higher Law by which our blessed LORD Himself commissioned the Apostles and their successors as the chief rulers and law-makers of His Church. As before stated, without the Bishops' approbation no law of the Church can be enacted; hence this provision is ultra vires and void. It cannot be held that the provision acquires validity because the Bishops consented to the Constitution, and thus delegated to the House of Deputies the power of legislation in the contingency indicated; for the exercise of such legislative functions cannot be delegated. As well might a Presbyter undertake to delegate his priestly functions to a layman; and with stronger reason might it be argued that the Congress of the United States is capable of delegating its powers to the heads of Departments at Washington, or one house thereof its functions to the other.

From the philosophy of this article, and from the authorities cited, by which its propositions are sustained, it is believed that no impartial mind can do otherwise than conclude that the General Convention has plenary powers of ecclesiastical legislation, subject only to Divine and Catholic law and the limitations of the Provincial Constitution.

It was not the purpose, in preparing this paper, to discuss at large the details of the Constitution, but only to consider the general scope of that instrument and the underlying or fundamental principles that must govern its construction; but there is one other feature, already alluded to in an incidental way, which may, in conclusion, appropriately be considered; and that is, the name which the Constitution has given to our branch of the Holy Catholic Church. "Names are things," and sometimes teaching things, as in the present instance. Adjectives qualify the meaning of nouns; and, to the ordinary mind, "Protestant Episcopal" signifies the chief characteristics of the Church that bears the burden of such designation. The idea conveyed to the untutored by "Protestant," thus conspicuously occupying the foreground, is that the prime object of the Church so labeled is to "protest," instead of preaching the Gospel, ministering the sacraments, and saving souls. True, the Church protests against error in every form, be it Romish, Protestant, Agnostic, or otherwise, but her mission is affirmative, objective,—not that of negation. In solemn Creed we declare our belief in "the Holy Catholic Church" (or, in other words, the Church Universal),—not in a "Protestant Episcopal" sect. The title "Protestant Episcopal" does not surely describe the insignia of the Spouse of CHRIST and of that Faith which for more than fifteen hundred years has the quod semper, ubique, et ab omnibus of the Christian world.

The designation "Episcopal" implies that there can be a Church, in the proper meaning of the word, that does not hold to episcopacy. One might as well speak of a man's gender as being that of a masculine male, or of a person skilled in treating diseases of the eye as an eye oculist. The Church—the Spouse of CHRIST—is One, and not divided into Episcopal and non-Episcopal fragments. "There is one Body . . . one LORD, one Faith, one Baptism" (Eph. iv. 4, 5). Our blessed LORD established only the one Church. If we are not of this fold,—if the Church of our love bears not the essentials that have characterized the Bride of CHRIST for nearly nineteen centuries,—if she cannot trace her ancestry, step by step, through all the ages, back to our LORD JESUS and His Apostles,—then duty to GOD and our souls requires of us the utmost haste in renouncing allegiance to her authority, and in seeking out and conforming to the true fold. Organized separation from the Church Catholic is schism; and schism is sin. That there are vast numbers of devoted Christian people living in such separation is only too true. It is not for us to judge them, but to pray ALMIGHTY GOD "to bring into the way of truth all such as have erred, and are deceived," and, at the last, to reward all faithful people in His everlasting kingdom. The Good Master prayed the FATHER "for the men Thou gavest me out of the world," adding, "Neither pray I for them alone, but for them also which shall believe on me through their word: that they all may be one; as Thou, FATHER, art in me, and I in Thee, that they also may be one in us" (St. John xvii. 6, 20, 21). But schismatic or dissenting societies are not of the "one fold" of the Good Shepherd, nor do they heed His prayer that believers in Him "all may be one." "And other sheep I have, which are not of this fold; them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice; and there shall be one fold and one Shepherd" (St. John x. 16). For over fifteen hundred years after CHRIST's visible ministry not one of these schismatic societies or organizations existed presuming to call itself a "Church"; nor during all that time was there any pretense of a "Church" existing in all the world, or that could exist, without the threefold ministry commissioned by our LORD, and in turn by His Apostles. It was St. Ignatius, the disciple and pupil of the Apostle St. John, who, in his epistle to the Trallians, said of Bishops, Priests, and Deacons, "without these there is no Church." Thus it appears that the maxim Nulla Ecclesia sine Episcopo is of no modern origin. And thus it also appears how tautological it is, and how unbecoming (at least for members of the one household of Faith) to designate our Mother as the "Episcopal" Church. But this tautology is less to be deplored than the narrowness and one-idea shallowness signified by "Protestant." No other branch of the Catholic Church has ever been, by her own children, subjected to the burden of such a dwarfing description.

HON. S. CORNING JUDD, LL.D.

Consubstantiation. A theory Luther held with regard to the Real Presence of CHRIST in the Eucharist. It was as to the manner, a part of the truth not revealed to us, and therefore the English Church wisely does not attempt to define, but simply and absolutely to declare her belief in His presence in the LORD's Supper. Luther used the illustration of the fire heating the iron to a white heat but not changing the nature or the weight of the iron. His view has not been accepted at all,—the Romanist defending transubstantiation, the English and Oriental Churches not defining, but accepting and declaring the Real Presence, and the Protestant denominations generally holding the Zwinglian theory of mere commemoration with more or less definiteness.

Contrition. The first essential step to a true repentance. Repentance is a state in which the soul must continue (as is also Faith), not a single act, which may then be dismissed. Attrition is merely the beginning of contrition. Attrition is rather a fear of consequences, not a sorrow for sin, and therefore is akin to the sorrow of the world which worketh death (2 Cor. vii. 10). But contrition involves with the sorrow for sin also a hatred of it for itself, and an energetic casting of it. But this cannot be done at once. As sin in general is practiced and becomes habitual, and the soul is educated in it, so the soul, to throw it off, can only do so by patient habitual counter-action. It has to learn to hate what it once loved, and to love what it once hated, to become indifferent to the sins that once gave it pleasure, and to eagerly practice, till it does enjoy, the pure and holy thoughts and hopes to which it was once indifferent. The sorrow and the struggle together mark the true contrition, the broken heart. God can heal, but the sacrifice must be a truly broken heart. This share of contrition in the education of the heart is an essential factor in the Christian's development through the state of repentance. So St. Paul always was eagerly contrite for his persecution of the Church, and this sorrow inflamed his love to his Lord still more, while it abased him in his own sight. A true contrition never loses sight of the sins, whether of commission or omission, to be forsaken, and whose return is to be guarded against. A true contrition tries to fill the void left by the renunciation of evil habits or of sins by other and holy habits and acts. There is no greater danger to the soul than to be empty, swept, and garnished (St. Matt. xii. 44). And this contrition is also bound up in confession of the sin and satisfaction or reparation. These three require a continual practice and form the state of repentance. Therein is the real test of a true repentance.

Convent. A religious house, usually for nuns.

Conventicle. Properly, a little convent, a secret cabal of monks in a convent to make a party in the election of an Abbot. Hence a schismatical gathering, and so is used in England as the legal term to describe any place of worship used by dissenters. The wording of the 73d Canon of 1603 A.D. is clear, and includes meetings of the ministers of the Church as well as of those who reject her ministrations. "For as much as all conventicles and secret meetings of priests and ministers have ever been justly accounted very hateful to the state of the Church wherein they live, we do ordain that no priests or ministers of the Word of God, nor any other persons, shall meet together in any private house or elsewhere to consult upon any matter or course to be taken by them, or upon their motion or discretion by any other, which may any way tend to the impeaching or depraving of the doctrine of the Church of England, or the Book of Common Prayer, or any part of the government or discipline now established in the Church of England, under pain of excommunication ipso facto."

Convention. The meeting of the Bishops, clergy, and laity in council, generally but once in the year. This name for Diocesan Synods is peculiar to the American Church. It has been changed for the older and more appropriate name of Council in the Dioceses of Arkansas, Florida, Fond du Lac, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Minnesota, Mississippi, Nebraska, Texas, Virginia, West Virginia, and Wisconsin. The Diocese of Springfield uses the title Synod. The Province of Illinois has formed a Federate Council. Anciently the Diocesan Synods met twice a year.

The organization of the Convention demands the presence of the Bishop, with his clergy, in person, and the laity, by their delegates, from the several parishes of the Diocese having a right to representation. In truth, every parish being an integral part of the Diocese, has an inalienable right to representation, and every clergyman has a seat by right of office. So the phrase usual in the constitutional instruments and in the Canons of parishes, "in union with this Convention," is wrong in principle and fraught with possible mischief. The Bishop sits with, and presides over, the whole body by right of office; but frequently the practice is to elect a President out of the body of the Priests, who can preside as occasion serves. Sometimes a Bishop has claimed the right to act as a Bishop, and not as mere presiding officer, and in some instances he has claimed two votes upon this ground. The Convention is not a gathering of clergy and laity from a congeries of parishes, but is the legislative body of the Diocese, and therefore a representative body of the whole estate of the Church. The Diocese needs the Convention, the Convention does not create the Diocese, but merely organizes and harmonizes its work. A parish in propriety cannot be deprived of its seat so long as it is a parish, but it may be made amenable to discipline. The Convention meets at the appointed time, or, in case of emergence, is called into special session by the ecclesiastical authority, which is either the Bishop or, in the vacancy of the Diocese, the Standing Committee. The Convention takes cognizance of the conditions on which the members take their seats; elects its own officers, who are usually also Diocesan officers; directs how the several committees and delegations shall be constituted; in case of vacancy elects a Bishop; enacts Canons of discipline and of Diocesan organization and work; takes order on the finances of the Diocese; admits parishes and advises on the state of the Church; consents to or rejects all proposed changes in the rubrics and order of the Prayer-Book and in the Constitution of the General Convention, begun in or proposed to the General Convention. Its Canons are binding upon all the members of the Church alike,—Bishop, clergy, and laity,—and its decisions and resolutions demand heedful consideration from every member of the Diocese. Its functions, therefore, are those of a deliberative body, and it is conducted with all the gravity and decorum of, and under the same rules that obtain usually in, deliberative and legislative bodies.

Federate, or Council of the Dioceses within any State is authorized by Canon 7, Tit. III., of the "Digest." It sets forth the authorization in these terms:

"It is hereby declared lawful for the Dioceses now existing, or hereafter to exist within the limits of any State or Commonwealth, to establish for themselves a Federate Convention or Council representing such Dioceses, which may deliberate and decide upon the common interests of the Church within the limits aforesaid; but before any determined action of such Convocation or Council shall be had, the powers proposed to be exercised thereby shall be submitted to the General Convention for its approval. Nothing in this Canon shall be construed as forbidding any Federate Council from taking such action as they may deem necessary to secure such legislative enactments as the common interests of the Church in the State may require."

The Dioceses in the State of Illinois have so far only formed themselves into a Federate Council, viz., Chicago, Quincy, and Springfield, under the Presidency of the Rt. Rev. Alex. Burgess, S.T.D. It is composed of the Bishops of the three Dioceses, and of five clerical and five lay delegates from each Diocese. It will meet on the second Tuesday in November, 1884 A.D., in St. Paul's Church, Springfield.

Conversion. A term that has had more meanings forced into it than it can bear, and for which meanings other accurate terms are used by the Church. In popular use conversion is made to stand, first, for REGENERATION, secondly, for SANCTIFICATION. It cannot bear these meanings, for its real root means a turning away,—i.e., from one state to another. I. The conversion of the Gentiles from heathenism to Christianity. II. The conversion from a state of sin to a state of repentance. "There will I teach transgressors Thy way, and sinners shall be converted unto Thee" (Ps. li. 13). III. Conversion from a wavering character to one of firmness, as in St. Peter's case, where he was already a believer and a deeply religious man. IV. St. Paul's conversion was not from irreligion to Christianity, but from an enthusiastic zeal in behalf of Judaism, leading to persecution, to an equally enthusiastic zeal in behalf of Christianity, leading to lowly patience and forbearance, and energetic work.

These are the scriptural types of conversion, only one of which coincides with the state of repentance, but none of which at all coincide with its modern popular use to mean Regeneration, which is God's own gift, and SANCTIFICATION, which is the gift of the HOLY GHOST working with our hearts. Conversion cannot be without the help of the HOLY SPIRIT, but it is only preparative to the reception of God's gift of regeneration in baptism (vide REGENERATION), and is a state in which we should live, i.e., of repentance; SANCTIFICATION is the gift of the HOLY GHOST, as by our humble use of the means of grace we are daily better fitted to receive and to live in it.

Convocation (in England). Convocation is an assembly of the spirituality of the realm of England, summoned by the Archbishops, pursuant to the queen's writ, whenever a Parliament is summoned, and it is continued or discharged at the same time that Parliament is prorogued or dissolved. The analogy is still further continued in the Constitution of Convocation, which consists of the Suffragan Bishops in the Upper House, and of the Deans, Archdeacons, a Proctor or proxy for each Chapter, and two from each Diocese in the Lower House of Convocation; and in respect of this Constitution it would appear to be of older date than Parliament itself, and to form like it an integral part of the body politic of England. The objects for which Convocation is summoned are to consult on matters which concern the crown, the security and defense of the Church of England, and the tranquillity, public good, and defense of the realm itself. Convocation formerly asserted and exercised the right of enacting ecclesiastical Canons, and of voting subsidies to the crown; but the former right was greatly restricted by Henry VIII., and by later acts of Parliament; and the latter was silently abandoned in 1664 A.D.; since which time the clergy have been taxed like other citizens. But this right had been little more than a nominal one, for after the time of Henry VIII. the votes of subsidies were always confirmed by Parliament. Certain Convocations are of great importance in the history of the State and Church of England; in particular that of 1529 A.D., establishing the king's supremacy; that of 1562 A.D., confirming the Articles of Religion; that of 1603 A.D., enacting certain Canons; and that of 1661 A.D., completing the revision of the Prayer-Book.

As there was little or nothing to do on ordinary occasions, the sessions of Convocation seldom occupied more than a few days, the meeting either adjourning itself or being prorogued by royal writ. But about the close of the seventeenth and the beginning of the eighteenth century a factious spirit so prevailed in the Lower House that the sittings were distinguished by unseemly contentions with the Bishops of the Upper House; and in 1717 A.D. Convocation was prorogued, and not again assembled for business for more than a hundred years, until, under Victoria, through the influence of Bishops Wilberforce, of Oxford, and Philpotts, of Exeter, it was again permitted to resume activity, both as a consultative and a deliberative body. Convocation differs from an ordinary Provincial Council in that the latter is comprised of Bishops, and meets to consult on matters which concern the faith and peace of the Church as a religious body, while the former has other objects and is a representative body. Each Province, Canterbury and York, has its own Convocation.

Authorities: Encyclopædia Britannica, and Student's Hume.

Convocation of 1529 A.D., The. Henry VIII., of England, having determined at any cost to effect a divorce from Queen Catherine, summoned a Parliament to deal with that question and with other matters of equal importance. The Parliament assembled in 1529 A.D., and at the same time Convation came together. Almost the first thing done in Parliament was to pass three acts regulating the probate of wills (which was a right of the Ecclesiastical Courts), the charge or fee of the clergy called "Mortuaries," and the obtaining license from Rome for holding pluralities; which acts amounted to a direct blow at the authority of the Pope in England. Convocation was far from pleased by them, and in response made an address to the king in behalf of their privileges. But it was of no avail, for the bills soon became law.

At the next session of Parliament in 1530 A.D., as there seemed no prospect of any assistance from the Pope in the matter of the king's divorce, steps were taken to decree it without reference to his authority, and a bill was brought into Parliament making it penal to introduce bulls from Rome; about the same time the whole clergy of England were declared guilty of breaking the statute of Præmunire (a law to restrain English ecclesiastics from acting under papal authority), and a heavy fine was imposed upon them as a penalty. Before accepting the fine to be levied, however, the clergy were informed that it must be accompanied by an acknowledgment that the king was the supreme head of the Church of England. Against this admission Convocation stood out for some time, but after considerable negotiation and discussion of phrases, the wording that the king is "the singular protector, the only and supreme lord, and as far as is permitted by the law of CHRIST, even the supreme head" of the Church, was fixed upon and passed by Convocation, apparently because not objected to when put to the vote. But the position of the clergy with reference to the crown and to Parliament was not yet sufficiently defined; and in 1532 A.D. the House of Commons brought an address to the king reciting many heavy charges against them. Against this address a reply was framed by Bishop Gardiner, and still another reply by a committee of the Lower House of Convocation; but the king was unyielding, and Convocation was required to subscribe the three following articles: (1) No constitution or ordinance should hereafter be enacted or put forth by the clergy without the king's consent. (2) That a committee of thirty-two persons be appointed to review the ancient Canons, and to abrogate such as shall be formed prejudicial to the king's prerogative and onerous to his highness's subjects. (3) That all such Canons as shall be approved shall stand good when ratified by the king's consent. To these articles the Lower House soon agreed; but the Bishops made more resistance, and would only agree to a form in which the third article was evaded, which was voted in May, 1532 A.D.; but even then not unanimously. By these acts was accomplished the abandoning of the Pope's supremacy and the establishment of that of the king, in the submission of the clergy. (See Perry's History of the Church of England.)

Convocations in the Church in the United States must not be confounded with the official assemblies of the same name in the Church of England, where they form a regularly authorized part of the Establishment under the laws of both Church and State. In the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States there is no constitutional or canonical provision for the organization of any such bodies, but in most or all of the Dioceses the term Convocation has long been applied to stated assemblies of the clergy, with occasionally a lay element, regulated to some extent by the Diocesan Canons, but all more or less of a voluntary character. The constitution, duties, objects, and authority of Convocations differ widely in the various Dioceses, though there are a few prominent features common to all. The Diocese is usually territorially divided into such a number of Convocations as will insure the convenient assembling of a sufficient number of the clergy. The Bishop is, ex officio, the presiding officer of each when he is present. The meeting lasts two or three days, which are devoted to frequent public services, to private devotional exercises, to the discussion in public and among themselves by the clergy of timely and important topics of doctrinal or practical interest, and to social intercourse and relaxation. There is generally more or less of a missionary character given to all the exercises, and the opportunity is frequently used for doing mission work at outlying points in the neighborhood of the place of assembly. Efforts are made to stir up missionary zeal and to stimulate the work of Church extension. The meetings are thus of great value in discovering the missionary needs of the Diocese and developing methods of meeting them, though the Convocations are not the authorized Diocesan missionary organizations, special boards, elected by the Convocations, being intrusted with that work.

A custom has grown into use in some Dioceses, dating from the Lambeth Conference, of applying to the presiding Presbyter of each Convocation the title of Dean. There is in this a certain degree of convenience and appropriateness, but it may lead to confusion of ideas, unless we bear distinctly in mind the essential difference between these officers and the Deans of the Church of England. The latter belongs entirely to the organization of the Cathedral system, with some special exceptions, none of which bear any but the most remote analogy to the Presidents of the American Convocations. The analogies are equally remote in the case of Archdeacons, a title recently adopted in some American Dioceses. The nearest approach to the office is probably to be found in the English Rural Deans, although here, also, there are essential differences, as well in authority as in function. A Dean of Convocation holds his office either by the election of the clergy constituting the body, or by the appointment of the Bishop on their nomination. He may or may not be officially recognized by Diocesan Canon. His duties are determined in the same voluntary and irregular way. The office is therefore honorary, and of the most restricted character. It is evident that the possibilities of usefulness which are offered by Convocations have not yet been developed, nor can they be while these assemblies are mere voluntary gatherings of the clergy, with various and uncertain objects and authority. Systematized and unified in their Constitution and methods, and officially recognized as a part of the organization of the Church under the General and Diocesan Canons, they may become powerful instrumentalities for good. The following Constitution is suggested as a guide towards the accomplishment of this end, its principal features having been for years successfully tested in the Diocese of Easton.

The territorial division and the stated meetings three times a year are fixed by the Canons of the Diocese. The Bishop is always present, if possible, taking an active part in all the exercises, arranging, when necessary, his official visitation of the parishes to suit the time of meeting in each. The meetings are held in the various parishes in rotation, the times being fixed by the Bishop and Deans at each Annual Convention, and published with the journal. At each anniversary meeting a Secretary is elected and a Dean electively nominated to the Bishop for his appointment. The Bishop and the Deans, with two or more lay members, elected by the Convention, constitute the Diocesan Board of Missions, and, with the approval of the Convention, control the entire missionary work of the Diocese. Topics for discussion are carefully selected by the respective Deans in consultation with the Bishop, thoroughly syllabused and the parts assigned to selected speakers, and sent out in printed circulars one month before each stated meeting. These are discussed before the congregation after evening prayer, one of them being always of a missionary character. For example:

TOPIC.—THE CHRISTIAN LIFE.

- | | |
|--------------------------|-------------|
| I. Its Beginnings..... | Rev. A. B. |
| II. Its Sustainance..... | Rev. C. D. |
| III. Its Objects..... | Rev. E. F. |
| IV. Its Reward..... | The Bishop. |

By this means unified, accurate, and systematic teaching is assured. The rector may suggest one of the topics upon which he specially desires his congregation to be instructed. These topics take the place of the sermon at evening service, the treatment being extempore or by short written papers, as the clergy assigned may elect or may be specially requested by the Bishop.

Lay speakers are sometimes selected. A limit is usually assigned, and the exercises varied by the singing of hymns. There are three evening and two morning services, the latter with sermon and the Holy Communion at the first. There may be an offertory at each service to defray the expenses of the clergy, and there must be one for missionary purposes. In addition to these public exercises the clergy meet together in private, and after devotional services confer upon matters of current interest. A feature of great value has been the selection of some competent Presbyter as Preceptor, under whose guidance the other clergy carefully and critically study some previously assigned passage in the Greek Testament. In addition to all this there is opportunity for each rector or missionary to make a report of the special needs of his cure, of the prospects and best methods of Church extension therein, and of the probable amount of contributions to be expected. By these means the double object may be accomplished of stimulating interest in Church work and systematizing the methods of its performance.

Cope (cappa, whence cape). A cloak-shaped vestment which was originally a secular garment, worn as a protection against rain. As an ecclesiastical vestment it cannot be certainly traced earlier than St. Benedict's time (529 A.D.). As it was more withdrawn from common use it was made of costlier material and was more richly ornamented. Its modern form is a cloak of an exact semicircle with a border (osphrey) on the straight side, frequently very rich with figures and lambant work. The straight side should be ten feet in length, and when worn, the cope is fastened in front by a clasp called a morse. It was one of the vestments directed in the famous Ornaments Rubric in Edward VI. Prayer-Book; and in Cathedrals the cope is a very common vestment. (Vide VESTMENTS.)

Coptic Church. The Monophysite or Jacobite Christians of Egypt, who have since the seventh century maintained a schism, which at first comprised the larger part of the Egyptian Church, but which has been dwindling away. The Copts are the descendants of the ancient Egyptians, whose language passed into the present liturgical language of the Church. The Coptic was a spoken language, with much corruption and introduction of new terms, and was related to the Egyptian of the Pharaohs. It was a vernacular tongue till the sixteenth century, since which time it has disappeared, the last person who spoke it, so far as can be ascertained, dying in 1633 A.D.

The Copts refused to accept the deposition of Dioscorus, their Patriarch, by the Council of Chalcedon, and this led to the schism. Timothy (457 A.D.) was the first to usurp patriarchal functions. After various attempts at reconciling the orthodox (Melchites) and the Jacobites, the latter took final shape as a sect about 517 A.D. It was strengthened by the long vacancies which occurred in the orthodox See of Alexandria, and at one time was all-powerful. Now it numbers about one hundred thousand members, and, it is said, is losing ground before Mohammedanism. (Vide Neale's History of the Patriarchate of Alexandria.)

Corporal. The linen cloth spread over the consecrated bread after the communion. Its use, as directed in the rubric, "that a fair linen cloth shall be reverently placed over what remaineth of the consecrated Elements after all have communicated," can be traced directly to the fifth century, but from its nature must date from the earliest times that the Holy Tables were in use also. The term anciently meant both the fair white linen cloth which covered the Holy Table, and also the covering ordered for the Elements, and was to be always of pure white linen.

Corpus Christi. A feast instituted in 1264 A.D., and held on Thursday after Whitsunday. It is based upon the doctrine of Transubstantiation, when that was made an article of Faith.

Councils, Œcumenical. An Œcumenical or General Synod is an assembly which represents the universal Church, and not, like a Provincial or National Synod, only a particular region. It is not enough that such an assembly should be summoned from the whole Church, but it is also necessary that its decrees shall be universally accepted, and this is the only final proof of its Œcumenical character. Its authority arises not from the number of Bishops present, but from the approbation of the Catholic Church dispersed throughout the world. If this condition is fulfilled, no defects in the composition of the Council or criticism of its procedure can avail to throw doubt upon its judgments.

Bishops alone had an authoritative voice, but Priests, Deacons, and even laymen might take part in the deliberations. Thus, at the Council of Nicæa, we are told that there was an "innumerable throng" of Priests, Deacons, and Acolytes. St. Athanasius, then only a Deacon, was the chief defender of the orthodox faith.

General Councils were only called when the integrity of the Faith was threatened. Their office was not to add to "the Faith once delivered to the Saints," but to attest it or define it as against heresy. Thus the Faith attains exact or dogmatic expression.

Six Synods alone have been universally received by the Catholic Church, as follows: 1, the Council of Nicæa, in Bithynia, 325 A.D.; 2, the first Council of Constantinople, 381 A.D.; 3, the Council of Ephesus, 431 A.D.; 4, the Council of Chalcedon, 451 A.D.; 5, the second Council of Constantinople, 553 A.D.; 6, the third Council of Constantinople, 680 A.D. The Oriental Church admits a second Council of Nicæa 787 A.D. The Roman Church asserts the Œcumenical character of several others, but the number is not definitely agreed upon. Anglican, Roman, and Oriental alike acknowledge the six above enumerated.

The decrees of the six Œcumenical Councils were chiefly directed to the settlement of the doctrine of the Divinity and the Person of CHRIST.

The First Œcumenical Council.—Arius, one of the public preachers of Alexandria, began to teach that the SON of GOD was a creature, the first of all creatures; but still only a creature. He argued as follows: Since He is a son, (1) there was a time when He was not, (2) before He was begotten He was not, (3) and He was formed from what once was not. The reasoning was soon seen to be defective in that, starting from the relation of FATHER and SON, it conducted to the conclusion that He was not a son but a creature, and hence only a son by adoption. Afterwards it was argued that the existence of the SON resulted from an act of the FATHER's will, and hence He must be essentially inferior. One of the inferences from these positions was that our LORD was tried as other moral agents and adopted on being found worthy: that His holiness was not essential but acquired. This heresy was promulgated first 319 A.D. It was condemned by a Synod held in Alexandria the following year; but the teachers of false doctrine obtained the countenance of several influential prelates in Asia Minor and Palestine, and the heresy soon obtained a wider currency.

Constantine, the first Christian emperor, on becoming master of the East, found this controversy troubling the Church, and, anxious for peace and harmony, summoned a General Council, which met accordingly at Nicæa, in Bithynia, in June, 325 A.D. It was attended by about three hundred Bishops, chiefly of the East. Either Hosius of Cordova, or Eustathius of Antioch, presided. Athanasius, about twenty-seven years old and still a Deacon, was the principal champion of the Catholic faith, and conducted public disputations with Arius and other heretical leaders. It appeared at once that in the minds of the overwhelming majority there was no doubt of the heretical character of the new teaching. It still remained to devise and agree upon a formula which would exclude such teaching. The proposed term Homoiousios, "of like substance," concealed the real question in dispute. The plain question was, whether our LORD was GOD in as full a sense as the FATHER, though not to be viewed as separable from Him, or whether He was a creature,—i.e., of a substance which had a beginning.

The term Homoousios, "of the same essence or substance," was at length adopted. The Creed set forth by this Council embodying the doctrine of the Trinity and of the divinity of CHRIST in particular, agreed in its phraseology very closely with that now commonly called the Nicene Creed, but ended with the words, "And in the HOLY GHOST." The propositions of Arius were stated and condemned. This Synod also passed twenty Canons, one of which decreed that the feast of Easter should always be held on Sunday, and regulated its time by the vernal equinox; another contained the following words: "Let the ancient customs continue to exist in Egypt, and Libya, and Pentapolis; that is, that the Bishop of Alexandria should have jurisdiction over all these, for there is a similar relation for the Bishop of Rome." Anglican theologians have inferred from this that the authority of the Bishop of Rome was not considered at that time as extending beyond his own Patriarchate. All the decrees of the Council were published in a synodical epistle to the Universal Church.

The Second Œcumenical Council.—The decisions of Nicæa were followed by a determined and prolonged conflict, during which, at times, Arianism, backed by the persecuting arm of the civil power, almost gained the victory. Several of the successors of Constantine were Arians and one an apostate (Julian, 361–363 A.D.). Athanasius, who succeeded Alexander in the See of Alexandria, spent many years in exile, but never wavered in upholding the Nicene faith. Hosius of Cordova, in his hundredth year, yielded under great distress, and signed an heretical statement, which he afterwards recanted with bitter penitence. Liberius, Bishop of Rome, after a valiant and resolute defense of the faith, was banished, and in the homesickness of exile at last gave way. Many Conferences and Councils were held, some of high importance, especially that of Sardica, 347 A.D. The difficulties of the time were increased from two causes: first, a large body of Christian people, though orthodox at heart, could not for a long time reconcile themselves to the term Homousios. It was only after a long controversy that all believers in the divinity of CHRIST came to see that no other term had the force requisite to exclude the heresy which would make Him only a creature. The other cause which obscured the true issue was the manner in which the Arians so often shifted their ground, proposing now one formula and now another.

At last, 380 A.D., in the person of Theodosius, an emperor at once Christian and orthodox ascended the throne of the Eastern Empire. His first care was to end this long strife, which had produced far more confusion in the East than in the West. The administration of the Church was deeply affected, Altar against Altar, Bishop against Bishop, thus Constantinople itself was in possession of the Arians, an Arian Bishop occupying its throne, but Gregory Nazianzen was leading an organized opposition. In Antioch, another of the great Patriarchal Sees, two Bishops, Meletius and Paulinus, claimed jurisdiction.

Theodosius resolved to summon a Council. In answer to his summons one hundred and fifty Bishops met at Constantinople. The Western Church was not represented. Meletius of Antioch, a man of holy life, was appointed to preside; Theodosius had already endeavored to regulate the ecclesiastical affairs of Constantinople by driving the Arian Bishop from the city and putting St. Gregory in possession of St. Sophia, the Cathedral church. It still remained to establish peace in Antioch. At this juncture Meletius died, universally lamented and revered as a saint by the Council of which he was president. The friends of peace proposed that the rival Bishop, Paulinus, should be recognized. St. Gregory strenuously advocated this course, and was bitterly disappointed when the Meletian party proceeded to elect a successor and thus perpetuated the schism. St. Gregory's possession of the See of Constantinople was now attacked on canonical grounds in the Council itself, he having been originally consecrated Bishop of another See, while the ancient rule forbade translations. Upon this he resigned, and withdrew also from the Council after an eloquent farewell address.

This Council enlarged the Creed of Nicæa by the insertion of several additional phrases, and of all the words which now stand after "HOLY GHOST," except the filioque clause (added at the Council of Toledo, 589 A.D.). The most important amendment was the amplification of the article on the HOLY GHOST. This was done to meet the heresy of Macedonius, an Arianizing Bishop of Alexandria, who denied the Divinity of the Third Person of the Blessed Trinity. They are placed here for comparison.

Four Canons were passed. The first pronounced the Creed inviolable and condemned seven heresies, the most important of which were the Arian, the Macedonian, and the Apollinarian. The latter was an error of an opposite kind to the Arian, Apollinaris having taught that our LORD had no "reasonable soul," but that the Word supplied the place of the mind or nous. The second guarded the bounds of territorial jurisdiction. The famous third Canon gave a "primacy of honor to the Bishop of Constantinople next after the Bishop of Rome, because Constantinople was new Rome." The fourth related to a recent intrusion into the See of Constantinople. This second General Council is a notable instance of a Council by no means representing the whole Church attaining the Œcumenical character simply through its final acceptance by the Catholic Church. Arianism as a school within the Church was now at an end. From this time it only continued to exist as a sect without.

The Third Œcumenical Council.—About Christmas, 428 A.D., a priest named Anastasius, preaching in St. Sophia, Constantinople, used these words: "Let no one call Mary Theotokos (Mother of God); for she was a human creature, of whom God could not be born." The Archbishop, Nestorius, gave the sermon his emphatic sanction, and followed it with a course of sermons on the same theme. This was the starting-point of the Nestorian heresy. Such expressions as these were used: "It was not the Word that was born but the man JESUS," that He who "held the circle of the earth" could not be wrapped in grave-clothes; that the sustainer of all things could not rise from the dead. Some of the immediate followers of Nestorius spoke of Mary as "the mother of a man united to God," "The son who suffered is one, God the Word is another." "For my part," said one, "I cannot say that a child of two or three months old was God." Superficially it was a criticism upon a term which in the sense they often attributed to it would be inadmissible, namely, if "Theotokos," or "Mother of God," be interpreted to mean, "Mother of the God-head." But the expressions quoted above clearly show that the objection cut far deeper than this and resulted in dividing CHRIST into two Personalities, the Human and the Divine. It was not primarily the dignity of the Virgin-Mo her which made the question important, but the reality of the Incarnation was involved, the truth of the grand declaration of St. John, "The Word was made Flesh and dwelt among us." "If the son of Mary were not literally God, He could not bring heaven and earth into unity; to have two SAVIOURS would be equivalent to having none" (Canon Bright). The great champion of the Faith as against Nestorius was Cyril of Alexandria. He is often accused of having used violent and arbitrary methods, though it is probable that the title of Saint awarded to him from ancient days at least indicates a general and wide-spread popular estimate of his character which can hardly fail to have had some substantial basis. He was, however, one of the foremost theologians in the history of the Christian Church, admirable for the clearness and precision of his thought and language. He took his stand upon the simple formula: "If our LORD JESUS CHRIST is God, how can our LORD's Mother, the Holy Virgin, be not Mother of God?" He guarded himself against misinterpretation by clearly confessing a true manhood in CHRIST, and clearly denying that Mary could be Mother of God-head. The West was unmoved by the new heresy, and Pope Cœlestine (422-432 A.D.) accepting the doctrinal statements of Cyril, commissioned him to "join the authority of the Roman See to his own" and insist upon a recantation on the part of Nestorius. Accordingly, at a Council of Alexandria, 430 A.D., Cyril put forth a synodal letter containing an exposition of that portion of the Creed which concerns the Incarnation, and twelve "anathemas" or articles directed against the teaching of Nestorius. These anathemas express concisely and clearly the Catholic doctrine of the Person of CHRIST. At the height of the controversy, the emperor, Theodosius the Younger (408-450 A.D.), issued a call for a General Council to meet at Ephesus on the ensuing Pentecost (431 A.D.). Here accordingly met the third Œcumenical Council. Promptly at the time proposed Cyril arrived with fifty Bishops, and found Nestorius awaiting them with sixteen. Afterwards the Bishop of Jerusalem appeared and others from various places. But the Bishops of the Patriarchate of Antioch had not yet arrived when, a fortnight after the time appointed, the Council was organized under the influence of Cyril. That the Council should have proceeded to its work in the absence of the Antiochine prelates has been made an objection to its validity, inasmuch as they were known to be within five days' journey. Cyril presided as the chief Bishop present, and as representing not only his own See but that of Rome, and this notwithstanding the presence of two Bishops from Italy as papal legates. Nestorius and his party refused to attend until all the Bishops should reach the city. The Council, therefore, proceeded without him. The Creed of Nicaea was read and the recent statements compared with it. The writings of Cyril were read, and received a general approval. The doctrine of Nestorius was unanimously condemned and himself deposed. The Pelagian heresy, which had troubled the West in particular, was also condemned. The Council also published eight Canons of discipline. The decrees were signed by two hundred Bishops.

As in the case of the Council of Constantinople, the fact that it included only the East was covered by the final ratification and acceptance of its decrees throughout the Church, so any question of the regularity of the proceedings at Ephesus is met by the acceptance of its results.

The Fourth Œcumenical Council.—The orthodox doctrine of the Person of CHRIST, while denying the Nestorian statements which separated the One CHRIST into two Persons, God and a man, is equally careful to distinguish in the One Divine Personality two natures, the Human and the Divine. It is easy to see, however, that in zealous opposition to Nestorianism men were likely to fall into the opposite error, losing sight of the true humanity of our LORD, on which depends, equally with His Divinity the redemption of the world; for it is only thus that He can be "the second Adam, a true example, a true sacrifice, a sympathizing and brotherly High-Priest, whose very manhood was the basis of the Church and the medium of his brethren's renewal" (Canon Bright). Accordingly, out of the controversies which still continued after the Council of Ephesus this opposite form of error soon emerged. It was distinctly formulated by Eutyches, a monk of Constantinople and a zealous admirer of St. Cyril (who died in 444 A.D.). In 448 A.D., at a Council of thirty Bishops in Constantinople, Eutyches was accused of renewing the Apollinarian heresy which had been condemned at the second General Council. On being examined before the Council, Eutyches declared that after the Incarnation he acknowledged but one nature in CHRIST, namely, the Divine. Upon this he was unanimously condemned. In the contest which followed a Council was called by the emperor, who sympathized with Eutyches. The meeting took place at Ephesus in 449 A.D. The President was Dioscorus, Bishop of Alexandria, an unscrupulous and fanatical partisan of Eutyches, who was aided by a military force. The proceedings were characterized by extreme violence, and resulted in favor of Eutyches. But the decisions of this assembly were immediately rejected at Rome, Constantinople, and elsewhere, and it was called by Pope Leo of Rome the Latrocinium, or Robber-Council, a name by which it has ever since been known. It is an example of a Council meant to be General and containing a representation from the West as well as the East, but repudiated by the consent of the Catholic Church.

This was followed by the grand Council of six hundred and thirty Bishops at Chalcedon in 451 A.D., called together by the Emperor Marcian (450-457 A.D.). The Roman legates sat in the highest place, though nineteen magistrates appointed by the emperor exercised a general control and acted as Moderators of the Assembly. The proceedings assumed in part the form of a trial of Dioscorus for heresy and violence. He was condemned and deposed. The most important work of the Council consisted in a careful examination of the Faith. The celebrated letter or treatise called the "tome" of St. Leo, Pope at this time, was adopted, and thus became part and parcel of Catholic teaching. It is a clear and profound exposition of the doctrine of the Incarnation. The epistles of St. Cyril were also approved, and thus the Faith was guarded on both sides. Finally the Council set forth a confession or definition of Faith and twenty-eight Canons of discipline. So thorough and complete was the work of this Council, so clearly was the Catholic Faith now defined as touching the Divinity and the Person of CHRIST, that ancient writers ranked the first four General Councils with the four Gospels. Some Anglican writers in like manner have spoken as if only four were to be counted as General. The universal Church, however, has accepted six, and the constant appeal of the English Church to the period of an undivided Christendom involves the acceptance on her part of all the six. It is nevertheless true that the last two may properly be termed supplementary, dealing as they did, not with new heresies, but with certain results of Nestorianism on the one hand, and of the Eutychian or Monophysite heresy on the other.

The Fifth Œcumenical Council.—The settlement of the doctrine of the Person of CHRIST in the Councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon did not prevent the two opposite extremes of Nestorianism and Monophysitism from continuing to exist in heretical sects, and in some modified forms, from affecting the views of many within the Church, especially in the East. In Alexandria some time after the Council of Chalcedon, the extreme Eutychians refusing to acknowledge the orthodox Patriarch, formed a separate sect, called the Acephali, as being without a head, and thus kept alive the heresy. In the next century it was represented to the Emperor Justinian (527-565 A.D.) that this schism might be healed by the condemnation of certain writings of three eminent theologians of the first half of the fifth century, who either had not been condemned or had been received with apparent favor in the Council of Chalcedon. These were Theodoret, Theodore of Mopsuestia, and Ibas of Edessa. Theodoret had opposed St. Cyril, but without altogether losing credit for orthodoxy. Theodore was undoubtedly heretical, and the work of Ibas to which exception was taken was a letter in which he was said to have denied the Incarnation. The collection made from the writings of these men was called the "Three Chapters" or "Articles." The emperor, who was a dabbler in theology, accepted the suggestion, and attempted to execute it by publishing an edict condemning the "Chapters" and anathematizing their authors. This led to a long contest, which was only settled by the calling of a General Council to meet at Constantinople in 553 A.D. A remarkable circumstance connected with this Council was the presence in Constantinople of Pope Vigilius of Rome. For refusing to subscribe to the emperor's edict he had been compelled to repair to Constantinople, where he was detained for seven years. By his vacillating course he had become an object of dislike to both parties in the controversy. When the Council met he refused to attend. There were present one hundred and sixty-five Bishops, including a very few from the West. The writings which had formed the subject of controversy were examined and condemned. At the same time the four earlier Councils were approved. It is also contended by some authors that in approving the theological edicts of the emperor certain writings of Origen, the celebrated Alexandrian theologian, were condemned. The Pope persisted in his refusal to attend the Council and condemned its proceedings, but some months afterwards retracted and accepted it as Œcumenical, declaring that his previous course was instigated by Satan. This Council bears the title of the Second Council of Constantinople.

Sixth General Council, or Third Council of Constantinople.—As the fifth General Council completed the condemnation of Nestorianism and was thus supplementary to the Council of Ephesus, so the sixth and last met the final phase of the Eutychian or Monophysite heresy, and thus finishes the work of Chalcedon. A more refined form of the heresy of Eutyches arose in the early part of the seventh century. This was Monothelism, or the affirmation of one will alone,—i.e., the Divine, in CHRIST. It was supposed by many that this doctrine might be safely held, and that it would form a compromise by means of which many monophysites might be brought back to the Church. It was promulgated in Constantinople by the Patriarch, about 616 A.D., enforced by a decree of the emperor, and for a while accepted by several of the Patriarchs. The chief opponent of the new doctrine was at first Sophronius, Bishop of Jerusalem, afterwards Maximus, a monk from Constantinople. In correspondence with the Bishop of Constantinople, Honorius, Pope from 625 to 638 A.D., clearly committed himself to monothelism. Attempts were made to stifle the controversy by imposing silence on both parties, but in vain. In the first Lateran Council (Rome, 649 A.D.) monothelism was condemned and an exposition of faith was published. At length the emperor, Constantine Pogonatus, summoned the sixth Œcumenical Council, which met at Constantinople in November, 680 A.D., and lasted about ten months. It was attended by two hundred Bishops. The controversy was carefully examined and a definition of Faith set forth, in which it was stated that, in accordance with the doctrine of the Incarnation, as previously defined, and the teachings of the Fathers, it follows that "In CHRIST there are two natural wills and two natural operations, without division, change, separation, or confusion; and these two natural wills are not contrary, as impious heretics pretend; but the human follows the divine and almighty will, not resisting or opposing it, but rather being subject to it." The preceding five Councils were confirmed, and the Creeds of Nice and Constantinople were accepted. The supporters of the monothelite heresy were condemned, among them Honorius, the monothelite Pope. Leo II. (682–83 A.D.) was a zealous champion of the Council, and expressly assented to the condemnation of Honorius, speaking of his teaching as a "profane betrayal of the Faith." Thus we see a Pope, for whom infallibility is claimed, condemned by a General Council and by another Pope.

Such, in brief, is the history of the Œcumenical Councils, by which the Faith of the Catholic Church as touching Our LORD and SAVIOUR JESUS CHRIST was defined for all time.

Counsels of Perfection. A phrase much used to express the practice of what are called the three counsels of perfection,—chastity, poverty, and obedience. It is hard to see the full force of all that has been said about these counsels, for opposed to the way in which they are too often taught is the express direction of our LORD to say that we are unprofitable servants; we have done that which was our duty to do, when we have done all those things which were commanded us. This being so, the so-called counsel, "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your FATHER which is in heaven is perfect," is a command, and not a counsel. Doubtless there are better conditions and estates in which we can live than those in which we choose to live without being faulted for our choice. Marriage entangles the married couple more in the things of this world than does the unmarried state in those who are able to bear it, yet it does produce a loveliness of character, when holily used, not found otherwise. Wealth properly used is a means of grace, and can give greater scope for usefulness than poverty, yet each has its special blessing. But as obedience (the third law of these counsels) lies at the very root of all Christian faith and action, it is still more difficult to understand how there can be a superior obedience beyond what is absolutely bounden. The whole superstructure has too frail a foundation. Undoubtedly, as we push forward in the Christian race, we find many things lawful not expedient for our Christian characters, and these counsels of perfection should rather be called counsels for still deeper self-renunciation, as we are strengthened by the grace of the HOLY GHOST, to go forward and to endure a still straiter discipline.

Covenant comes from con and venio, and means coming together. It is the coming together of two persons, for an agreement or contract; whereas testament refers to one person only. And covenant is an affair, as well known to a Jewish mind, as anything in all sacred or social history. God made a covenant with Adam and his posterity in the Garden of Eden. On His part, He gave Adam not a body only, but "a living soul," with its inherent powers of thought, free-will, and self-government. On Adam's part, obedience to God's wishes and inspirations was expected and demanded; and as a testimonial and proof of his obedience, he was to abstain from a selfish knowledge of good and evil, and learn the best way to use the powers intrusted to him, by partaking daily of the Tree of Life, God's sacramental way of supplying his spiritual wants. A mode of perpetuating a sanctified existence which may be unceasing; for we read in the Revelation of St. John of "the Tree of Life, which is in the midst of the Paradise of God" (Rev. ii. 7).

But Adam chose his own way (as his descendants still do) of finding out and estimating good and evil; and the covenant between him and his all-wise CREATOR, with its conditional gift of life and its endowments, was forthwith at an end. Yet that CREATOR, as merciful as He is wise, allowed a renewal of the covenant on new requisitions. Life is represented by blood (Lev. xvii. 11), and lost or forfeited life by blood poured out, and seemingly gone to waste as worthless. The CREATOR would not renew the abdicated covenant unless (and the condition appears not natural only, but inevitable) man would acknowledge his terrible failure, would most significantly confess that his life was now forfeited and virtually thrown away, and was therefore to be held temporarily and uncertainly, and no longer an endowment for immortality.

This was to be done by a sacrifice, emblematical of "a more excellent sacrifice," seen from afar, by an omniscient eye. It was to be a ceremony in which blood poured out, and, no longer life-giving, was to show, nay, to demonstrate, that man's fatal loss was freely admitted and acknowledged; and that he was to hold life thenceforth and always as, more than ever, a conditional gift, and one liable daily and hourly to be taken from him. Abel proved his submission to this new order of things by offering sacrifices in which life was taken away and blood poured out freely. Cain proved his insubmission by offering sacrifices from which blood was totally excluded, and which illustrated graphically his own choice, private judgment, and perversity of will. One sacrifice was accepted and made welcome, and the other rejected and set at naught. It repeated Adam's sin of judging for one's self; and the repeated sin has been reiterated from that day until now, making the yieldance of a human will to the Divine a moral miracle.

From this representation it is perfectly easy to comprehend that to a Jewish mind, accepting as historic verities the books of Moses, the ideas of a covenant, of a vacated covenant, of the renewal of a vacated covenant by sacrifices and the pouring forth of blood, life's closest emblem, must have become as familiar as matters of household economy. Talk to a Jew of a covenant, and of a covenant ratified by an offering of blood, and he would understand you as talking of what might be called (and is so called in a Judaico-Christian document, the Epistle to the Hebrews) one of "the first principles of the oracles of God." But talk to a Jew of a testament, and especially of a testament ratified by blood, and you would simply bewilder, astonish, or horrify him. He knew nothing of a last will and testament, for his religion disposed of all his property, and he could not make one (Numb. xxvii. 8-11). If our SAVIOUR meant to say what we mean by "this is my blood of the New Testament," His disciples would not have known what He intended, or would have supposed Him to speak in the dialect of Roman Law. Roman Law, and after a while Romish Theology, made the word testament a common word in Western countries, and the old Oriental word, covenant, became an excommunicate. The word testament is not to be found in our Common Version from Genesis to Malachi, while in the Hebrew it is to be found in the shape of noun, verb, etc., about three hundred times. In our Christian Scriptures the proper Greek word for covenant is found thirty-three times, and in twenty of them is translated covenant, and not testament; and yet we cling to the phrases Old Testament and New Testament as if the very existence of the Bible were wrapped up in them. Nevertheless, they have only thirteen precedents in their favor, while covenant and its correlatives have three hundred and twenty! Can history present another instance of a similar perversion in misusing and misnaming a word which God Himself has consecrated?

Notwithstanding, we are curiously asked, What are we to gain by exchanging testament for covenant? In the first place, we can understand our SAVIOUR's language in the institution of the Eucharist. He intended to say that by the outpouring of His blood on earth, and its oblation at the mercy-seat of the real Holy of Holies, a New Covenant could be established for fallen and death-stricken man. A testament has nothing to do with blood any more than a psalm-book. And, moreover, He never said the bread was the New Covenant in His body. He made the blood, the familiar emblem of a sacrifice, the immensely superior thing; and of course the wine the immensely superior element. If we withdraw the wine from the Eucharist we sadly depreciate, if we do not nullify it. The notion of concomitance is but a fetich of the schoolmen. It is dogma, but not doctrine.

Again, under a covenant everything becomes conditional instead of absolute; or, if absolute in terms, conditional in character. God's promises to us in baptism are under a covenant, and are therefore conditional, and completely so. If we fail in fulfilling our promises, we lose our title to the grace pledged to promises fulfilled, but never pledged to promises broken, neglected, or set at naught. It is insolent to expect that God will keep His word when we do not keep our own.

So God's predictions under a covenant are as conditional as His promises. There is a phalanx of predictions scattered through the Jewish prophecies which seem to have lost their virtue, since they never have been verified. Were those predictions insincere? Perish the evil thought! They were predictions under a covenant, the stipulations of that covenant were unfulfilled, and the predictions became suspended possibilities. They may, or may not be, demonstrations at another day.

And now comes something of profounder meaning, of intense significance. If promises and predictions are conditional under a covenant, so are predestinations also. Predestinations have nothing to do with metaphysics in the Bible any more than promises and predictions. They are ecclesiastical, and not scholastic and dogmatic. And so St. Augustine understood them. He believed in the predestination to grace for all who were baptized reverentially. He believed that a baptism so begun, and properly carried on, was predestined to perseverance; and there he stopped. Calvin believed that his elect were predestined to absolute salvation, and his non-elect to absolute perdition, and rejected all conditions as an impertinence. It cannot take great acuteness to discern a heaven-wide difference between these separate systems, though it suits some to intermingle and confound them.

It is hoped, now, that few or none will persist in saying it is of no consequence whether the word testament or covenant be applied to what the first Council of Nice, in its very Creed, denominated The Scriptures; showing that to the file-leader of great Christian assemblies the word testament was unknown. Why, if this word is pettishly insisted on, the proper and annihilating answer is that it deprives us of a Bible. Look at Heb. ix. 16, 17, in the Common Version, or the Revisal of it. This passage informs us, magisterially, that "where a testament is, there must also of necessity be the death of the testator." Has, then, God our testator died? If not, we have no testament to go upon. And if He lives, we have no testament; for such a thing "is of no strength at all while the testator liveth." Either way we have no Bible; none, at least, which is available, while these verses are easily disposed of by using the word covenant. A covenant for the dead is firm; as of course it is, they having lived its term out with fidelity. But it has not reached this firmness while the covenanted liveth (not covenantant; the word is a participle, and not a noun), because he may lose everything by failing to keep its stipulations. This translation, too, is perfectly simple, and Hooker tells us that he holds it "for a most infallible rule in expositions of Sacred Scripture, that where a literal construction will stand, the farthest from the letter is commonly the worst" (Bk. v. ch. lix. sec. 2). No wonder, finally, that God should account it a peculiar satisfaction to have men take hold of His covenant with all their hearts (Isa. lvi. 4). The most unpromising may do so, as this text evinces, to their immortal joy. REV. T. W. COIT, D.D.

Creation. The manifestation of God's power: (a) in the physical world; (b) in the spiritual world. It is held that creation is the necessity in His nature. How, when, and where it shall be exhibited belongs to Him in His infinite wisdom, of His perfect will, and according to His perfect love. "Thou art worthy, O LORD, to receive glory and honor and power: for Thou hast created all things, and for Thy pleasure (thelema—the same word as will in the LORD's Prayer and in Hebrews x. 7, 10; so St. John vi. 39, and often) they are and were created" (Rev. iv. 11). We confess it, as His attribute, in the Creeds. Natural theology presents it to us as a deduction from the comparison of all the facts of the natural world. But inspiration sets this upon an unassailable basis for every one who receives the Revelation of Holy Writ. There the argument is always from the natural world directly to the spiritual world. So in Job, so in the 19th Psalm, and in innumerable other places.

The Persons present in the act of creation were the HOLY TRINITY. It was not framed by the hand of angels, but the Spirit of God brooded over the waters of chaos. The fiat of JEHOVAH went forth, Let there be. The Word of God, the wisdom was present (Prov. viii. 22-31; St. John i. 3; Col. i. 16; Eph. iii. 9; Heb. xi. 2).

Modern science has endeavored to pass beyond the study of the relation of things and of their constitution to ask how and why. In these discussions scientists are lost in their own imperfect grasp of the laws of nature, and despite all efforts they refute each other's theories, and have finally to fall back upon the statements concerning creation which the Divine wisdom has chosen to record. Religion has ever found that all clearly established facts are in full accord with inspiration, that when at first there appeared to be collision there was on the part of scientists a failure to see all the facts in their true relations, and on the part of devout Christians to abandon lightly teachings that had been accepted. But when these two had been adjusted there was ever a gain to the reception of the truth of Revelation. It is proper as well as natural that the Christian should refuse to readjust his already formed ideas about the natural world founded upon already established facts at the bidding of those who, having collected a fresh set, have formed them into crude, ill-balanced theories. Let us wait, and when a fact or series of facts have been indisputably interpreted and put into their natural and true position in the economy of nature, we will gladly accept them, knowing full well that they will prove to be in perfect accord with the records of Revelation. In the meantime, while hesitating to accept, it is not wise to sneer at what science has to suggest as to the true interpretation of these records.

Creationism. Controversies which were held in early ages as to the origin of the soul. Is it created and infused into the unborn infant, or is it propagated with the body as it is formed? These controversies were carried on for some time in the Church as different heresies had to be combated. St. Augustine's words state the doctrines, but do not determine the question raised. "As, therefore, both soul and body are alike punished unless what is born is purified by regeneration, certainly either both are derived in their corrupt state from man (Traducianism), or the one is corrupted in the other, as if in a corrupt vessel, where it is placed by the secret justice of the Divine Law (Creationism). But which of these is true I would rather learn than teach, lest I should presume to teach what I do not know." These wise words are practically accepted with this, as he says elsewhere: "if only that sentiment remain firm and unshaken, that the death of all is the fault of that one (Adam), and that in him we have all sinned." The instinctive belief is that of Creationism as being in better accord with all the Scripture teaches, and with our revealed knowledge of the immaterial and divine origin of the soul.

Credence-Table. The table, bracket, or slab on which the vessels and elements for the Holy Communion are placed till the proper time appointed in the rubric for them to be put upon the Holy Table. They were originally prepared and brought in from the sacristy, after the earliest custom of taking them directly at the time of the celebration from the offerings of the faithful. The term seems to come from the Italian, "to taste beforehand;" hence a plate on which anything is offered, thence a side table. It is of late introduction apparently in the English Church; it was a charge against Archbishop Laud that he used one, though after the example of Bishop Andrews and others. It has been declared a legal ornament in the English Church. Its proper position is upon the south side of the chancel. It may be a movable table, but more appropriately it should be a shelf properly supported against the wall.

Creed. The use of the very term "Creed" presupposes two assumptions, which are regarded as innate ideas that form the basis of all thought. They are considered as axioms because they are usually assented to without argument and must be determined before argument.

1st. The first is "I," or the conscious fact that every human being is a distinct person or entity, himself, not another. This conception of self, it is claimed, is simple, distinct, and universal. Every one regards himself as an uncompounded unit; a being possessed of faculties but not composed of them; having free-will, conscience, intelligence, tastes, appetites, passions, and the like; but being himself an indivisible unit to whom these characteristics belong, in which they naturally dwell, and all which he may rule and direct.

This person has an instinctive sense of freedom. He may be affected by internal impulse, or coerced by external powers, but his own assent or consent is essential to his own personal satisfaction. He cannot yield unwillingly to impulse without a feeling of degradation; nor submit to mere force without a sense of either shame or enslavement.

This person stands in natural connection with and reciprocal relation to all human nature, which has one origin and constitutes one organic race. This fact is also assumed in the very first word of every formal Creed. It is the assumption and confession of the unity of the human race; of which every human person is a constituent. It stands upon the fact, that what is common to all is essential to every one; and draws the conclusion that nothing shall be imposed upon any one (other things being equal) which is not equally required of all. Hence some creed-forms, especially the Oriental, begin with "We" instead of "I."

2d. The second fundamental concept and axiom contained in the very term "Creed" is "belief." In the singular form it is "I believe," and in the plural "We believe."

The assumption is, that belief is a primary necessity of every human person, and a like necessity for all the race. It is confidently claimed to be impossible for any conscious creature to escape the primary necessity of belief. The very consciousness of creaturehood, the conviction that one is not self-existent, that some power or person has caused him to be, make belief this primary necessity. While the common mind assents to this fact, the most searching analysis of the keenest thinking, and the profoundest searching of the most learned inquiry, have neither been able to reach a simpler element, nor discover a lower base than "belief." The spontaneous assent of the common mind is confirmed by all philosophy; hence belief is established as the primary source of all knowledge, the very first exercise of intelligence, as well as the ground of all duty and the support of all wisdom.

In granting this we confess that, logically considered, philosophy precedes faith. Whether formulated as distinct mental ideas, or merely accepted with more or less clearness of apprehension as axioms, the idea of personality, with its corollary, the unity in origin and continuance of the human race, together with the idea of necessary, primary universal belief, precede, underlie, support, and permeate every form of Creed.

The Creed of Christianity is not exempt from the confession of this philosophic basis. While in itself the Creed is not philosophic in construction, and from the nature of the case cannot be, yet it presumes a philosophic foundation, and acknowledges all the just rights of philosophy.

In fact, philosophy is simply the product of the reason which is natural to man. Christianity teaches that God is the author and finisher of nature. Hence Christianity acknowledges the rights, and not only allows, but encourages the honest use of all the powers of reason. Indeed, Christianity always respects and frequently appeals directly to human reason. The very assumptions of personality, common humanity, and necessarily primal belief, are a tacit confession that natural reason is a gift from and a trust under God.

If any one questions these axioms, included in the very term Creed, then they must be sustained. All axioms of Christianity philosophy may question, if it can. Should it do so in this case, then philosophic work must be done before Christianity may begin to be taught. Christianity asks no mere favors of philosophy. It stands only on the right and the true.

In point of fact, however, these fundamental concepts are never questioned by the common mind; and have never, even by the most acute or learned writers, been undermined, analytically divided, nor reduced to simpler elements. Hence Christianity takes one position, equally clear and strong, to either the lowly or the exalted, and both begins and prosecutes all its instructions, revelations, witnessings, and exhortations with "I, We believe."

The Apostles' Creed appeared so early in the devotional usage of the Church that its historic origin is unknown. The evidence is insufficient that ascribes it to the Apostles themselves. St. Paul, however, mentions "the form of sound words," which he exhorts Timothy to "hold fast." It is certain that our LORD JESUS Himself gave the essence of this Creed in the baptismal formula which He appointed: "Go ye therefore and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them into the name of the FATHER, and of the SON, and of the HOLY GHOST."

The Creed consists of three divisions, the first of which treats of the ALMIGHTY FATHER, the second of the SON, and the third of the HOLY GHOST. The special work of each of the three persons is named in this specific part of the Creed.

It is obvious that the Creed grew into form, probably in the very times of the Apostles, out of the necessity of instruction to the candidates for baptism. As they were to be baptized into the name of the FATHER, and of the SON, and of the HOLY GHOST, it was needful that they be well instructed in the points of their belief. As the belief was one and the same everywhere, —the One Faith,—some fixed form of its expression naturally arose and came into common use! Whether it thus grew naturally, or was actually a deliverance from the Apostles in person, severally and by agreement, cannot now be historically determined. In either case, however, its authority rests back upon antiquity. Whether given by the Apostles, or growing out of the necessity of baptismal occasions, it certainly appeared in the age of inspiration, has most sure warrant of Holy Scripture, has been sanctioned by universal acceptance in the Church of all ages, and stands now as the undoubtedly authorized summary of the facts necessary to be believed, and required to be confessed, by all who are to be made disciples of CHRIST.

Its present form, in universal use by the Church, is as follows:

"I believe in GOD the FATHER Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth:

"And in JESUS CHRIST His only SON our LORD; Who was conceived by the HOLY GHOST, Born of the Virgin Mary; Suffered under Pontius Pilate, Was crucified, dead, and buried; He descended into hell; The third day He rose from the dead; He ascended into heaven, And sitteth on the right hand of GOD the FATHER Almighty; From thence He shall come to judge the quick and the dead.

"I believe in the HOLY GHOST; The holy Catholic Church, The Communion of Saints; The Forgiveness of sins; The Resurrection of the body; And the Life everlasting. Amen."

This is the form in use throughout Western Europe, indeed, in all the Western Church, wherever the Latin language was formerly in vogue, and in all branches of the Church that have grown out of those which used the Latin in its Liturgies.

The Greek form, used in Russia, Turkey, Greece, and generally throughout the East, begins with the plural instead of the singular. Instead of "I believe" it has "We believe."

The two are essentially one, though supplemental to each other. They both carry the important truth, that there is only one Faith, which is obligatory alike upon every person. The idea, primarily in the mind of Western worshippers, is the faith of the person, the self; while the primary idea of the Eastern worshiper is the common faith, that which all together believe.

This merely shows the different habits of mind which pervade the distinct modes of progress and development which characterize and distinguish the West and the East. In the former the individual or person is the primary idea and pervading force. In the latter the organism—whether Church or State—is this idea and force. Each shows the strength and weakness of its own position. Apart they are weak. Only together are they strong. It is equally real and true that every human being is a person before God, and that he is a member of the human organism. Hence the salvation provided in CHRIST reaches persons both individually and in organized communion. One way of salvation is provided for all. "One LORD, one Faith, one Baptism!" What every one confesses as the Faith, all in like manner confess. The effect of the confession upon the individual confessors varies, but the confession itself is ever one, comprehensive, and the same.

Two additions have been made to the Apostles' Creed since the Apostolic age, which, with some slight changes in the Nicene Creed, will be noticed when the articles of the Creed to which they are attached come up in order for consideration.

The Creed, commonly called the Nicene Creed, originated with the Council held in Nice, or Nicæa, in Bithynia, Asia Minor, 325 A.D. It is substantially the same as that now in use; except that it closed with, "We believe in the HOLY GHOST." The articles that follow were added by the Council of Constantinople, 381 A.D.

The whole Creed, as it now stands and is used in the Western Church, is as follows:

"I believe in one GOD, the FATHER Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, and of all things visible and invisible:

"And in one LORD JESUS CHRIST, the only-Begotten SON of GOD, Begotten of the FATHER before all worlds, GOD of GOD, Light of Light, Very GOD of Very GOD, Begotten, not made, Being of one substance with the FATHER; By Whom all things were made; Who for us men and for our salvation, came down from heaven, And was incarnate by the HOLY GHOST of the Virgin Mary, And was made Man, and was crucified for us under Pontius Pilate, He suffered and was buried, And the third day He rose again, according to the Scriptures, And ascended into heaven, And sitteth on the right hand of the FATHER, from thence He shall come to judge the quick and the dead, Whose kingdom shall have no end:

"I believe in the HOLY GHOST, the LORD and Giver of life; Who proceedeth from the FATHER, and the SON; Who with the FATHER and the SON together is worshiped and glorified; Who spake by the prophets:

And I believe one Catholic and Apostolic Church; I acknowledge one Baptism for the remission of sins; And I look for the resurrection of the dead and the life of the world to come. Amen."

Before considering in order the different parts, or articles of the Creed, it may be well to remark that it is a short compendium of facts, rather than an elaborate definition of doctrines. Such definitions are drawn out, for example, in the XXXIX. Articles. These "Articles of Religion," as they are called, contain the opinions that prevailed in the Reformed Catholic Church, known as the Church of England, at the Reformation. They were finally signed by both the Houses of Convocation of Canterbury and York, 1571 A.D. They are even yet required to be signed by every clergyman in the English Church upon his ordination, although none of the laity, except the graduates of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, were ever required to sign them. The American Church does not require their signature, though she keeps them in her Prayer-Book, as sound expositions of the doctrines she teaches. She demands of her clergy their signature to a general declaration of conformity to the doctrines, discipline, and worship of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America.

The distinguishing characteristic of the Creed is that it sets forth the facts upon which the Gospel rests, and thereby points out the means generally—i.e., for all persons—necessary to salvation. It will be observed that these are not only thoughts or ideas to be apprehended mentally and spiritually, and to be used devoutly, but they are also veritable, self-existing facts, not dependent upon human assent, but real and true in themselves; indeed, the one chain of facts, external to man, which a person must believe if he would enter and continue in the way of salvation. They are analogous in some respects to natural facts, which are also facts, whether men believe or disbelieve them. For example, fire burns; if a man believe it, he will use fire wisely; but if he do not believe it, fire will none the less scorch him or consume his houses, should he throw himself into it, or neglect precautions against it.

This point, therefore, is of the utmost practical importance to every human person, and to the whole human race. It is important that all who have reached "the age of understanding" should hold and confess the Creed; and that children should have all done for them that can be done according to the Creed, and that they should be diligently taught it so as soon as they are able to learn.

Differences of opinion, among even the wise and good, do not and cannot alter external facts. As facts they rest on their own verity, and are operative, whatever any person may think or not think about them.

Now the fact of personal identity, now existing and forever to continue, conjoined with the fact of the oneness of the human race, and this associated with the universal, primary and persistent, necessity of belief, can never be other than facts, however any person may choose, or fancy himself compelled to think about them. Every human person must take the consequences of his personality, and all the race the consequences of its unity, whatever opinions may be held individually or prevail with greater or less approach to generality.

Starting with personal identity, human unity, and the necessity of belief, the first succeeding fact of the Creed is "One God." Proof of this, if required, is to be sought outside the Creed. Of course the Bible or any revelation cannot be appealed to for primary proof of the existence of God, because revelation presupposes belief in the Revealer. The Creed itself presents no proof. It merely sets forth the fact. Here human philosophy comes in, and discussions arise. One school declares that belief in God is intuitive, born in all men, so that every human person has originally in himself belief in God. This school agrees that confirmatory, or rather definitive and strong, proofs of the Divine existence may be drawn from both conscious self-searching after one's own origin under the conviction of self-insufficiency and consequent necessary dependence upon some supreme Lord of the universe and of men, and from the observation and study of other men and of nature. Here a wide and various philosophic field lies open; and, while Christianity enters this field and sustains itself therein, the Creed only formulates the conclusion in setting forth the fact of the "One God."

The next fact—the "FATHER Almighty"—is partly supported by reason, partly by intuition, and partly also by revelation. Reason, having perceived the One God and shown His necessary unity, declares that He is Almighty, as a necessary consequence, for the One God must from the very nature of the case be Almighty. He is FATHER,—i.e., the Universal Father, the spring and source of love, the universal energy and assurance of love, the sweetest, purest, and strongest power in the universe, the person in whom love centres, whose essence is love. This fact accords with reason, but answers chiefly the longings and yearnings of human hearts. Hence there is intuitive response to the fact not only from the mind of man, but also from that deepest part of himself, whence springs the consciousness of what he is and what he needs. Revelation strengthens the human reason and satisfies human intuitions upon this point; not by originating the knowledge of the Divine Fatherhood, but by confirming it in every particular, and enlarging it beyond the utmost reach of human discovery.

That the One God, FATHER Almighty, is "Maker of heaven and earth, and of all things visible and invisible," follows as an irresistible deduction. He only can be this Maker. None other can be found, nor conceived of. The original self-existence only can be the Creator of the universe.

The Creed to this point may be attacked, and has been in every particular. Philosophy has called it in question, beginning even with dispute about personal identity and proceeding through the creation. It has been defended on philosophic grounds, as it should have been. In the future, philosophy must take this portion of the Creed to itself; and the learning, that will support it, must be based upon human reason and intuition. While it requires a high mental development to comprehend, and some learning to know the philosophic points involved in this first division of the Creed, it requires only the powers of reason and intuition that are common to all—even to children—to perceive the facts, to adopt them by belief, to make them means of comfortable assurance, and to use them solemnly in either trembling or joyful devotion.

The Creed gives them in concentrated form; they are placed in its beginning because they comprise the facts upon which all that follows is based. While Christian believers are enjoined to stand ready to defend this citadel of the faith, according to their ability and opportunity, they are permitted also to rest in it, as in a home of the soul, and to enjoy, every one, personal, sweet communion with God, addressing Him ever as "Our FATHER."

The Creed being established and accepted thus far, the conclusion springs up spontaneously and with great force, that this one God, FATHER Almighty, has surely manifested Himself to His creatures. He assuredly, from the force of His own essential love, has created them. Hence, in some way, He has surely revealed Himself unto them.

The Creed from this point sets forth the facts of revelation. It recognizes indeed, as truth always does, the rights of human reason. The facts that follow are held ever subject to question and proof. After the preliminary probability, which leads us to look for a revelation from God, comes the proof that what the Creed further contains is that revelation.

We can conceive of revelation coming in various ways. It might have been in the form of a voice from heaven proceeding continually or at intervals, heard of all men or heard of a few. It might have been in a still, small voice, or in no articulate form, but only by an internal influence or afflatus reaching one or many, and making itself known to the mind or the heart of men. We cannot limit the means, instruments, subjects, or objects of revelation. We can only ask, What had God said? What hath God wrought?

In point of fact, the Divine revelation all centres in one person, who is Himself both God and Man. The beginning of revelation points to Him, and the close of revelation clings to Him. Hence the Creed, being the formal Gospel concentrated, opens its revealed portions with setting forth the facts about JESUS.

Coming forth from the mysterious sanctuary wherein we have with our reason and intuitions worshiped GOD the FATHER, we apply the same powers to His word of revelation. We meet a Man who declares Himself to be the Son of GOD, who has come from His FATHER and our FATHER to make known the Divine person and declare the Divine will. We demand, as we have both the right and duty to do, His credentials. He gives them amply. He retires not from, but courts the criticism of men. He does not even confine Himself to the society of His friends. He meets His enemies openly, before audiences composed of those who are favorable or unfavorable to Him. He claims, with the very simplest and therefore most impressive boldness, to be the very Person pointed out in all the preceding Divine revelation. He declares that He is the very MESSIAH, the CHRIST, the anointed of GOD to whom all the prophets bore witness; and for whose advent the chosen and separate nation, which had kept alive the worship of the One GOD, had from age to age been waiting. He expounds, supports, and defends His stupendous claim, does the work that He says the FATHER had appointed Him to do, finishes it, and ascends openly towards heaven, going back, as it is declared, to the right hand of the Majesty on High.

The whole revelation of GOD therefore centres in JESUS. He is the corner-stone of the whole religion of the true GOD. The Gospel as an organism grows out of His person, and as a code of doctrine springs from His words. Divine truth at least, indeed, all truth, flows forth from Him as from a fountain. In Himself He is the Truth.

They who hold the Creed are not exempt from the necessity of proving all these points to the just satisfaction of human reason. They did so at first. They have done so in all the past. They are doing it in this age. They will do the same in the generations to come. The Creed itself, however, does not deal in argument. It only gives the facts, in the shortest possible form of full and sufficient words.

It proceeds with pronouncing JESUS LORD,—i.e., the rightful ruler over every man, and over all mankind.

The ground of His lordship is His personal Divinity. He evidently is not the original Divine Person, whom we worship as one GOD, FATHER Almighty. He distinguishes Himself from the FATHER by speaking of Him as another person.

Here reason is baffled,—not confounded, only required to stand in awe. It is beyond human power to comprehend the existence of more than one personality in the unity of the GOD-head. What reason cannot comprehend the understanding may yet receive as a fact. Reason may demand that the fact be clearly set forth and duly authenticated. It can fairly demand no more. The proof has many branches, but they all grow out of the truth of JESUS, as from a root. That root being acknowledged, the whole Gospel proceeds and is evolved from it. The point now in view is the character and peculiar distinctiveness of the Deity of JESUS, with its relations to the one GOD-head.

We learn that He is the Only-Begotten of the FATHER. We take this fact into our understandings. We are fully capable of receiving it as a fact. It teaches us that the One GOD FATHER is father, not in a metaphorical but in a literal sense. He has existed from all eternity in unity of substance, that included distinct—not separate—persons, one of whom was, is, and forever will continue FATHER, and the other SON.

Hence the SON is GOD, not originally, in and of His own self, but GOD of GOD. He is of the very Divine essence, being in Himself Light, but Light of Light. He is in the superlative sense GOD, being therefore equal with the FATHER in power, glory, beauty, love, and all excellence, indeed, Very GOD; but Very GOD of GOD.

“Begotten, not made, being of one substance with the FATHER.”

This is the peculiar clause that distinguished the Nicene Creed. The Council of Nice was called by Constantine I., the Roman emperor, and met at Nice 325 A.D. The chief occasion of its convention was the heresy called Arianism, which had arisen in Alexandria and was spreading through the Church. Arius, a Presbyter of Alexandria, in Egypt, taught that JESUS was a partaker of the Divine nature, but not of the veritable Divine substance. He was therefore a creature, the highest indeed of all creatures, the very nearest and dearest of all whom GOD had made, but still a creature. Arius was willing to confess that JESUS was of like substance, but not of the very same substance with the FATHER. In Greek, one single letter contains the whole controversy. If the Council of Nice had adopted the word omoiousios Arianism would not have been condemned. It refused the middle “i,” and hence the dreadful controversy that afflicted the Church, and has not yet ceased. That JESUS was omoousios, of the very same substance with the FATHER, was the fact to which members of the Council bore testimony, not as their own opinion only, but as the witness of the Catholic Church to the originally inspired truth, which from the beginning had been the Christian faith. Hence the true doctrine is that JESUS, as to His Divine nature, is begotten, not made, and is by nature GOD.

The Creed next declares that JESUS is the Creator of all things. The FATHER then is Creator in a sense analogous to that of Architect, and the SON Creator in a sense analogous to Builder. This shows something of the practical relation between the FATHER and the SON, as what preceding shows of their essential relation. Each exercises the functions of His Own personality, with distinctiveness of will and act, though, of course, with the accord of entire unity in love.

Next follows the special work of JESUS for mankind. The love of the FATHER went, and ever goes, forth towards the world of His creation. Man, misusing his freedom, had fallen into sin. God in love sent his SON, who was called JESUS, i.e., the SAVIOUR. JESUS, responding to this love and sharing it, "for us men and for our salvation came down from heaven."

This is a fact, not discovered nor discoverable by man, but to be received upon most sure warrant of the Divine revelation. JESUS laid aside His Divine manifestation of power and glory, took upon Himself the form of a servant, and came into that relation with human nature that was necessary to His work as man's SAVIOUR.

"He was incarnate by the HOLY GHOST of the Virgin Mary, and became Man."

This is all literal truth, a fact with all actual significance and force, real in itself and all its relations. The Incarnation was a true human conception, wrought, however, by the supernatural operation of the HOLY GHOST. Mary was the true Mother of JESUS, yet a very virgin.

He became man in the fullest possible sense. All that constitutes man He was, is, and henceforth will forever continue. And yet He remains the same person, who is Very GOD of Very GOD. The General Council of Ephesus, 431 A.D., and that of Chalcedon, 451 A.D., established the doctrine that JESUS is One Person, who at His Incarnation took human nature into Himself, so that He became very man, not by confusion of natures,—i.e., not by compounding into a new commixture the human nature with the Divine,—but by so taking up the human with the Divine that His personality extended over the human; so that, remaining His very Divine self, He yet became man. Hence He enters into all essentially human relations, and from His Incarnation onward forever remains man.

Having thus set forth the SAVIOUR, in the singleness of His personality, and in the fullness of both His Divine and Human Natures, the Creed proceeds to declare His mission. It proceeds to show what He did in obedience to the will of the FATHER, who sent Him; and in accordance with His own coinciding love, which impelled Him; for the working out of the salvability of men, and for making salvation itself actual to all those who use their freedom in choosing, and seeking for it. This fact of human free-will is taken for granted in all the instructions of the Gospel, through all the articles of the Creed. God forces no man into good.

He only provides the way, gives all needful help, presents every impelling motive short of actual coercion, and then leaves man to choose whom he will have for his lord.

JESUS recognizes this inalienable human freedom, and presents Himself as the SAVIOUR of the willing; the bringer of peace to all men of good will; "The Way, The Truth, The Life."

Having become man, He proceeded to do the work necessary for the conquest of sin under which man lay in bondage.

"He suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead, and buried."

He thus made "one oblation of Himself, once offered, a full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction for the sins of the whole world." Thus the redemption, made only by JESUS, extended to all mankind. There is no limit to its efficacy, and it becomes efficient to every human person that does not shut himself out from its influence. Neglect or refusal of the means of grace every free man may be guilty of. Whoever accepts and uses the means of grace provided in the Gospel, being within the scope of redemption, is himself saved through the satisfaction for sins made by the God-man through His willing sacrifice of Himself on the cross.

"He descended into Hell,"—i.e., into Hades, the place and state wherein the spirits of the departed await the final judgment. What He did there is only partly revealed. He preached to "the spirits in prison," but what He preached is not revealed.

This clause was not in the earliest form of the Apostles' Creed; but has been in use since early in the fifth century.

"And the third day He rose again, according to the Scriptures."

The resurrection of JESUS was the burden of the preaching, and the warrant of the mission of the Apostles. They bore personal testimony to the fact. They saw and touched Him, ate and drank with Him, heard for forty days His instructions concerning the kingdom of heaven. It was their specific mission to set up this kingdom on earth. JESUS breathed on them, bestowing the HOLY GHOST, and gave them thus that grace of ordination which in obedience to His will has been transmitted through them and their successors even to our own times, and will be continued according to promise until the end of the world. He Himself, on bestowing this ordination, promised to be with His Apostles and their successors until the end of the world. The immediate successors of the Apostles took up their testimony, joined to it the link of their own witness, and handed on the chain to their own successors, and thus an unbroken line of witnesses to the fact of the resurrection of JESUS have kept the light of the Gospel shining mid the world-darkness of sin throughout the Christian generations. This conquest over death was made by the God-man JESUS as the completion of His work of justification. It stands yet, not only as the ground of assured hope, but as the victorious act of the "last Adam," through which death itself is stripped of its power over all those who place their trust on JESUS.

"He ascended into Heaven." The God-man thus ascended. The very humanity of our LORD, now and evermore indissolubly joined to the Divine nature in the person of the Only-Begotten, ascended into heaven, and sitteth at the right hand of God. He bore with Himself all the offices He had received, when the FATHER made Him the CHRIST, the Anointed one. He was anointed High-Priest of the new, perfected Tabernacle. In the very presence of God He exercises now the office of His High-Priesthood. "He ever liveth to make intercession for us." The worship offered throughout His kingdom on earth—the living Church everywhere—centres in the memorial of His sacrifice; as do also both the public and private devotions of His faithful disciples. He is present on earth in a mystical manner, and makes all His appointed means of grace efficient specifically by His power through the operation of the HOLY GHOST. Yet He remaineth ever at the right hand of God, exercising His priesthood in mediation. He takes upon Himself the penalty of all sin, and procures pardons for penitents, grace and help for the needy, assurance of hope with the peace that passeth understanding for all the faithful.

"From thence He shall come to judge the quick and the dead: Whose Kingdom shall have no end."

The Apostles evidently expected the speedy return of our LORD after they saw Him ascending into heaven. The Church, in all the ages since, has had the same expectation. No man, however, knoweth the time of His return. The point in which the Apostles, especially St. John, the last of them, were definitely agreed, was, that Jesus should return in His own personality, "in like manner as He was seen to go into heaven;" that He would then judge the world in righteousness, appoint due awards finally to all mankind, and set up His kingdom visibly in the universe. This continues to be the expectation of Christians. They are looking for this consummation daily. The long delay, as it seems, to those whose experience is bounded by mortal lifetime, is only a purifying trial of faith. The closing words of revelation ring yet in the ears of the saints: "He which testifieth these things says, Surely I come quickly." The hearts of the hopeful, who are waiting for Him on earth and in Hades, respond now, "Amen! Even so, come, LORD JESUS."

His "Kingdom without end" is to be universal. "At the name of JESUS every knee shall bow, of things in heaven, and in earth and under the earth." At the name of JESUS, the God-man, the very Divine Human indissoluble person, who was incarnate, dead, buried, risen, ascended! Hence this final universal kingdom shall be visibly presided over, and ruled forever, by God incarnate. Our own very human nature shall thus rule forever, in personal union with the Divine nature. This is an unrivalled promise, carrying with it every conceivable honor, distinction, blessing, comfort, and glory which can be conceived of as external to man. In addition, however, it is further revealed that this great final universal LORD shall so take His beloved into union that they, being in Him and He in them, they shall be His friends forever, as well as kings and priests unto God.

"And in the HOLY GHOST."

The Nicene Creed closed with these words. What follows to the end was added by the first Council of Constantinople, 381 A.D.:

"I, We believe in the HOLY GHOST, the LORD and Giver of life, Who proceedeth from the FATHER [and the SON]."

This completes the revelation of the mode of the Divine existence, and declares that the one GOD is, not merely appears, but is, from and for all eternity, Three Persons. The specific work of the HOLY GHOST is that of LORD and Giver of life. In operation the FATHER originally wills, the SON forms, and the HOLY GHOST vivifies. In the language of philosophy, the first is the Cause, the second the Formal Cause, while the third is the Efficient Cause of all existence. Their union is substantial. Their distinction is personal. They are one in nature, distinct in relations and office. They are distinct objects of devotion. Either may be addressed in prayer or thanksgiving. All join in the love which is of the Divine essence. All equally possess the Divine attributes. Their relations are real, though they act always in unison. Each executes His specific office. All join in common operation. Whoever is the "friend" of one is the friend of all. Salvation is the work of all. Saved men become the adopted children of the loving FATHER, the brethren of the God-man, the Only-Begotten SON, and the communicants in and with the HOLY GHOST.

The clause given above in brackets, "and the SON," was not in the original Creed of Constantinople. It was inserted by the Papal Church, under the influence of the Emperor Charlemagne, and has never been accepted by the Oriental Church. Indeed, the insertion of this clause was and is one of the grounds of the lamentable schism between the Church of the East and that of the West. They who in the West are disturbed by this addition to the old form of the Creed, and yet use it, explain it as the setting forth of the mission and not the nature of the personal HOLY GHOST. His procession from the FATHER they confess in the old form, but add that He proceedeth from the SON in accordance with the words of JESUS: "I will send Him unto you." Others accepting the doctrine of the "double procession," still would rather return to the old form, because it is the old form. Practically, the point does not disturb devotion. It belongs to the domain of metaphysics, and demands the most attenuated use of that philosophy for even understanding its statement.

"Who spake by the Prophets."

This work of the HOLY GHOST belongs to the department of inspiration. He it is who breathes into the men, chosen in the different ages to reveal God and His will, the true Word of God. The FATHER wills, the Son forms, the HOLY GHOST proclaims the Word of the LORD. Angels have been sometimes chosen as the messengers of revelation. Men, however, have been usually chosen in all generations. Prophets are of two kinds. Original prophets are those to whom the Word was first revealed. The anointed and appointed preachers of righteousness, in all ages, are secondary prophets. The HOLY GHOST inbreathes all. The first He causes to utter the truth, be they willing or unwilling. The latter are not always so compelled. They may mingle the truth of God with their own inventions. The words of the first are to be received as the Word of God. Those of the latter must be judged of by the hearer. Yet the HOLY GHOST is present in and with all preachers of the Word. The hearers, therefore, are under Divine obligation to heed what they hear, while the preacher is under like obligation "to rightly divide the Word of truth."

The clear apprehension and full reception of the doctrine of the Holy Trinity gives much clearness of understanding for the study of the Word of God: while the fact, practically considered, appeals with both tenderness and force to the heart. These conscious of sin find strength for their love of the FATHER in the personal assurance of the grace of the SON, while the communion of the HOLY GHOST works, in their own perceiving spirits, that perception of pardon and peace in which God is the one central power, manifested in beauty, sweetness, and comfort.

The whole Creed to this point treats of the Divine side of the Gospel. It sets forth God in His Trinity, distinct as three persons, yet united in substance and co-operation. It is necessary to be believed, because every fact touches human salvation, and pervades all real means of grace. The FATHER, the SON, and the HOLY GHOST all act divinely; but each, in His own chosen sphere, primarily acts and operates. They conjoin but never supersede one another.

We come next to the human instrumentality; set up indeed by Divine wisdom, imbued with Divine authority, and pervaded by the Divine presence with constant grace and help, but still human in its constitution, because composed of human members and organized according to human needs.

"I, We believe one Holy, Catholic and Apostolic Church."

As the belief necessary to the guidance and salvation of one man is the same that is necessary for all men, so are the means of grace the same for one and all. These means are comprised in the Constitution of the Church. Not only is the Church the appointed teacher of truth, but she is the custodian and dispenser of the sacraments, one of which joins every partaker in personal union with the God-man, and the other nourishes him with "the bread of heaven." The sacraments not only present truth in the form of doctrine to the mind, and move the heart with solemn memories, but they convey specific graces, corresponding to natural birth and nutrition. In one that new birth is effected in the faithful which makes them very members of CHRIST; and in the other they are "nourished up into everlasting life." They are generally necessary to salvation,—i.e., necessary for one and all where they can be had. The ministration of these visible means of grace supposes and requires the existence of one visible body, the Church. Hence the Gospel appeared at first as a regularly constituted organization. It was one and the same in all the early ages. The Apostles, as one college, first administered the affairs of the whole Church. Very soon, however, they took each a specific sphere. St. James took his See in Jerusalem. Paul and Barnabas became missionaries to the Gentiles, and St. Peter to those of the Circumcision. Paul made Timothy and Titus Apostles, and set the first in Ephesus and the other in Crete with Episcopal jurisdiction, as his Epistles to either clearly show. This was followed throughout the Church. From the very dawn of Church history Bishops appear, every where, exercising the Apostolic authority, while Presbyters and Deacons are always found working with and under them. Indeed, every national Church of which any record is found, for fifteen hundred years, had its hierarchy composed always of Bishops, Priests, and Deacons. Although the term Bishop, during the historic period of the New Testament, represented only a function—viz., an overseership—and was applied even to some Presbyters, yet the proper office of the Bishop was in the hands of Apostles, including the Eleven, with Matthias and Paul. Afterwards the name Apostle was confined, as a memorial of reverence, to the first receivers of the piscopal office, and the term Bishop was given to their successors. From that time to the present a Bishop has been and is not merely an overseer, but all that an Apostle ever was in official authority and power within the Church. True, Bishops are now successors of the Apostles, by unbroken lines of ordination, and possess the dignity, office, and mission which CHRIST gave to the Twelve, and in which He promised to sustain them by His own presence with them until the end of the world.

The unity of the Church is a fact, because "He is the head of the Church, which is His body, the fullness of Him that filleth all in all." It is holy, because it is His Body, and dispenses all the means of grace, by word, sacrament, and discipline, through which holiness is promoted and preserved. It is Catholic, or universal, because it is one, operating alike for every man and for all. It is Apostolic, because it is founded upon the Apostles and prophets, JESUS CHRIST Himself being the chief corner-stone.

Thus the Gospel is not merely a code of laws, or congeries of doctrines, but is a veritable organism also, divine in origin, and perpetuated by the indwelling presence of the Word of GOD, by the providence and grace and truth which JESUS dispenses by the SPIRIT, through and by means of His own sure though unseen presence.

The Church, though divine thus in origin and perpetuity, is also human; because men, women, and children, in all the generations, constitute her membership. She is the chosen visible witness of GOD on the earth. Her primary mission is to keep alight and glowing this witness in every age, and hand it on to succeeding generations. Besides this specific work for the honor of GOD, she has that of calling the world to repentance, of receiving into the Divine household the "children of adoption," and of keeping that which is committed to her against that day.

While human in constitution, she is not of man's making. Man can no more make a church than he can originally create a living person. He may make images in likeness of the living, but GOD only can breathe in the breath of life and give power to be fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth.

The clause in the Apostles' Creed which is joined with this article—"the Communion of the Saints"—is not found in its earliest forms. It was inserted, no one knows exactly how and when, but has been in common use for about thirteen centuries. It is simply a definite expression of a point included in the original article. The Holy Catholic Church is of course the communion of the saints, because it is the Body of CHRIST; and the communion of all holy persons is with one another through their common union with CHRIST. The thought in this clause includes past, present, and future. All those who are departed in the true faith of the Most Holy Name are at rest in JESUS; not dis severed from the living, but only separated in vision by the curtain of the grave; while all the saved in coming generations will enter the same one body, and join in the one communion. However the clause came in, it is sanctioned by long usage, and sanctified by holiest associations. On every occasion of its utterance it gives sweet and strong expression to that sense of both brotherly and organic common membership in the family and Church of the living GOD, which space and time cannot diminish, which death itself cannot dis sever, and which shall continue ever brightening but ever the same through time into eternity.

"I, We acknowledge one Baptism for the remission of sins."

The sins of all those who are joined in communion with CHRIST are remitted. The sentence of pardon to the penitent is declared by those who are ordained to this authority; but the actual impartation of remission is in and through grafting into Him who is the life of the world. This portion of the Creed is in exact accordance, and most perfect harmony, with the pervading idea, or rather essence of the Gospel. The Gospel is more than a system of theology or code of law, or rule of fitness, order, and beauty; it is a veritable organism. It operates beneath the understanding, or will, or affections, even upon the central essence of personality. It takes position in the very being of self, and there joins the faithful to CHRIST. Hence, as CHRIST Himself ingrafts His own chosen branches into Himself, He is the one Baptizer. As St. John says, i. 34, οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ βαπτίζων ἐν ἰσχυρί ἁγίῳ, He is the Baptizer with the HOLY GHOST.

His Apostles, with their successors, including all to whom authority to baptize is transmitted, receive into the Church by baptizing with water "into the name of the FATHER, and of the SON, and of the HOLY GHOST." But the promise of Jesus given with this mission, "Lo, I am with you always," is most sure warrant that He is present when the outward visible form is fulfilled, and that He it is who then and there baptizes with the HOLY GHOST. This makes baptism complete in both visible order and spiritual grace. The question of the possibility of a bar against this spiritual baptism, made by the recipient consciously or unconsciously, is not now under consideration. The point is, that every real baptism is perfected by the one Baptizer; and that it effects such organic union of the baptized person with CHRIST that the remission of sin is secured and conveyed. He who is truly baptized hath "put on CHRIST," and "there is therefore now no condemnation to them that are in CHRIST JESUS."

Hence the terms of the Creed are explicit. It declares the perfectness of remission in baptism. It makes no reservation. Baptism is "generally necessary to salvation," because it is the ordinary and appointed means of effecting that organic union with CHRIST, which is salvation. The person baptized is made one with CHRIST, by the specific operation of the LORD and Giver of life, and CHRIST only imparts this gift of the HOLY GHOST.

"The resurrection of the body." "I, We look for the resurrection of the dead."

This is an exclusively Christian doctrine. It is quite different from the old heathen notion of the immortality of the soul, and unlike all conceptions of a future life held and taught in other forms of religion. Its point is, that the very body of the dead human person is as truly and perfectly his own body as was the body of the dead CHRIST His while it lay in the tomb. There is no conflict between this fact and the equally sure facts of bodily dissolution. We believe the natural decay, disintegration, and possible wide diffusion, through earth, water, or air, of the material substance in which the living human body is manifested in mortal life. It is evidently not the material substance which constitutes the body. It makes itself manifest in this life by means of material substance, though the very particles themselves are continually changing. In what the very essence of body dwells is not known. All we are sure of is that every body is distinct from every other body; that every person has his own body. This body may die, but can never be destroyed. It may be laid in the grave, as seed may be covered in the ground. God, however, will raise it up at the last day. As He giveth to every germinating and growing seed His own body, so shall the body of the very person who died in its own identity be recalled to life. St. Paul says, "It is sown a natural body,"—i.e., a psychical or soul body,—“It shall be raised a spiritual body.” This teaches us nothing about the substance in which the immortal body shall manifest itself. All it does clearly teach is that as the mortal body is an instrument of the soul, so also shall the immortal body be a fitting instrument for the uses of the spirit. This tripartite constitution of man, in body, soul, and spirit, is thus shown to be essential, and therefore indestructible. Death is only a temporary disruption of the threefold unity of every human person. When death shall be finally conquered, every one of the faithful shall dwell in his completely restored tripartite constitution, in the open presence of the unveiled Trinity.

“The life everlasting.” “The life of the world to come.”

It will be best always to consider carefully that the Creed is the symbol of faith for all true believers in Christianity. It sets forth exclusively the positive facts and grounds of faith and hope. It is silent of threatenings. Its silence, however, is no evidence that the supplementary contrasts to its assertions are not real and sure. It says nothing of the second death. It leaves that and all similar warnings and threatenings to be made known as they are commanded to be proclaimed. It is like a shout of victory and song of triumph. It is occupied alone with the glories of the saints. They shall enter into “life everlasting.” It will be essentially the same as the “eternal life,” which God hath given to His beloved, and which they enjoy on earth according to their measure. This life is the personal communion of the saints with the person God, who is love, light, life. They dwell with Him. Even during mortality He takes up His abode in them. The future life everlasting will be the same reciprocal personal communion, but in the midst of a new environment. Not earth-darkness, sin, sorrow, and toil will then surround the loving ones who are “the friends of God,” but rest, peace, purity, joy uninterrupted and unceasing will be theirs. Their spiritual bodies will dwell with Him, who human as they are forever, is yet God-man, ever continuing “Head over all things to the Church, which is His body.” The details of the heavenly environment are not given. Something is either taught literally or suggested in gorgeously figurative description in the Bible, especially in “the book of the Revelation;” but the essential fact that is made known is simply that we shall be like CHRIST. Now CHRIST, in His Divine Manhood, is LORD over all things forever. This, then, is what Christians must surely believe of the life everlasting, viz.: that it will be passed with the reciprocal, loving companionship of all saints, in the very open presence of God, where, “all things being subdued unto Him,” nothing shall by any means hurt “the sons of God,” but, through the LORD of All, everything good shall be for the use of those whom JESUS shall finally present to the FATHER and confess before God and the angels.

“Amen.” The original meaning of this word is verily, or truly. Its frequent use by JESUS during His life on earth, with the manner of that use, gives to it a peculiar solemnity. It is the preface to His most solemn and significant declarations. His assurance of union with the FATHER, His most glorious promises and most fearful denunciations, are begun often with Amen, verily. It is therefore a formula of direct appeal to the God of Truth. In this sense it seals the whole Creed, and becomes a solemn declaration, as in the sight of God, that this is the very sum and substance of that faith in which the saints live and labor, and into which they hope to enter finally at the perfect consummation.

REV. B. FRANKLIN, D.D.

Criticism. The passing a judgment on any subject. It is a department of study which has been applied, with destructive consequences to the faith of many, to the examination of the books of Holy Scripture. It is subdivided into several parts: I. Philological criticism, testing the genuineness of a document by the style and the words used, determining whether they were at the date assigned to the document in common use, or whether they were of earlier or later date. II. Internal criticism, the examination of the contents of the document, determining whether the subjects discussed were in truth those current at the assigned date, or were earlier or later, or whether the whole document coheres throughout, or contains matter that properly betrays interpolation. III. Criticism based upon external history. Devoutly used these are very great helps to a proper understanding of the different books of the Canon of Scripture, and we have to use with caution and discrimination the instruments it puts into our hands. There are three sources for the popular confusion of ideas about the books of Scripture and their contents: The perfectly just and defensible habit of quoting indifferently side by side texts from all parts of the Bible, though historically Genesis is separated from Revelation by at least fifteen centuries. The carelessness common in giving due instruction about their purposes and contents and upon the doctrine of inspiration. The want of due heed in using and arguing from the contents of the several books of the Bible. When some startling assertion is made, with an array of apparent learning contrary to the vague ideas current as to the date, history, and contents of a book, it is popularly supposed that the book or books in question are not genuine or not authentic. Criticism has done very much to rouse up an intelligent study of Holy Scripture, and with all the sad consequences to some, we must be very thankful for the firm foundation it has proven for the genuineness of the Bible. Attack has not only developed complete defense upon all important points, but it has cleared away a great deal of confused incorrect teaching, as a siege against an impregnable fortress clears away much underbrush which has gathered without the defenses but is itself conducted with much pomp, parade, and noise. And it may be that the obscuring smoke of the attack may hang long over the citadel. The books of the Old Testament have had a great deal of light thrown upon their purpose and contents, while the traditional dates of their composition have been in general established, and wherever modified, only in an unimportant way. The war of criticism has raged chiefly round three points,—the Pentateuch, Isaiah, and Daniel. All other controversies are subordinate to these, and these have been most successfully maintained in their integrity. That after the Captivity explanatory phrases, e.g., "as it is this day," were probably inserted by some authority, as Ezra, is true. That documents were used and rearranged by Moses, documents of their early history preserved carefully among the B'nai, does not at all affect the fact of his inspiration. The minute accuracy of his books has been amply proven at all points. So, too, of Isaiah. Whether there were "two Isaiahs" living at different times, but having their separate writings bound up into one, or a later writer borrowing the name of the earlier genuine Isaiah, depends upon the single fact whether there is such a gift as prophecy or not. If God does permit the future to be foretold, then there was but one Isaiah,—the son of Amoz,—who prophesied "in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah" (Isa. i. 1). The defense of Daniel has been most ably made by Dr. Pusey in his exhaustive lectures, and by others also.

In the New Testament the authenticity of the Gospel of St. John, of the Apocalypse, of several of St. Paul's Epistles, has been attacked, but the contest now is nearly over; the main battle over the fourth Gospel has been successfully won.

That there has been no change in the view in which these books must be held is not asserted, but that there has been any essential change, or that their authenticity, authority, and inspiration has suffered in the slightest, is not true. Their authority is higher than ever, because more intelligently and clearly apprehended.

In this article there is no attempt to recount the canons of criticism, which critics, principally those in Germany, have laid down as inviolable, and have deliberately broken whenever it suited their purpose, to point out how, denying the clear sequence of facts, they have selected such isolated ones as fitted in best with their preconceived theories and absolutely despotically rejected the rest, or to note how often they have built up—as substitutes for plain recitals of easily comprehended narratives, which were thoroughly coherent internally and fitted with the external surrounding, because they were true—vague, wild guesses, that were utterly baseless, and asserted these to be genuine and veracious. The result was that these critics refuted each in turn his predecessor, and substituted for facts his own baseless ideas of what the facts should be, by their own disagreements defeating their purpose. The outcome, though we have not yet seen the end of the whole controversy, has been so far, and will eventually terminate in, the complete vindication of the Inspired Scriptures of the Church of God.

Crosier. The pastoral staff of the Archbishop. The pastoral staff is of very early use. It has been claimed as coming to the Church from the staff held by heathen priests. It may probably have been taken from the shepherd's crook, since that was a most appropriate symbol, often used in the Old Testament. Still, the staff as a badge of office, and of use also, was one so universally employed that almost any explanation of its original introduction into the Church's ritual would have some mark of truth, and only tend to show that it was used very early. The crook was later assigned to the Bishop,—the plain pastoral staff; the crosier, i.e., the cross alone, to the Archbishop. The Patriarch was given a staff with two cross-bars.

Cross. Once the instrument of unutterable torture and shame, now the badge of the Christian religion. It is used as an ornament in Churches. It is worn on the person; it is worked into the vestments of the services. It furnishes the plan for many sacred edifices. It was used once universally as a gesture of benediction. It is used in the Church officially at the reception of the infant or adult after baptism into the Christian Church. Its shadow falls upon many a grave. So thoroughly has it passed from an instrument or sign of shame to a badge of the Christian. The true sense of the use of the sign of the cross in baptism is well given by Dr. Burgess's explanation, accepted by King James, and affirmed by Archbishop Bancroft to be the sense of the Church: "I understand it not as any sacramental, or operative, or efficacious sign, bringing any virtue to baptism or the baptized. When the book says, 'and so sign him with the sign of the cross in token,' etc., I understand the book not to mean that the sign of the cross has any virtue in it to effect or further this duly, but only to intimate and express by that ceremony, by which the ancients did avow their profession of CHRIST crucified, what the congregation hopeth and expecteth hereafter from the infant, namely, that he shall not be ashamed to profess the faith of CHRIST crucified into which he was even now baptized."

Crusades. The expeditions of Christian armies to Palestine and Egypt for the recovery of the Holy Land from the possession of the Saracens. They were called Crusades both because they were undertaken to recover Jerusalem and the so-called Holy Cross, and because the soldiers wore a cross on their clothes and had one upon their standards. There were in all eight crusades, extending over a period of nearly two hundred and seventy years. The causes of the crusades lay farther back than the immediate motives for them. They were begun and continued under religious enthusiasm, intermittent indeed, but sufficiently strong to lead to the enormous sacrifices of means and life which they involved.

The first crusade—the result of the preaching of Peter the Hermit and of the urgings of the Greek emperor and the Patriarch of Jerusalem—was at first a disorganized rabble, under the lead of Peter, was organized by the princes that shared in it, and finally was led by them, at the head of the several columns, formed without much concert, towards Constantinople. Godfrey of Bouillon was the first to reach that city at the head of eighty thousand troops. He at once pushed into Asia Minor and besieged Nice, which he took in six weeks (1097 A.D.). Antioch was captured a year after, and after a siege Jerusalem fell, and was barbarously sacked, and the Jews were burnt in the synagogue and the infidels massacred, it is said, to the number of seventy thousand. Godfrey was chosen king and was crowned, and soon after, upon the crushing defeat of the sultan of Egypt on the plain of Ascalon, the princes disbanded and returned home.

The second crusade was, in 1144 A.D., led by the Emperor Conrad III. and Louis VII., but it proved abortive. The Greek emperor fearing its successes quite as much as he did the Saracens, practically betrayed the German army by misleading it in the defiles of Asia Minor. The French army too was mismanaged, and when at last the remnants of the army were placed in position before Damascus, disease and want and dissensions destroyed its efficiency, and the expedition soon came to an end. It was a most discouraging defeat to all of Europe at the time.

The third crusade was preceded like the first by eager, enthusiastic rabbles, which pressed forward to their destruction. Jerusalem had fallen before Saladin in 1187 A.D. Acre was invested by Guy de Lusignan, and the wastes of the siege repaired by the multitudes who pushed into the siege from Europe. Frederick Barbarossa was drowned after defeating the sultan of Iconium, and his troops were wasted at Antioch. Philip Augustus and Richard I. at last successively reached the plains about Acre. Dissensions broke out, and there was little real concert of action, but Acre finally capitulated. But dissension and the retreat of Leopold and of Philip left Richard alone. A victory over Saladin at Ascalon brought on a truce, and the third crusade ended, 1192 A.D.

Since Jerusalem had not been recovered from the Saracens, a fourth crusade was preached 1198 A.D., but it was not organized till 1202 A.D., but it was diverted from its destination. It captured Zara for the Venetians and Constantinople for Alexis and his father Isaac, but feuds, dissensions, open war with friends and allies, marked its steps, 1203-4 A.D. At last the few who reached Palestine were defeated. No crusade had such excellent chances of success, and not another wasted them so ignorantly (1204 A.D.).

The fifth crusade was undertaken by Hungarian Crusaders in 1217 A.D., and was joined in by Germans, Italians, English, and French under the Duke of Austria. After Andrew of Hungary withdrew, it made an expedition into Egypt, where, upon its successes, peace was asked for by the Egyptian sultans at the price of the cession of Jerusalem. This was refused through the cupidity of the papal legate, and finally the Crusaders were compelled to withdraw, after having lost everything. The Christians still held Acre. Frederick of Germany now headed the crusade, but he was at feud with the Pope (1228 A.D.), and, without attempting military operations, succeeded through negotiation in obtaining free access to Jerusalem and a peace for ten years. He went to Jerusalem and there crowned himself, and then returned to Europe (1228 A.D.).

The seventh crusade, begun 1238 A.D., was likewise formed of separate expeditions. One was led from France, and was wrecked in the defeat at Gaza. The second, which recovered Jerusalem, was led by the Earl of Cornwall, and accomplished its work without a battle. Jerusalem was held till 1242 A.D., when it was recaptured by the Chawarazmian Moguls, who defeated the Templars and the Moslem, and overran all of Palestine. Acre was the sole port left to the Christians. Louis the Pious now undertook to repair these losses, and planned to attack Egypt (1248 A.D.). The same fatality,—wasted time, lost opportunities, and ill-planned battles which were fruitless victories, ended at last in the capture of the king (1250 A.D.) near Cairo. Damietta was surrendered in exchange for him. He remained four years longer at Acre, but at last returned home only to prepare for the last crusade. In 1270 A.D. he led the last crusade, which proceeded against Tunis, but died before the city was captured. A truce was made for ten years, and some liberties for Christians were stipulated in the treaty. Edward of England made an expedition with three hundred knights into Syria, but was compelled to return by the death of his father and his own consequent accession to the throne. So ended the crusades. Acre was captured by the Moslem in 1291 A.D., and they were for centuries left in an undisturbed possession of the Holy Land.

The social and political results of the crusades were in the end beneficial, but never before or since have treasure, lives, and time been so lavishly wasted as in these ill-planned and worse-executed assaults upon Syria.

Crypt. (Hidden place.) A subterranean vault under any portion of the church. It was sometimes used as a place of burial. In very ancient churches it is the surest indication of what were the original plan and dimensions of the church.

Culdees. Probably a corruption of Colidei, i.e., Servi Dei. An order of ascetic monks originally established in Ireland (792 A.D.), and apparently imitators of the rule of Chrodegan of Metz. They existed in Ireland, but in connection with later Cathedral Chapters, till the Reformation, and the name survived till 1628 A.D. But the name and history of these secular ascetics attracted more notice in Scotland, in which country they appeared about 800 A.D. Their peculiar habits differing from other monastic orders, and the fact that they were very frequently married, and that their place in the body was hereditary, that they were governed sometimes by lay Abbots, drew attention to them. They continued to exist as separate both from the old orders of St. Columba and the foreign orders, as the Benedictines, brought into Scotland about two hundred years later. As secular in habits, with clerical ordination, they were an anomaly, which was at last gotten rid of by attaching them, as in Ireland, to some Cathedral Chapter. The name and probably the rule of the body survived for a long time, but they were brought under diocesan rule. Their origin and government, both in Ireland and Scotland, were most probably the outcome of the tendencies and development of their age, and not properly borrowed from any foreign example.

Cup. The chalice used in the administration of the Holy Communion. It is the term used by the translators of the New Testament. "The cup which we bless, is it not the communion of the Blood of CHRIST?"

(1 Cor. x. 16.) Its form as a vessel varied according to convenience or means; but at first sometimes of wood, it was usually of silver, gold, glass, more seldom of baser metal.

Doctrinally, the cup is the communicating to the devout recipient all the blessings that the shedding of CHRIST'S Blood upon the cross have obtained for us. "Most humbly beseeching Thee to grant that by the merits and death of Thy SON JESUS CHRIST and through faith in His blood, we, and all Thy whole Church, may obtain remission of our sins and all other benefits of His Passion," and so throughout this Prayer of Oblation. It is the reception, how or by what mode we may not now know (St. John xiii. 7, a principle announced by our LORD applicable to all mysteries) of the Blood of CHRIST (St. John vi. 55, 56), to be by us received "in remembrance of His meritorious Cross and Passion, whereby alone we obtain remission of our sins and are made partakers of the kingdom of heaven."

To withhold the cup, then, from the laity upon any imagined principle whatever, practical or doctrinal, is to act contrary to the express command of our LORD and of His Apostles, and to administer a maimed and imperfect sacrament. For any layman, upon any pretext, to withdraw after receiving the Body is to do an insult to the Giver of the Feast, the LORD JESUS CHRIST.

Curate. One who has the cure of souls, under the direction of another. It properly belonged to the Deacon, but was, and is, extended to any Priest who is serving in the parish of another. The term is not known in this country, where the Priest or Deacon is properly—according to rubric and Canon—called the Assistant Minister, though only a Priest can be instituted as assistant in a parish.

Cure of Souls. The work of the ministry. The Bishop of the Diocese has an unlimited cure in his jurisdiction, since he is the responsible head of the Diocese, and is the angel of his Church (cf. Rev. ii. and iii.). The Priest and Deacon are his subordinates, having limited jurisdiction,—i.e., within the parishes to which they are sent and over which they are to have charge. Offices not in use in this country, as Archdeacons, have elsewhere jurisdiction of supervision and partially of discipline, being the Commissaries of the Bishop. The charge to the Priest at his ordination (vide ORDINATION OF PRIESTS) and to the Bishop (vide CONSECRATION OF BISHOPS), together with the questions put to each, show plainly the extent and the limit of the cure of souls, and the great responsibilities laid upon each.

Dalmatica. Originally a secular dress, a tunic with either short or no sleeves, belonging to persons of the upper class, and, later, worn only by sovereigns at their coronation. The earliest mention known is in the account of Cyprian's martyrdom (if the MSS. be genuine) (256 B.C.). The martyr took off first his outer cloak, then his dalmatica, which he gave to his Deacons, and stood in his linen under-garment. It was worn by Bishops, and then permitted to Priests, and finally it became the distinctive vestment for Deacons at the celebration of the Holy Communion.

Damnation. The New Testament word for which this is the translation is used indiscriminately both of the sentence and the execution, but there is no detail of the nature of the punishment inflicted implied in the word. Its application (a) to the judgment of the wicked at the last day, and (b) to the punishment that follows, is to be gathered from the context, not from the word itself. It can only be by comparison that we can determine those passages which bear mainly upon the point of the condition of the lost. Upon this point the Church has never passed any oecumenical teaching, though the certainty of damnation has always been assumed. The materialistic views of some of the earlier teachers soon passed over into the immaterialized spiritual torments held by later doctors. As to the duration of that torment, there has again been no dogmatic teaching by the whole Church, though Origen's ideas of a final remission were condemned. In fact, wherever Scripture is silent, leaving a fact as a mystery to be solved hereafter, the Church has been providentially kept from making a formal statement. But as the weight of Holy Scripture leans to the doctrine of everlasting punishment, so does the mind of the Holy Church. All theorizing about material or spiritual torments and when these are to be fulfilled, all vain interpolations of purgatorial pains, and all theories of final restoration, find no place in her teaching. What her Lord has told she believes, what He has concealed she does not presume to know.

But this word damnation is used in two places which have given rise to much misunderstanding, or rather the second place (in the exhortation to the communicants) is a quotation from the first place (1 Cor. xi. 29). As the word damnation—krima—does not in itself determine the nature, degree, or extent of the punishment, it is really a vague term. But the next verse shows the lingering, suspended sentence giving room for its withdrawal; for though the contents of the sentence refer to an actual epidemic, it bears for us a spiritual sense also, and the whole refers to the disciplinary, not the punitive nature of God's sentences upon us here. Therefore it is a morbid straining and an infusion of more than it will bear, to give the word "damnation" in these places the extreme signification often forced upon it.

Daniel. (God's judge, or God is my judge.) The name of either three or four different persons mentioned in the Old Testament: (1) 1 Chron. iii. 1; (2) Ezra viii. 2; (3) Neh. x. 6. But it was also borne by the last of "the four greater prophets." According to Dan. i. he was one of a small body of captives carried from Jerusalem to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar in the third year of Jehoiakim (604 B.C.). Nebuchadnezzar is called "king of Babylon," but his father, Nebopolassar, was still on the throne, as we learn from Jer. xxv. 1, that the first year of Nebuchadnezzar coincided with the fourth of Jehoiakim, and from Dan. ii. 1, that the second year of Nebuchadnezzar was in the third year of Daniel's captivity. All these dates fall into harmony on the natural supposition that Nebuchadnezzar would have been called king by the Jews, while actually only his father's viceroy intrusted with the command of their affairs. From these captives a number were selected of royal or of noble family, distinguished alike by their physical and mental characteristics and by their education, to be especially trained for the king's service. Among these were Daniel and his three companions, and of these Daniel was the most distinguished. The name of Belteshazzar (the prince of Bel), given to him at Babylon, was doubtless intended as the equivalent of his Hebrew name. His training at the court of Nebuchadnezzar was but just completed when he recalled and explained, by means of the wisdom divinely given, the famous dream of the king when all the wise men of the realm had failed. This at once gave him rank and position, and he was made "ruler over the whole province of Babylon" (Dan. ii. 48). In this position he must have had the opportunity, and have used it, to be of great service to his countrymen who were carried into captivity somewhat later, and he must have become personally acquainted with Ezekiel, the great prophet among them. Later on he explained the second dream of Nebuchadnezzar (Dan. iv.), and in consequence secured from the king a decree declaring his sense of the power of the God of the Jews. This must have tended to ameliorate their condition, and they seem to have believed that Daniel's influence with the king could avert the threatened destruction of their city and temple. Hence it became necessary for Ezekiel, in proclaiming that judgment, to say that even his intercession, like that of Noah and Job, would prove unavailing (Ezek. xiv. 14-20). Under the immediate successors of Nebuchadnezzar he appears to have been forgotten, but in the extremity of Belshazzar he was again called forth, and interpreted the handwriting upon the wall pronouncing the doom of the king and the kingdom. At the accession of Darius he was made the first of the "three presidents" of the whole kingdom, and still higher honor was intended (Dan. vi. 1-4), when, by the intrigues of the courtiers, he was thrown into the den of lions. From this he was delivered and restored to honor, and he continued to prosper under the reign of Cyrus, in whose third year his last recorded vision is dated (Dan. x. 1). He must have been now extremely advanced in age, and, notwithstanding some untrustworthy Mohammedan traditions, it is unlikely that he ever returned to his native land. Besides Ezekiel's mention of Daniel already spoken of, he again refers to him (ch. xxviii. 3) as a distinguished example of wisdom. Critics have found difficulty in such mention by the prophet of a man still living and still in the prime of life; but it is plain that Daniel's wisdom was very remarkable, and stood out in public and known superiority to all the famous wisdom of the Chaldeans. His fellow-countrymen in captivity must have looked up to him almost as a superior being, and no higher example of wisdom could have been presented to them.

Daniel, The Book of, is placed in our Canon as the last of the four greater prophets, but in the Hebrew Bible it stands among the Hagiographa, or Holy Writings, either between Esther and Ezra or immediately before Esther. Various reasons have been given for this position, such as, that one-half the book being in Chaldee instead of in Hebrew, it was thought it should be separated from the other prophets; or that it was distinguished from them by the fact that all its prophecies were communicated by dreams and visions and not by a direct "Thus saith the LORD;" but the true reason seems to have been a regard to the apocalyptic character of the book and a recognition of the distinction between the functions of the prophet and the seer.

At chapter ii. 4, the language changes from Hebrew to Chaldee when recording the answer of the Chaldeans to the king in their own language (Syriac-Aramaic); and this language continues to the close of chapter vii., when the Hebrew is resumed for the rest of the book. As nearly as may be, therefore, the book is evenly divided between these languages. This change of language is often explained by saying that the half of the book of especial interest to the Chaldeans, and mostly concerned with the dreams and the acts of their kings, is written in their language, while the half more particularly designed for the Church is in the sacred language. This is generally true, but must be supplemented by the statement that the seventh chapter is probably put into Chaldee on account of the vision being substantially the same as the dream of Nebuchadnezzar and its interpretation in chapter ii., which was already in Chaldee. Moreover, there seems no reason why the first chapter, which is simply historical, should have been in Hebrew unless the Jewish tradition be accepted, which states that the several prophecies were written separately and independently, and were collected by the elders of the people, who prefixed this chapter as a needed introduction. If this tradition be accepted, there remains no difficulty in the terms in which Daniel is spoken of, and thus the objection sometimes brought on this ground against his authorship of this book is entirely removed. There is no reason why such a merely historical introduction should not have been prefixed by any competent and authorized person. The Chaldee of the book is of an earlier type than that of the Targums, while the Hebrew is of a late character, resembling that of Ezekiel and Habakkuk, though purer than the former. So far as the language is concerned therefore, a date is indicated for the book in the time of the captivity when the Jews were gradually exchanging their own language for the Aramaic. The same indication is furnished by the few Greek words found in the book. These are all technical names of musical instruments, doubtless brought with the instruments themselves from foreign sources, and naturally result from the commercial intercourse already established between Greece and Babylon. If, as some critics maintain, the book had been written in the closing years of the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, it is inconceivable that it should not bear the impress of the Greek literature and culture of that period, when Hebrew appears to have become almost entirely a dead language.

After the first introductory chapter, the contents of the book are as follows: chapter ii. contains an account of a forgotten dream of Nebuchadnezzar which he required to have recalled and interpreted. All the wise men of the kingdom having failed, Daniel, through prayer and the intercession of his friends with God, was enabled to do this, and showed the king the succession of four great kingdoms, of which his own was the first, all terminating in the universal and everlasting reign of God. The circumstances attending the interpretation of this dream must have given it publicity, and Nebuchadnezzar may have feared its effect upon the permanency of his empire. At all events, it is recorded in chapter iii. that he set up a great image, having not only the head but the body also of gold, and sought to unite his whole empire in its worship.

Any one of his officers who should refuse to worship was to be cast into a furnace. The description of the officers summoned seems to have been purposely arranged so as not to include Daniel himself; but his three friends were involved, and refusing the required worship, were at once cast into the furnace. Nebuchadnezzar saw them walking there unharmed with a fourth glorious form "like the SON of GOD," and commanded their release. It is quite in character with the clearness and strength of his mind that, having thus recognized a power greater than his own, he should have issued a decree in honor of the greatness of that Power. A feeble mind might have obstinately persisted in the contest, but he was a man of sufficient sagacity to recognize the utter folly of such a course. Chapter iv. is entirely occupied with a royal decree, recounting a dream and its interpretation by Daniel, the king's temporary insanity, his recovery, and consequent recognition of the power of the Most High. The recently discovered monuments of Babylon afford proof of a period in Nebuchadnezzar's reign in which, according to his own inscription, there was a suspension of all his great works on his temples, and palaces, and canals of irrigation, as well as of his worship and offerings. Herodotus also ascribes to a queen several of the important works which others attribute to Nebuchadnezzar. No other explanation can well be suggested for these remarkable facts than the temporary insanity (technically Lycanthropy) which is recorded in this chapter. That an Oriental kingdom should have been preserved to its monarch through such an eclipse is remarkable; but in this case there were strong and peculiar reasons. The heir apparent, Evil Merodach, was a very undesirable ruler; Nebuchadnezzar himself had been a mighty conqueror, and his name was a tower of strength; from the notice of her works by Herodotus, the queen, who acted as regent, seems to have been an excellent ruler; and above all, the internal administration of the empire was largely in the hands of the wise and able Daniel. Chapter v. gives an account of the feast of Belshazzar, in the midst of which came the handwriting upon the wall, interpreted by Daniel, of the death of that monarch, and of the reception of the kingdom by Darius. Much objection was made at one time to this account because Berosus and Herodotus state that the last king of Babylon was Nabonnedus or Labynetus, and that he was not killed at the capture of the city. But the monuments have solved the difficulty by furnishing an inscription in which Nabonnedus addresses his son Belshazzar with royal titles, showing that he had associated him with himself upon the throne, and therefore Belshazzar was naturally left in command of the city when his father had taken the field. Xenophon concurs with Daniel in the statement that the last king of Babylon was slain in the capture of the city. There still remains a question in regard to Darius. Various theories have been proposed, but further information must be obtained from the monuments before he can be certainly identified. In the sixth chapter an account is given of the intrigues of the courtiers, and of the decree obtained from Darius, and of Daniel's being thrown into the den of lions in consequence of his disobedience to this decree. Chapter vii. goes back chronologically to the first year of Belshazzar, and records the extremely important vision, parallel to chapter ii., of the four beasts, representing four world-empires succeeding one another, and all ending in the universal and eternal divine government. The chief controversies concerning the book turn upon the interpretation of this prophecy. To enter into these varying interpretations would occupy too much space. Suffice it to say that the best supported interpretation, and the one, until lately, almost universally received, understands the first kingdom of the Babylonian of which Nebuchadnezzar was head, the second of the Medo-Persian, the third of the Greek rule of Alexander and his successors, and the fourth of the Roman. All the other interpretations, though varying in their methods, concur in making the fourth kingdom that of Alexander or of his successors. These views have been ably refuted in Pusey's work on Daniel. Chapter viii. gives further details in regard to Alexander and his successors, especially concerning Antiochus Epiphanes, and the interpretation is so plainly given in connection with the vision itself that no room is left for doubt. The ninth chapter is chiefly occupied with the prayer of Daniel concerning the close of the captivity, and closes with the wonderful prophecy of the seventy weeks to elapse before the coming of the MESSIAH. Much learning and ingenuity have been expended in seeking to find some other meaning for this prophecy, but none of the varying interpretations thus proposed commend themselves as having either internal probability or the support of any external evidence; and they all rest on the assumption that the writer, living in a later age, did not recognize the historic fact of the fulfillment of Jeremiah's prophecy in the return of the Jews from their captivity. The remainder of the book is one continuous prophecy, given in the third year of Cyrus, and is occupied with the story of the struggles between the Seleucidæ (the kings of the north) and the Ptolemies (the kings of the south, or of Egypt), in the course of which the chosen people suffered greatly, the whole closing with references to the future, which have been variously understood as referring either (1) to the spiritual resurrection of many of the people after their great struggle with the power of the heathen, or (2) to the literal resurrection of the last great day.

The book of Daniel, as a whole, thus stands out as giving more than any other prophecies world-wide and comprehensive views of the providence of God in the government of the world, and more definite indication than any other of the exact time of the coming of the MESSIAH. Besides the disputed points in its interpretation already specified, mention must be made of "the little horn" of chapter xi., which has been and still continues to be variously understood. Of the genuineness and authenticity of the book there appears never to have been any doubt until the time of Porphyry. It is contained (with apocryphal additions) in the LXX. and other Greek translations of the Old Testament, although in the volume of the LXX. the translation of Theodotion was afterwards substituted for that originally made, probably through the influence of Origen. It is recognized in the books of Maccabees (1 ch. ii. 59, 60, and in its Greek translation, 1 ch. i. 54), and, according to Josephus (Ant., xi. 8, § 5), its prophecies were shown to Alexander. When we reach the time of the New Testament, it is distinctly quoted as Daniel's by our LORD Himself (Matt. xxiv. 15), and its miracles are alluded to in Heb. xi. 33. It has always been received both in the Jewish and the Christian Church.

Most of the objections made to it have already been considered. One other must be noticed. Porphyry († cir. 305 A.D.), in his zeal against Christianity, objected to this book that its prophecies were minute and exact to the close of the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, and beyond were vague and untrue; hence the book must have been written at that time. This objection has been taken up in modern days, and forms the whole gist of the argument against the book. On any fair interpretation of the four empires, and of the seventy weeks, this objection utterly falls to the ground, because these prophecies are sufficiently definite, reach far beyond the reign of Antiochus, and have been accurately fulfilled as far as the vision of the prophet has yet been unrolled in the course of time. It remains, however, that there is a certain degree of truth in the objection, in that, in chapter xi., the struggles of the kings of the north and the south are depicted with unusual minuteness through the reign of Antiochus, the great persecutor of the Church, and after that point become only very general. For this, however, there is an obvious and satisfactory reason. In the providence of God the voice of prophecy was to be hushed soon after the time of Daniel, and yet the Church under Antiochus was to be called to pass through a terrible ordeal. It was exceedingly important that it should be, as it was, sustained in that trial by these prophecies, and that object having been accomplished, there was no reason why the course of history should be traced further. No other great trial was in store for the Church until the time of the coming of its LORD.

REV. PROF. F. GARDINER, D.D.

David is the national hero of Israel. And by name and in character "beloved," the shepherd-king, the soldier who never lost a battle, the impartial judge, the statesman-king, the poet and prophet of God, the organizer of the worship of JEHOVAH in forms that are fresh after three thousand years of use; above all, the progenitor and type of CHRIST. His claim to pre-eminent honor is unquestioned.

His story reads like a romance, though it is very simply told. He was the youngest of eight sons of Jesse of Bethlehem. The family was of some local dignity, but not prominent in the tribe or nation. David's name, "beloved," reminds us of another "son of his father's old age" (Gen. xxxvii.), who was born in this same neighborhood, and who was envied and hated of his brethren, both on account of his father's love and "for his dreams and for his words." Perhaps the same reasons explain the humble position in which David is found at the beginning of the story, his father's hesitating answer to Samuel's inquiry (1 Sam. xvi. 11), and his elder brother's insulting language to him before the army. They are jealous, the old father is afraid of them, and he is too gentle and brave to put himself forward without "a cause." He is first brought into notice when Samuel, the prophet and judge, to their surprise and terror, appears in the little town and summons the people, and especially the family of Jesse, to the sacrifice. The youngest son is missing, and they wait for him. When he comes in, "ruddy and of a beautiful countenance, and goodly to look to," the prophet recognizes the object of his mission and anoints him before them all. We are not told that the prophet explained to them, or to David, the meaning of his act, though his former course with regard to Saul would lead us to infer that he made it known to David, and as much and more is implied in the story. But whatever he knew, he continues to sing his psalms with the sheep for listeners, and fight his battles with the lions and the bears, till his fame gets abroad, and he is sent for to play before the king when the attacks of his strange malady come upon him, and for a time he becomes the constant companion of Saul and greatly loved by him.

His next appearance in the narrative is in the fight with the Philistine. There is a difficulty in reconciling the narratives of 1 Sam. xvi. 23, and xvii. 58, which ought not to be passed over, but which need not be made too much of. The Septuagint unites xvii. 12-32, and xvii. 55-xviii. 6. No solution yet proposed is entirely satisfactory, and we must wait for more light for one that is. The general outline of the story would indicate that David returned for a time from the court to his shepherd-life, from which he was summoned by his father to go to the camp of Saul. The description of his personal appearance when the Philistine "disdained him" is the same as on the former occasion, but the narrative brings out more of his personal character, his whole-hearted trust in God, and his simple, contagious fearlessness. When he goes forth to the fight, neither Saul nor we have any more doubt what will be the result than he has himself.

He is without fear and yet he takes every precaution. When honors begin to be heaped upon him he is not dazzled by them. He becomes at once the delight and hope of the people and of the army. He is the close friend of Saul's son, and he is loved by Saul's daughter, and at first by Saul himself. But then to Saul's other malady is added the madness of jealousy as he saw in David the heir, and suspected in him the aspirant, to the kingdom. First by violence and then by treachery he tried to get rid of him, nor was his enmity lessened when he was obliged to keep his promise and receive David as his son-in-law. His conduct at length became so violent that David was driven from the court, and fled first to Samuel's protection in Ramah, and then to the court of the king of Gath, whence he only escaped by feigning madness. From the court of Achish (or Abimelech, Ps. xxxiv., title) he fled to the cave of Adullam, and here he began the life which continued till the death of Saul. First his own family came to him, and then others, discontented, in debt, outlaws, and fugitives from society, and he found himself at the head of a constantly increasing band of freebooters, whom, however, he kept in such strict control, that he was more than once betrayed by his neighbors. He was regarded generally by the inhabitants as a protector, and one to whom they gladly paid a kind of tribute. Saul pursued him, and drove him from place to place, until at length, after twice generously sparing the life of his foe, and finding Saul still implacable and false, David saw that there was no safety for him but in flight, and he passed on and took service with Achish, king of Gath, who gave him Ziklag for a residence. Here he remained for a year and four months, until the final battle and defeat on Mount Gilboa, when Saul and his sons were slain and the army of Israel routed and scattered.

The immediate consequence of that great disaster was to advance the Philistines into the very heart of the kingdom and practically to cut it in two. At the same time the force at David's disposal was so increased by the addition of portions of the defeated army that when he came at the call of the tribes to Hebron to be made king over the southern portion of the kingdom, he already had a strong army at his command. For seven years and a half he reigned at Hebron, while the feeble son of Saul maintained a rival throne at Mahanaim. But the desertion and treacherous murder of Abner, his only dependence, was followed by the murder of Ishbosheth, and David was anointed king "over all Israel and Judah."

Then began a reign of thirty-three years more, than which none is more glorious. One of David's first exploits was the capture of the Jebusite stronghold of Jerusalem, which he fortified and made the royal city. Thither, with great pomp, he brought up the Ark of the Lord, and made Jerusalem the centre of worship. Then he proceeded to strengthen and enlarge his kingdom. He formed alliances with the kings of Tyre and Hamath. He fought against the Philistines, Ammon, Noab, Edom, and the Syrians, and always with success. In his time and his son's the promise to Abraham was literally fulfilled,—"from the river of Egypt to the great river, the river Euphrates" (Gen. xv. 18). He reorganized the army; he personally administered the kingdom through a department of "judgment and justice;" while the reorganized army, the system of police, the records, and the finances were made separate departments, and appointed chiefs. Nor this alone. He reorganized the system of worship and gave to it his minutest attention, arranging the orders of Priests and Levites, arranging the choirs, and even inventing instruments of music for their use (Amos vi. 5). One great desire of his heart he was not permitted to accomplish, but only to see it afar off. The building of the Temple was reserved for his son, but David did what he could to make preparation for it, and for the project of the Temple and gathering of materials for its erection the honor is due to David.

But the glory of David's reign was tarnished by a great sin. The adultery with Bathsheba was followed by the foul murder of her brave husband, and the sin was visited upon him in consequences of death and shame that never departed from his house. The crime of Amnon's incest was followed by his murder at the hands of his brother Absalom, and Absalom's rebellion drove the old king from his home and throne only to be restored by Absalom's death. His last years were peaceful, and he saw Solomon securely seated on the throne, but the seeds of division were already planted in the kingdom. The other sin, which brought upon his people the visitation of a plague which destroyed seventy thousand, viz., the taking of a census of the people, is one of which we cannot appreciate the heinousness, partly perhaps because we know so little of the circumstances.

But the story of David's life to be appreciated must be read with the Psalms for a commentary. Of the one hundred and fifty psalms he is the author of about one-half, and the rest are built on his foundation. Many of David's Psalms were written for the worship of the sanctuary, of many others the occasions belong to his life, and they partake of his personal character and are full of allusions to his circumstances. The sheepfold (xxiii.), the battle (viii.), the victory (xviii.), the cave (xxxii.), the wilderness (lxiii.), the storm (xxix.), the siege (lx.), and above all his repentance (xxxii., li.), furnish occasion and give form to the words in which the Psalmist pours out his heart to GOD, and it is hardly possible to understand the Psalm without understanding something of his circumstances.

But, besides this personal element in the Psalms, there is another which is also personal, and yet which distinguishes them from other poems and confessions, and even from other hymns of praise. David's whole-hearted devotion singled him out as a man fitted for the work which he had to do, and there is a peculiar force in the repeated mention of the heart of GOD and of man in his story. He is the "man after GOD's own heart," and the LORD chose him who "looketh on the heart." His heart was for a time turned away and he fell into sin, but it was never hardened against GOD, and his prayer of repentance is a prayer for a "new and clean heart," the "offering of a broken and contrite heart" to GOD. The key to Abraham's character is his faith; to David's, his love. He loved GOD and GOD loved him, and men loved him, and his Psalms speak to the hearts of all men as his words "bowed the hearts of the men of Judah as the heart of one man."

But not even this deep truthfulness of love is sufficient to account for the fact that the Psalms of David have entered so largely into the worship and life of the Church. David was a prophet, and his words are inspired, but he was a prophet of a peculiar kind. In him prophecy took a new departure, and not only his words but his person and his kingdom were prophetic. More than any other man David was the type of CHRIST. The promise made to Eve in the Garden of Eden and repeated to Abraham, is made more definite still when GOD promised that "of the fruit of his loins He would raise up CHRIST to sit on his throne." Such a promise of GOD must be regarded as the key to David's life. It must be understood to be always present with him, even when its presence has the effect to deepen his penitence for his sin. Accordingly from this time forward the MESSIAS is foretold and expected as the son of David, and even as David (Jer. xxx. 9; Hosea iii. 5). When CHRIST came He was saluted as the son of David, and He came fulfilling in His person and in His Church the kingdom of David.

Here, then, we have the key to the peculiarly Christian character of the Psalms of David. In them the Psalmist speaks as the type of CHRIST and CHRIST speaks by him, and there is that wonderful blending and union of the personal and human element with the Divine which makes them so dear and so true to the disciples and members of the body of the GOD-man. And therefore it is that it has always been the mind of the Church to find CHRIST in them, not only in those which are called "MESSIANIC" (e.g., ii., ex.), and in the single verses which are quoted as such by sacred writers (e.g., xvi.-lxxxix., xl.), or by our LORD Himself (e.g., xxii.), but in all of them. Therefore, too, they are so perfectly adapted and so universally used in Christian worship. CHRIST speaks in them, and we Christians speak to Him by them. They tell us of the Throne and Kingdom of the CHRIST, the Anointed, of His law, His enemies, His righteous sceptre, His Divine Sonship, His exalted nature, His death and resurrection, His universal dominion, His everlasting reign. It is David who speaks, but it is not only David the man, the Psalmist, and the king, but David the prophet, David the type of Him who is "David's Son and David's LORD." And his words "are ours because we are CHRIST'S." REV. L. W. GIBSON.

Day. The word, simple and plain as it is, a cycle including a period of darkness and one of light, both together twenty-four hours long, has been the subject of much discussion in connection with the record in the first chapter of Genesis. The geologist, claiming that the term is figurative, as it has been used elsewhere, e.g., the Day of the LORD, the Day of vengeance, insists upon vast ages as included in each successive day. Whatever explanation may be given, or whatever duration may be assigned to the term, the controversy cannot affect the inspiration, and therefore absolute accuracy of the whole passage. The successions of creative work, as there recorded, are in exact accordance with what science has taught us, and the occasional discrepancies alleged are found to disappear as a closer investigation brings out the true facts. There is no clashing to suppose that the "Day" of the Mosaic record may have marked long ages of present time, and till some positive evidence, beyond the demands of theory, however certainly based upon actual facts, shall be found to decide the question, it is not necessary to treat it otherwise than as a postulate in geologic science. It cannot affect the truth or accuracy of the revealed story, for it may be that we interpret words by our ideas of what they ought to mean for us. The word is often used for an indefinite time. "Abraham saw my day and was glad." "In that day" is often in the prophets. This use of it is perfectly clear.

Deacon. A minister. So far as the record shows, this was the first office created by the Apostles. They themselves were appointed by the LORD. The account of the election and ordination (Acts vi. 1-6) of the seven Deacons is the model for all succeeding ordinations. It is conjectured that the seventy disciples whom the LORD had sent forth were before this recognized as officers, but it is mere conjecture, and we read of the young men who buried Ananias and Sapphira. But the Deacon had his special duties to do. It is said that of the seven at once two began to preach, but this is perfectly compatible with the duties of a Church officer. In fact, in the first proclamation of the Gospel every man had this laid upon him; but when theological accuracy was required, then trained men, of course, could alone be recognized; these were generally the prophets of the New Testament. (Vide PROPHESYING.) That the Deacon should, having the natural gift thereof, preach, and that as evangelist as St. Philip immediately after appears (Acts viii.; cf. xxi. 9), he should not only proclaim the Gospel, but also baptize. There is nothing incompatible in having the offices joined in one person. The office of Deacon is not clearly described in either the Acts or in St. Paul's first Epistle to Timothy. It is left very vague indeed. The later development of the office in the Church retained its primary office to look after the finances and details of the parish, but also joined to it the authority to baptize and to preach. To it was secluded, too, the authority to assist in the Holy Communion by the delivery of the cup. Thus they were the stewards and almoners of the Church, the ministers to the poor, sick, and imprisoned. They were specially attached to the personal attendance upon the Bishop, executing his orders and representing him to the people. They were called his hands, ears, mouth, and eyes. They kept the congregation in order, and waited upon the priest at the Holy Communion; in times of stress they could even reconcile a penitent. They were attached to the parish to which the Bishop assigned them. These very nearly correspond to the present position of the order. They cannot remove from a parish but by order of the Bishop. They can administer baptism only when no priest is at hand. They cannot absolve, or bless, or celebrate the Holy Communion. They can preach when thereto licensed by the Bishop. They are to minister to the poor, sick, and needy, to discover them and report their needs to the priest. The exigency of the times has made this office but the stepping-stone to the priesthood, and in the majority of cases has forced the Deacon into the execution of functions for which it was supposed he was imperfectly prepared. The Deacon is forbidden to absolve, bless, or celebrate the Communion, three acts which are within the capacity simply as official acts of any one fit for the Diaconate. This is proper, as not within the scope of that share in the stewardship committed to him. But ability to preach, and the requisite learning to qualify him for the priesthood, are demanded of him, and are exercised by him long before he usually is prepared for the "good degree." The necessities of the Church have forced ill-qualified Deacons to assume duties which ought to require long and patient training, while their office does not permit them to discharge those official priestly acts from which they are debarred by their lower rank, yet for want of which the parish committed to their charge is suffering,—an anomaly in the work which the pressing needs of the Church in her mission work can alone justify. The question is asked, Why are there not permanent Deacons? It is really a question of finance. If the salaries and income of the Diocese were poured into one common treasury, and administered by a financial officer, then Deacons could be maintained for work in their proper sphere; but, since comparatively few parishes can support more persons than the Rector, the office of a Deacon cannot be made more than a step preceding the priesthood. As it now stands, permanent Deacons are almost an impossibility.

Deaconess. A female ministrant in the Apostolic Church. St. Paul (Rom. xvi. 1) commends Phœbe, the servant (Deaconess) of the Church in Cenchrea to the Roman Christians. The older commentators on 1 Tim. iii. 11 (even so must [their] wives [Greek, women] be grave, not slanderers, sober, faithful in all things) held from the general connection of the passage that, whether these women were the wives of Deacons or not, they were admitted to the order of Deaconesses. Virgins who were formed into an order were also admitted, but so generally were widows, that the term to enter into the widowhood was often synonymous with being made a Deaconess. There are many references to them both in the Fathers and in the Canons from the time of Ignatius (107 A.D.) to the tenth century, though after the fifth century they began to decline in the West. In the East they lasted till at least after the Council in Trullo, 692 A.D. The office was appointed to aid in the Church's work under the existing customs of that age, when women could better minister in many ways to these sisters in the faith, in giving them instruction under circumstances when it would be either impossible or not proper for the Priest or Deacon to do so; to prepare them for the rite of baptism; to minister to the sick and needy; to venture into the prisons to the confessors and martyrs there, when it would be too dangerous for the Priest to go unnecessarily; to exercise some supervision over the order of virgins and widows not in this office. The setting apart with imposition of hands which they received was clearly understood to convey or to imply the gift of no sacerdotal functions. They could not baptize or discharge any part of the public worship which was the part of men to do. As long as the Church work demanded their aid they were useful, but under the changed conditions of a Christianized empire, and when afterwards so many of their active duties could be discharged by the then better controlled order of nuns, their office was dropped, and their work transferred to the rival order. (Vide Smith's Dict. of Chr. Ant., Wordsworth on Acts xviii. 18, and on 1 Tim. iii. 2, Bingham, ii. § xxii.)

The order has been revived and used to quite an extent in the Church in late years. Using the term in a wide sense, excluding from it the sisterhoods strictly living under rigid rule, but including some not strictly Diaconal, the outline history of the movement is somewhat thus: In 1845 A.D., Dr. Wm. L. Muhlenberg organized the Sisterhood of the Holy Communion, which was thus the first association of women in the Anglican Church. In 1855 A.D. the Bishop of Maryland instituted the order of Deaconesses in connection with St. Andrew's Parish in Baltimore. The General Convention of 1859 A.D. roused much interest in this work, which was checked at first by the civil war, but this ultimately afforded a practical training for future workers, and furnished a mass of very valuable experience. In 1864 A.D. a very able report, with a large mass of suggestive facts and useful hints, was presented to the Convention of the Diocese of Pennsylvania. Out of it grew the Bishop Potter Memorial House. In the same year Bishop Wilmer, of Alabama, instituted the order of Deaconesses in Mobile. In 1872 A.D. the Bishop of Long Island set apart seven "godly and well-tried women to the office of Deaconess." The order is also at work in Louisiana, and associate members of these Deaconesses are employed in other Dioceses. There are such orders now in five Dioceses in England. Space does not permit us to do more than give, in Dr. Howson's words, the general principles of the order: "(a) Definition of a Deaconess. A Deaconess is a woman set apart by a Bishop under that title for service in the Church. (b) Relation of a Deaconess to a Bishop. (1) No Deaconess or Deaconess institution shall officially accept or resign work in a Diocese without the express authority of the Bishop of that Diocese, which authority may at any time be withdrawn. (2) A Deaconess shall be at liberty to resign her commission as Deaconess, or may be deprived of it by the Bishop of the Diocese in which she is working. (c) Relation of a Deaconess to an incumbent. No Deaconess shall officially accept work (except it be in some non-parochial position, as in a hospital or the like) without the express authority of the incumbent of that parish, which authority may at any time be withdrawn. (d) Relation of a Deaconess to a Deaconess institution. In all matters not connected with the parochial or other system under which she is summoned to work, a Deaconess may, if belonging to a Deaconess institution, act in harmony with the general rules of such institution." And six English Bishops signed these suggested rules. "(a) Probation. It is essential that none be admitted as a Deaconess without careful previous preparation, both technical and religious. (b) Dress. A Deaconess should wear a dress which is at once simple and distinctive. (c) Religious knowledge. It is essential to the efficiency of a Deaconess that she should maintain her habit of prayer and meditation, and aim at continual progress in religious knowledge. (d) Designation and signature. It is desirable that a Deaconess should not drop the use of her surname, and with this end in view it is suggested that her official designation should be 'Deaconess A. B.' (Christian and surname), and her official signature should be 'A. B., Deaconess.' P.S.—It is desirable that each Deaconess institution have a body of associates attached to it, for the purpose of general counsel and co-operation." This paper, taken from the "Report on Woman's Work," read before the Board of Missions in 1871 A.D., contains many suggestions which are well worth careful study. As we have seen, the order has been tentatively employed in the Church with excellent results. But its relation to the Church has not yet been fairly defined. It is of course fully within the Bishop's power to institute it and to have it as a recognized association in his Diocese, but an effort has been made to obtain for it a wider recognition. In 1880 A.D. a committee reported to the General Convention a Canon, which was laid aside, and a Canon presented by the Bishop of Massachusetts was accepted by a large vote in the House of Bishops; but, owing to the late date of the session when it was sent to the Lower House, there was no time to consider it, and the subject, owing to the press of other business, was not considered at the Convention of 1883 A.D. But this proposed Canon may be given as the deliberate opinion of a majority of the Bishops: "Resolved, The House of Deputies concurring, that the following Canon be enacted, to be entitled Canon vi. of Title III., 'Of Organized Religious Societies within the Church.'"

§ I. All organized Religious Bodies in this Church, of which the avowed object is the increase of holy living and of good works, and of which the members are in any manner set apart and specially devoted to such service of God in His Church, as orderly co-operation with CHRIST's ministers, the edifying of His Body, the Christian education of youth, and the promotion of works of mercy and charity, are hereby declared to owe allegiance to the doctrine and ritual of the Protestant Episcopal Church, whose professed representatives and agents they become; and also due recognition of, and obedience to, its constituted authorities. And without such allegiance and obedient recognition such organized bodies may not claim the sanction of this Church.

§ II. (1) Women of devout character and approved fitness may be set apart by any Bishop of this Church for the work of a Deaconess, according to such form as may be authorized by the House of Bishops, or, in default thereof, by such form as may be set forth by the Bishop of the Diocese.

(2) The duties of a Deaconess are declared to be the care of Our LORD's poor and sick, the education of the young, the religious instruction of the neglected, the reclaiming of the fallen, and other works of Christian charity.

(3) No woman shall be set apart for the work of a Deaconess until she be twenty-five (25) years of age, unless the Bishop, for special reasons, shall determine otherwise, but in no case shall the age be less than twenty-one (21) years. The Bishop shall also satisfy himself that the candidate has had an adequate preparation for work, both technical and religious, which preparation shall have covered the period of at least one (1) year.

(4) No Deaconess shall work officially in a Diocese without the express authority in writing of the Bishop of the Diocese, nor in any parish without the permission of the Rector or Minister thereof.

(5) Deaconesses may be transferred from one Diocese to another by proper letters dimissory, at the request of the Bishop to whose jurisdiction they are to be so transferred.

(6) If a Deaconess should at any time resign her office, she shall not be restored thereto unless in the judgment of the Bishop such resignation was for weighty cause. And no Deaconess shall be removed from office by the Bishop except with the consent of two-thirds of the members of the Standing Committee of the Diocese duly convened.

(7) The Constitution and Rules for the government of any institution for the training of Deaconesses, or of any community in which such Deaconesses are associated, must have the sanction in writing of the Bishop of the Diocese in which such institution or community exists. All formularies of common worship used in such institution or community must have the like sanction, and shall be in harmony with the usage of this Church, and like the principles of the Book of Common Prayer.

§ III. (1) Devout women desirous of living in community, under rule, with sanction of the ecclesiastical authority, for the increase of self-consecration to God, and the better performance of the works of faith enjoined in the Gospel, may be formed into Societies with the consent of the Bishop; and such Societies, under the conditions named below, shall be recognized as Sisterhoods in this Church.

(2) The Constitutions and Rules of such Societies, prescribing their organic structure, the qualifications for entrance, the regulations for the common life, and the scope and methods of their work, must have the written approval of the Bishop then exercising jurisdiction in the Diocese; and the said Constitution and Rules, so far as thus approved, shall be unalterable by the same Bishop or by the Sisterhood within his Diocese, except by their joint act and agreement.

(3) The form and order for entrance into such Sisterhood shall be drawn up and prescribed by the Bishop of the Diocese, unless otherwise provided for by the House of Bishops.

(4) The Bishop shall have Episcopal supervision and canonical authority over Sisterhoods within his jurisdiction, and may act as Visitor thereof.

(5) Every such Sisterhood may have its Chaplain or Pastor, who shall be nominated by the Society within the Diocese, and approved by the Bishop; and who shall be a clergyman in Priest's Orders, canonically subject to the Bishop.

(6) In matters concerning only the Christian walk and conversation of the Sisters as individuals,—their personal concerns and private devotional life,—Sisters are free to govern themselves in the sight of God, so that all be done in the spirit and methods commended by this Church. But the formularies of common worship in a Sisterhood, and all devotional practices in such worship (other than as usual in this Church), and the books of devotion or religious instruction used in ministering to others, shall be subject to the examination and approval of the Bishop, and shall be in harmony with the usage of this Church and principles of the Book of Common Prayer.

(7) No Sisterhood shall send any of its members to another Diocese to work there except on the request of the Bishop of that Diocese, and with the consent of its own Bishop; nor shall any member of a Sisterhood work officially among the people of any parish of this Church without the consent of the Rector or Minister thereof.

Dean. The title of an ancient office in the Western Church, but only recently becoming current here, though the bearer of the title here is not properly a Dean. (Vide CONVOCATION.) The Canon Law recognizes four officials having a right to the title. The Dean, who has a Chapter of Prebendaries or Canons subordinate to the Bishop, as a council assistant to him in matters of religion and in matters temporal relating to his Bishopric. (Burn's Eccl. Law, vol. ii., sub voce Dean; vide also the article CATHEDRAL.) The second is held by a single person, the Dean of Battel, the abbey William the Norman founded to commemorate the battle of Hastings (1066 A.D.). It is presentative, has cure of souls, but has no Chapter. The third has attached no cure of souls, is a donative, and, having jurisdiction therefore, holds a court, and has a peculiar,—i.e., is amenable only to royal or Archiepiscopal—visitation, as the Dean of Arches in London is exempt from the Bishop of London's jurisdiction, but under the Archbishop of Canterbury. The fourth office is that of the Rural Dean. Probably this last order really has a right to the title (vide RURAL DEAN), for "the spiritual governors, the Bishops, divided each diocese into deanries (decenaries, or tithings), each of which was the district of ten parishes or churches; and over every such district they appointed a dean, which in cities or large towns was called the dean of the city or town, and in the country had the appellation of rural dean." (Burn's Eccl. Law.) This principle of governing by tens passed into the monastic rule, and so was transferred to the colleges and universities. (Vide Coke on Lit., lib. ii. c. 134 and note.)

Death. The act of the separation of the soul from the body; the death of the soul; eternal death. It is the inevitable doom of all before the moment of the blast of the Trumpet. These shall have some change pass upon them, but all others shall first pass under the law. Death is the contrast to life. But two men in all human history have been exempted, Enoch and Elijah. It has always had a terror for the human mind; the unknown hereafter, the agony itself, the separation from all things we love, make it a dreadful act to many who are yet strengthened by the Christian's faith. The Scriptures represent and record these fears most faithfully, and give as the reason—Sin.

There are three kinds of death: the death of the body, which we can see; the death of the soul,—spiritual death; and the second, or eternal death. The death of the body as the result of sin is a merciful provision of the CREATOR, by which the consequences of sin might be checked, to those who place themselves within the Law of Grace and Life in CHRIST. Spiritual death, the death of the soul, does take place here by a voluntary self-deprivation of all the means of grace, by impenitence, and by the sin against the HOLY GHOST; in fine, by persistence in that state of trespasses and sins into which we are born by nature. Eternal death, the second death, the privation of blessedness in God's presence, the outer darkness of our LORD'S Parable. Death is to be destroyed as it has been already conquered by CHRIST (1 Cor. xv. 26; Heb. ii. 14; Col. ii. 15), as indeed its power must cease when there are no more victims. He has taken away the true fear of death that lies in sin, yet He shrunk naturally as perfect man from the act of death, for it should have no power over Him except as He willed or submitted voluntarily to it.

Death of Christ. It was a real, true, not a phantasmic death. His soul left His body and went into the prison of departed spirits, but His divine nature, being incomprehensible, did not leave either soul or body. It was voluntary, 1st, because He foretold that it should be so, and upon the cross. He bowed his head and said, It is finished; 2d, because it was in a certain degree miraculous. He hung upon the cross alive but six hours, whereas the victim usually lingers three days; and His death He, as it were, announced by the loud cry, by His commendatory prayer, by bowing His head. It was a very and true death, and for us, that He might taste death for every man, that in soul and body He might know all that we undergo, even after death. Therefore it is most useful that His death as well as His passion, and His burial, are placed in the Creed as parts of our Christian Confession.

Decalogue. The ten words (the Hebrew title, also Ex. xxxiv. 28), title of the Ten Commandments; the covenant which was given to Moses on Mount Sinai by GOD Himself. The history of GOD'S giving it to Moses and the form and contents are given in Exod. xx. It is repeated in Deut. v. There is but a single discrepancy between the two records. The fourth commandment is based in Exodus upon GOD'S rest after creation; in Deuteronomy it is based upon the deliverance from Egypt. There is no discrepancy in reality, since Moses is reciting them with a different purpose in Deuteronomy. Also, it may be noted that in the last commandment the clauses, Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's house; thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's wife, are reversed in order in Deuteronomy, and also "his field" is inserted after house. The authoritative form is in Exodus. The division of the commandments into ten has been the subject of some controversy. The Church of England follows the division to which Philo (80 A.D.) gave currency; in this the Calvinistic bodies follow her, but the Lutherans do not. The Romanist joins the first and second commandments into one, and divides the last into two. If the covenant as given in Exodus is the authoritative form, and the one in Deuteronomy is only a repetition of it, then the division which the English Church uses is the most natural, and, for several reasons, the only one possible. The so-called preface is an independent command: "I am the LORD thy GOD. . . Thou shalt have none other gods but me." A basis for the other commandments from which they flow naturally. In the second, on idolatry, the forbidding of the making of images is followed by prohibiting the worship of them, with a statement of the grounds for this prohibition. As for the last, the inversion of the clauses as noticed above shows that it is but one command. In fact, all other divisions do more or less violence to the sequence of the commandments.

There is some doubt as to how these were arranged upon the two Tables. Again, the grouping which we usually follow commends itself to us, since St. Paul throws the fifth commandment into the second division, though its contents make it a link binding the two groups together. The first four clearly relate to our duties to GOD. The fifth one, by the light thrown upon it by the Proverbs, where "father" and "mother" stand for GOD and the Church, makes a natural transition. Then, too, the family relation lying at the base of the Hebrew polity, it should properly make the first of the second sphere of duties,—to our neighbor. It is not the place here to go into it at any length, but the true foundation for all obedience was LOVE (Deut. vii. 9; Rom. xiii. 8 sq.). But the clear apprehension of this was denied by resting upon the other saying, "And it shall be our righteousness if we observe to do all these commandments before the LORD our GOD, as He hath commanded us."

But the covenant enacted for the Israelite extends to all as well, because its root is in the truest aspirations of our nature, and because practically our LORD, by commenting upon it in His sermon on the mount, made it binding upon us, as by the assumption both by St. Paul and by St. James that it is always in force. Therefore in its precise terms it is the covenant by which we are bound at our baptism, interpreted, it is true, by the love which our LORD threw over it. Its recital each Sunday in the service is therefore strictly in the line of instruction which the Church has followed,—the Creed, the LORD's Prayer, the Ten Commandments put before us constantly, for they are our part of the baptismal covenant.

In reciting the Law at the point of the service where it is ordered, the English Church has added to the old Liturgical usage. There is no precedent for it in any of the ancient services which have come down to us. It is not the less a most excellent addition to the service, and forms an outline for instruction, that self-examination which is urged upon us in the exhortations to the Communion office.

At the close of each commandment as it is proclaimed to us (for that is the true office of the minister at that moment), there is placed the familiar response, "LORD have mercy upon us and incline our hearts to keep this law;" (and after the last one) "LORD have mercy upon us and write all Thy laws in our hearts, we beseech Thee." The first words are the ancient Kyrie eleison,—which is not so freely used in the English as in the Oriental services,—and a petition fitted for the commandments appended to it. The whole of this part of the ante-communion is a noble addition to the Liturgic services which the English Church has inherited.

Decree. Holy Scripture speaks of God's purposes or decrees as being eternal, and clearly intimates that events are not fortuitous and accidental, but are known and fore-ordained by infinite wisdom. But this does not interfere with our perfect freedom to choose our line of action. The controversy is with those who hold to a strict predestination theory,—for, in our ignorance of His essential nature, theory only it must be, since as Bishop Butler acutely remarks, that though necessity may logically be, yet in practice we must act as though it did not exist. This controversy has been popularly overlaid with questions and side issues which do not belong to it, and there results a confusion as to the proper limits of true freedom. Putting aside for a moment our inability to conceive of GOD beyond what He has chosen to reveal to us, we may say that the leading consequences of any act—not the primal act itself—are unavoidable and irrevocable by us; that the general laws of nature and the limitations of our powers by the conditions of our creation and nature, bear also consequences which we cannot escape. Then the inferences and mutual oppositions which form separate and independent lines of action also must be thrown out. All of these belong to GOD's foreknowledge;

as, too, the secret springs of our character, the logical outcome of influences of which we may be unconscious, the heredity of certain tendencies, the limitation of education, which again depends upon the circumstances and conditions of a past not in our hands, and the proper sequences of those interposing acts, whether of mercy or of justice, which He in His infinite wisdom has seen fit to place at conjunctures in the history of our race. All these, too, are foreknown and must enter into His decrees, yet must be thrown out by us when discussing, what is really the gist of the whole controversy, the decree of election or rejection of each separate individual soul; we can only narrow down, not solve, the mystery. In throwing out these things above enumerated, we are only eliminating facts which, however complex they may seem to us, follow out the law of cause and effect. We do not thereby mean to overlook GOD's presence in them, or His use of them. Their complexity is our puzzle, not His whose knowledge is infinite, and they do not properly fall within the popular conception of His will towards each separate soul of His creation. But it is clear that while we have left ample room for the play of our limited wills, we have taken out of the question much that has confused it. Now at this point GOD's mercy is declared. He hath no pleasure in the death of a sinner. He willeth that all men shall be saved. He willeth that all men shall come to a knowledge of the truth, yet by the law of second causes and of consequences our minds are dulled, our perceptions and capacities are stunted. However secret and immutable His decrees are, they are founded upon His attributes, in His own perfect nature, and are involved in His foreknowledge and purposes to man in CHRIST JESUS. Yet they amply allow for the responsible use, through our will, of the faculties, capacities, and opportunities GOD has given to us in this our lifetime. The reconciliation of the two statements in Holy Scripture constitutes the mystery unfathomable to us in the present state of our powers. That it is reconciled must be believed, since truth is a fundamental concept of GOD.

Decretals. (I.) The False Decretals. The title of a compilation of Canons and Epistles from various sources, the larger part of which are wholly fictitious. The Papal Epistles, beginning with Siricius, are nearly all genuine; those preceding Siricius are forged. The Canons of the Provincial and Ecumenical Councils, as generally received, are genuine, but there are a large number of fictitious Synods included. The whole mass of both forged and authentic documents was put forth under the name of Isidore, Archbishop of Seville, but was put together probably near Rheims about the year 843-847 A.D. It was intended to meet the troubles and confusions in the Empire at that date. These troubles arose from the ambition of the Prelates, the covetousness of the nobles, and the general ignorance which lay over the mass of the people, many of whom had been but in comparatively recent times brought into the Church. Charlemagne's strong hand repressed these troubles, but his son Louis the Pious was unequal to the task he inherited. The forger thought that by an appeal to a distant power, which yet should have a spiritual authority, he could obtain the solution of the problem. So he made an appeal to Rome the final decision of all quarrels, and introduced the Papacy as the ultimate authority on Church law. This fatal basis brought in the doctrine of the Roman supremacy, hitherto disallowed and often disavowed by the Western Churches. But as his collection was admitted to have the highest authority its teachings were accepted, and so upon a forgery and a falsehood was founded the extension of those arrogant papal pretensions which led to the schism between the Eastern and Western Churches,—those superstitions and malpractices of the Middle Ages which brought on the Reformation and the innumerable sects, schisms, and heresies which have plagued the Church since. The authorship of the book is unknown, but it is probably the work of the same person who had already issued two collections of Capitularies, and was a partisan of the able Ebo of Rheims, whose troubles and deposition may have suggested the redresses, and the authority necessary to enforce them, which are taught in the False Decretals.

(II.) Decretals of the Popes, collected first by Raymond of Peñafort, under Gregory IX., and afterwards enlarged by the addition of successive books,—Decretales Epistolæ, Gregory IX., Liber Sextus, Clementine, Extravagantes Joanni, Extravagantes Communes, Liber Septimus. Together with the Decretum of Gratian (which had been formed out of the labors and collections of previous Canonists since the time of the False Decretals), the whole collection forms the Corpus Juris Canonum of the Roman Church.

Dedication. Nearly equivalent to consecration in popular use. But there is a deep distinction. To dedicate is to set apart, as given to GOD. Tithes and offerings are dedicated. Samuel was dedicated to the LORD. To consecrate is to solemnly set apart, with an implied curse against sacrilege, a person, house, or thing to sacred and hallowed uses. Often a thing dedicated is perishable, a thing consecrated is permanent.

Degradation. Deprivation of an office. Really, to deprive of a step or degree of rank or honor. The Bishop, Priest, or Deacon is degraded for cause,—i.e., his degree of office in the Church is taken from him. It varied in the proportion of the offense, as from temporary suspension to total deprivation. For the inferior orders the Bishop was the proper judge and executive officer. But finally the Synod of the Province became the proper tribunal. The crimes for which a clergyman could be deposed were (besides immorality, such as would exclude a layman) offenses against discipline, against doctrine, against the Church and its Ritual. The form used doubtless varied, but was accompanied with some significant rites, as depriving the offender of his robes, the vessels used in his office, and ending by scraping his thumb and hand, which had been anointed at his ordination. The act of the Church at this day is very simple. The causes for degradation (deprivation and displacing are its synonyms) are those recited above, and renunciation of the ministry. His deposition is an entire rejection from all office, not from a higher to a lower. Sentence is pronounced whether the offender be present or not, at some service appointed by the Bishop, and due notice must be given to every minister and vestry in the Diocese, and to all the Bishops and to the Standing Committee of any vacant Diocese; the notice specifying under what Canon the said minister has been deposed. The Canons on deposition, Tit. ii., Can. ii., § 2, Can. v., § 1, Can. vi., § 2, Can. viii., Can. x., § 2, Can. xi., § 2.

Degrees. (I.) Steps. "The Song of Degrees," the title to Ps. cxx.—cxxxiv. Either hymns sung by the Pilgrims to the Passover at Jerusalem, on their journey thither, or they may have been chanted upon the fifteen steps leading from the women's to the men's court in the Temple. The first explanation of the title is the most likely.

(II.) Steps of kinship. The law of nature forbids marriage within certain degrees. The law of morality, civil regard for social good, and the Church's regard for both, forbid still more remote degrees.

The Canon of the American Church is indefinite, simply forbidding that marriage which the law of GOD disallows. This may be made wider or narrower without further definition. For, e.g., there is no law forbidding the marriage of a deceased wife's sister, yet it is prohibited by the construction of the English Canon law upon the Mosaic table of forbidden marriages (Lev. xviii.), and a bill to repeal it was recently defeated in the English House of Lords. The English Law of Prohibited Degrees is founded upon two rules of interpretation: (a) The term degree ascends as well as descends, and so all marriage in an ascending line, as well as in a descending line, must be prohibited; what is held of father or mother is true of grandfather or grandmother. (b) What degree is forbidden to the one sex is forbidden to the other also by parity of reason. If a woman is forbidden to marry her husband's brother, then the man is forbidden to marry his wife's sister, the degree of relationship being the same in both cases. Upon these two rules the English Law of Marriage and Prohibited Degrees is framed. (Vide MATRIMONY, where the table of prohibited degrees is placed.)

Deification. This bold term, founded on 2 Peter i. 4, has been used by the Fathers occasionally to express the ultimate perfect union with CHRIST. CHRIST became man that we might be deified (St. Athan. or. De Incar., liv.). It is certainly implied in the common saying, The Son of GOD became the Son of Man that the sons of men might become the Sons of GOD.

Deipara. She who bore GOD, i.e., the Virgin Mary, who was the mother of Him who is Eternal GOD, even the God-man JESUS CHRIST our LORD.

Deism is a term sometimes used to include all belief in a Divine Being, but this use of the word is incorrect. Deism is best defined by negatives, and strictly designates a form not of belief, but of unbelief. A Deist is one who, beginning from the position of Christian faith, has cast off everything that is peculiar to that faith, and holds only the belief in one GOD. He holds less than the faith of Israel even, who had the promise and miracles, and a history and sacrifices, and the Scriptures, and symbolizes with Mohammedanism, with which it also agrees historically, inasmuch as it was also in its origin a heresy and departure from Christianity.

At the same time it must be remembered that the Deists of the eighteenth century were never organized into a sect, had no creed or form of worship, recognized no leader, and were constantly shifting their ground, and even denying that they were anything but Christians. So that it is impossible to include them strictly under any definition. That which has been given is as near a definition as possible. Deism is what is left of Christianity after casting off everything that is peculiar to it. The Deist is one who denies the Divinity, the Incarnation, and the Atonement of CHRIST, and the work of the HOLY GHOST; who denies the GOD of Israel, and believes in the GOD of nature.

In dealing with the Christian religion the Deist, therefore, in the first place, puts aside as idle sentiment all that influence of the HOLY SPIRIT upon and within men which is expressed in the Scriptures by the terms "the new birth," "conversion," "the fruits of the Spirit," the "witness of the Spirit," and the like. Pentecost and all that it represents and commences is "unhistorical." Then next the Divinity and worship of our LORD is questioned and set aside for the time, if not absolutely, and he strikes off at once, professedly as a seeker after truth, but really in the spirit of an enemy, what he reckons as the "evidences of Christianity,"—miracles, prophecy, morality. It is easy to see how unfair such a course is, and how far from friendly or honest inquiry is such criticism, and also at what a disadvantage we put ourselves when we consent to such an arrangement of forces.

We are really putting the main body of our forces into camp, and leaving the fortress and the leader to accept battle in the rear-guard and among the baggage. For the miracles are not mere wonder-works, and the prophecies are not mere foretellings and extraordinary guesses, and the morality of the Old Testament or the wisdom of the New are not abstractions. But all have their key and source in CHRIST our LORD, without whom they are what sunlight would be without the sun. They all spring from Him, and are to be understood by Him and by faith in Him. They are evidences indeed, but they are the necessary and natural results of His presence; proofs certainly, but better seen as consequences. When unbelief makes its attack upon them, therefore, it must be fought off, and the battle with Deism in the eighteenth century ended in its confessed defeat. But the ground was not fairly chosen. The victory on the field of reason was won, but it was won as by soldiers who, at their enemy's challenge, laid aside the shield of faith and the sword of the Spirit.

The unbelief which sprang into life in England in the seventeenth century, and flourished and decayed in the first half of the eighteenth century, had its opportunity in the religious wars, the divisions of Christendom, and the weak divorce of culture from religion, which was one of the prevailing faults of Protestantism, while, on the other hand, the age was one of great intellectual activity and strongly disposed to free inquiry, and a time of great advance in natural science. In England all these causes were strongly at work, and the Church had need of all her strength to stem and direct the current into proper channels. But instead of being at her strongest, first the contest with Rome during and after the Reformation of the sixteenth century, and then the long and bloody struggle with Puritanism in the seventeenth, left the Church weakened, and prepared for almost any sentiment which gave promise of peace. The bondage of the Puritans prepared for the rebound of wild license under Charles. A bitter spirit of controversy had been developed and was not laid. The people were determined upon one thing,—that the Church as established should not be disturbed. But from the time when English Church and English State alike were able to find no way of escape from their perplexities save by calling in William of Orange, an alien to both, and in his own eyes the conqueror of both, spiritual religion in England seemed to have fallen into a condition of decay. The people hated popery, and they hated whatever threatened to disturb Church or State, but religious life was at a low ebb, and unless men looked deeply enough into the matter to see in the Church something better than politicians and Erastian divines did see, the tendency of earnest thought was away from her rather than towards her. And out of these seething elements, and in no small part the result of them, arose the Deism of the eighteenth century.

The real Deists, that is, the writers who are known by the name, are only some twelve or fifteen in number, and there is hardly one of them who as a writer deserves a high place. But they were important for their representative character, as they evidently expressed the sentiments of a larger class, and said what many were only thinking, and as they represented a dangerous tendency of the age. And also for their effect upon the Church, in rousing Churchmen to a sense of the danger, and in bringing to the front a host of writers in defense of religion, chief among them Bishop Butler; and also for the effect of their writings in other countries, for from England went the teaching which through Voltaire went over into France, and from France into Germany, and developed into French atheism and German rationalism.

The first writer who can be reckoned as a Deist was one who made his attack upon Christianity long before the name of Deist had its special application,—Lord Herbert, of Cherbury (1581-1648 A.D.), the brother of the Christian poet and divine George Herbert. His argument was (1) that Christianity was not needed, natural religion was sufficient, and (2) that it could not be proved. But he included under natural religion a large part of Christianity,—the being of God, and His worship, morality, repentance, and future rewards and punishments. And he relates of himself that when he was in doubt whether to publish his work, he prayed for a sign from heaven, and suddenly it thundered. Hobbes (1581-1679 A.D.), the secretary of Lord Bacon, and the friend of Ben Jonson and Lord Herbert, was a materialist. His principal work is the "Leviathan," and the principles of his system selfishness and despotism. But in his earlier writings his ground was very much the same as that of the later Deists.

The first whose writings made any great noise in the world as a distinct attack upon Christianity was John Toland (1696-1722 A.D.), a convert from the Roman Catholic Church to dissent, whose first book was called "Christianity not Mysterious." He was in fact a pantheist, and went on from his first pretended defense of Christianity against its corrupters to open scorn of all religion and denial of a personal God. After him Collins (1713 A.D.) led in the attack upon prophecy in his "Discourse on Free-thinking," which called out among others a crushing reply from Bentley, as Toland had brought out Stillingfleet. It is, by the way, a curious illustration of the result of controversy and of the inconsistent course of unbelief, that in his rejection of Daniel and his prophecies Collins takes the ground of denying all Messianic expectation, while later unbelief, e.g., Strauss, not only concedes such expectation, but makes our LORD to have taken constant advantage of it, and to have adapted His conduct to its demands. Woolston (1667-1703 A.D.) represents the assaults upon miracles, attacking them as incredible and absurd. He is distinguished by being probably the only man of all the infidel writers of England who ever suffered for his opinions at the hands of law. His blasphemies were such as to shock and scandalize all decent Christian people, and if ever blasphemy deserved punishment, his is such a case, though he better deserved a lunatic asylum than a prison. His story curiously illustrates one point of his and other infidel attacks in the conflict of evidence with regard to the place of his death; some witnesses certifying that he died in prison, others speaking of him as dying "in his own house." The two conflicting testimonies are reconciled by the fact that he purchased "the liberty of the King's Bench," and lived and died in his own hired house within the precincts of the prison. In Tindal (1656-1733 A.D.) Deism reached its climax. His book, "Christianity as Old as the Creation," in which his ground is that if Christianity has any truth in it as old as creation, if it adds to that old original truth it is an impostor and an upstart, brought out some one hundred and fifty answers, among them Conybeare, Leland, Foster, and, above all, Butler. Conybeare shows that Tindal confounded the Light of nature with the Law of nature, which men learn gradually and require aids to learn, and therefore the ground of a perfect knowledge is taken away. Butler met him with an argument of which J. S. Mill says, "from its own point of view it is conclusive. The Christian religion is open to no objections which do not apply at least equally to the common theory of Deism."

Chubb (1715-1747 A.D.) differs from other Deistic writers in making his attacks upon the New Testament, the Church, and the clergy from the ground of a working-man. At first he allowed revelation and a future judgment and held a high Unitarian view of the divinity of CHRIST; but he developed into denial of miracles, and even doubts about the sinlessness of our LORD and the wisdom of His teaching. Lord Shaftesbury (1713 A.D.) was regarded by his contemporaries as among the bitter enemies of Christianity, but he so veils his rancor under a pretense of playful irony that some have even claimed him as the friend of religion. Thomas Morgan (1743 A.D.) is noticeable for his attack upon the Old Testament, and his denial that JESUS ever accepted the part of MESSIAS in any sense. Morgan's sympathies are all with Solomon in his "tolerant old age," and with Jezebel as against the zealots of the law, while for Moses and the prophets and the Jews as a people he has nothing but scorn and contempt. His book ("The Moral Philosopher") appeared about the same time as Warburton's "Divine Legation of Moses." Dodwell, in his "Christianity not founded on Argument" (1742 A.D.), professes to speak as a Christian, and as such to cast aside reason and to depend on an irresistible light for his convictions; but he really casts scorn on all belief in the operation of the Spirit of God in the soul of man, and denies His operation in enlightening reason, and adding evidence which is above reason, but not against reason.

Dodwell therefore represents rather the skepticism which was the position of Bolingbroke (1678-1751 A.D.) and Hume (1700-1776 A.D.) and Gibbon (1737-1794 A.D.). Other writers are claimed on the same side, as, for example, Alexander Pope, whose sympathies were evidently with those who held Deistic views. But those which have been named were the principal ones, and with them and the replies to them the Deistic controversy in England came to an end, leaving the victory confessedly on the side of Christian faith. Of the Deistic writers there is no one who has deserved to be reckoned among England's great writers. Deism failed in England because it wanted enthusiasm, and because it had neither creed, polity, worship, nor accepted leaders; but also for another reason,—because it had opposed to it a Church which had all these, and which only needed rousing from its slumbers to make good use of them. Deism in England was never popular, and it never showed any constructive strength nor any ability to adapt the materials which it found at hand.

In France, on the other hand, when Voltaire went back from his residence in England and his friendship with Bolingbroke and opened the campaign of Deism, he found religion weakened not only by superstition and secret unbelief and open immorality, but bound by state despotism and darkened by ignorance of the Scriptures. The French infidels were brilliant and popular writers besides, and Voltaire was a practical reformer. He represents Deism and then skepticism, and later, in spite of his dying declarations, perhaps atheism. Rousseau comes nearer the position of Arianism or high Unitarianism. Helvetius, La Mettrie, Diderot, D'Holbach, were atheists; and against none of them did the Gallican Church or French Protestantism lift up a voice in reply. French unbelief had the field of literature all to itself.

Deism was introduced from England into Germany, and was fostered, and in its French form perhaps introduced, by Voltaire; and here the movement arose not out of grievances, but out of want of faith, was carried on within the Christian body, and resulted in a compromise that was, in fact, the victory of unbelief. It even took a definite name and called itself Naturalism, or Neology, or Rationalism, and, like New England Unitarianism, claimed to be a form of Christian doctrine. Unbelief in Germany is more learned, less irreverent, and develops towards pantheism and atheism less rapidly than elsewhere. Its spread among the people is more critical, more concerned with morals, and therefore less logical than French or even English unbelief.

The unbelief of the nineteenth century has in it very little of the Deistic form. It is more determined to get rid of the supernatural, and leave no room for faith of any kind, and so is more openly atheistic or pantheistic. This is equally the result of scientific research on one side and the distinct advance of the Church on the other, especially in England. And at the same time unbelief in the nineteenth century has been compelled to change its ground with regard to the Church, and compelled to find an explanation for the manifest facts of Christianity, which it tries to do on natural principles. Of this form of unbelief Strauss is the best exponent in Germany, Renan in France, Mill in England.

REV. L. W. GIBSON.

Delaware. The first services in this Diocese were held by Swedes (vide PENNSYLVANIA) in a church within Fort Christina (Wilmington) 1638 A.D., nearly fifty years before the founding of Philadelphia. The first missionary was Rev. Rocus Torkillus. In 1667 A.D. Crane Hook Church was built, a mile and a half from the fort. In 1697 A.D., Rev. Ericus Biorck writes: "Their unworthy minister, clad in my surplice, delivered my first discourse to them in Jesus' name." In 1699 A.D., Trinity Church (Old Swedes') was consecrated. It is still used for service. There was intercommunion between the English and Swedish Churches, the English clergy being missionaries of the Propagation Society. Trinity Church owned five hundred acres where Wilmington stands, but the property was given out in interminable leases. In 1749 A.D., Rev. Israel Acrelius, who wrote a history of the Swedish congregations in America, was rector of Trinity Church. After the Revolution, in 1791 A.D., Provost Girelius, then in charge of Trinity Church, returned to Sweden. The Swedish Archbishop, Uno von Toerl, writes affectionately to the Swedish congregations in America concerning their separation from the mother-country, which was now to take place. He expresses the good wishes of the king, and adds his own prayer for God's blessing on "the members of the congregations, and that the Gospel light, which, under Divine Providence, was first kindled in these parts by the tender affection of Swedish kings and the zealous endeavors of Swedish teachers, may there, while days are numbered, shine in perfect brightness, and bring forth fruit to everlasting life." With such loving messages closed the work of the Swedish Church, and the parish naturally fell into the care of the Episcopal Church. A debt of gratitude is due to Sweden for these early foundations, built by laborious and self-denying missionaries in this foreign country. In 1792 A.D., Rev. Jos. Clarkson was elected rector of Trinity Church. To go back to the missions of the English Church in Delaware: In 1703 A.D., Gov. Nicholson, of Virginia, who had built churches in several colonies, was building a church in New Castle (Immanuel). In 1704 A.D., Rev. Thos. Crawford was sent to Dover by the Propagation Society. "The glebe lands were presented by Col. Jno. French of New Castle, a devout member of the Church." In 1705 A.D. Rev. Geo. Ross was missionary at New Castle. This year St. Ann's, Appoquinimink, or Middletown, was built. In 1708 A.D. the first church in Dover was finished. This year Rev. Mr. Jenkins died, after only five months of successful work in Appoquinimink. In 1716 A.D., Mr. Richard Halliwell bequeathed to Immanuel Church, New Castle, sixty pounds and his marsh and plantation for the use of the ministers of the parish. In 1716-17 A.D., St. James' Church, White Clay Creek, was built.—Mr. Jas. Robinson gave a few acres of land as a glebe. In 1717-18 A.D., Rev. Geo. Ross, with Gov. Keith, visited Lewes, and Kent and Sussex Counties, "preaching and baptizing large numbers." In 1721 A.D., Rev. Wm. Beckett was appointed for Lewes and adjacent parts. In 1729 A.D., Rev. Walter Hackett was at Middletown. He died in 1733 A.D. "He had been a very laborious missionary." In 1742 A.D., "Rev. Wm. Beckett speaks of his four churches in Sussex as being filled on Sundays and holy-days." In 1749 A.D., Rev. Hugh Neill was missionary at Dover. He catechised a class of one hundred negroes on Sunday evenings, and baptized one hundred and nine adult negroes. Rev. Geo. Ross died in 1749 A.D., aged seventy-five years, having "labored most zealously" in New Castle and through the three counties. In 1757 A.D., Rev. A. Cleveland, lately appointed to New Castle, died at the house of Benjamin Franklin. Franklin's newspaper contained an article highly commending the good man. In 1758 A.D., Eneas Ross, son of Geo. Ross, is settled in New Castle. In 1759 A.D., Rev. Chas. Inglis takes charge of Dover. In six years he baptized in Dover and its vicinity seven hundred and fifty-six children and twenty-three adults, and the communicants increased from forty-nine to one hundred and fourteen. He afterwards became rector of Trinity Church, New York, and at a later period Bishop of Nova Scotia. The year 1766 A.D. was memorable for the loss by shipwreck of Rev. Messrs. Giles and Wilson, who were returning from England to assume the missions at Dover and Mispillion. In 1782 A.D. the Revolution closed the work of the Propagation Society, which had so long blessed these shores. The first Diocesan Convention met in Dover in 1791 A.D. In 1793 A.D., Bishop White confirmed sixty-three in Trinity Church, Wilmington. In 1803, Bishop Claggett confirmed in the same church. In 1822 A.D., Bishop White, assisted by Bishop Kemp, consecrated Immanuel Church, New Castle. Rev. Robert Clay resigned this parish in 1824 A.D., after a rectorship of thirty-six years. St. Andrew's, Wilmington, was consecrated by Bishop White in 1829 A.D.⁶ Bishop H. U. Onderdonk consecrated Trinity Chapel, Wilmington, in 1830 A.D. St. Andrew's Church was burned in 1840 A.D., but rebuilt the same year.

On May 26, 1841 A.D., Rev. Alfred Lee was elected Bishop.* After visiting the parishes, he accepted the election, which was unanimous. On October 12 of this year, during General Convention, he was consecrated in St. Paul's Church, New York, Bishop Griswold acting as presiding Bishop. By this act Delaware was withdrawn from the care of the Bishops of Pennsylvania. One of the first tokens of new life was the repairing and reopening of "Old Swedes' Church" in 1842 A.D. In 1843 A.D. St. Luke's, Seaford, was finished and consecrated, and St. John's, Little Hill (Greenville), was repaired and consecrated. St. Paul's, Georgetown, was consecrated in 1844 A.D., and St. Thomas', Newark, the next year. In 1847 A.D. the Chapel of the Comforter, Long Neck, was consecrated, and the same year St. Ann's, Appoquinimink, was repaired and consecrated. The next year St. Mark's, Millsborough, was consecrated, and in 1850 A.D. St. Philip's Chapel, Laurel, received consecration. 1853 A.D., May 20, Grace Church, Baltimore Mills, consecrated. 1854 A.D., September 14, Church of the Ascension, Claymont, consecrated, under the rectorship of Rev. Dr. J. B. Clemson. 1855 A.D., January 14, St. Andrew's, Wilmington, enlarged and reopened. The Bishop is the Rector of this church. 1856 A.D., Christ Church, Christiana Hundred, opened. The chief projector and founder of this church was Alexis T. Du Pont. He died in 1857

* The Right Rev. Alfred Lee, D.D., D.C.L., was born in Cambridge, Mass., September 9, 1807 A.D. Graduated at Harvard 1827 A.D. He studied law and was admitted to the Bar in New London, Conn., where he practiced two years. Graduated from General Theological Seminary, New York, 1837 A.D. Ordered Deacon May 21, 1837 A.D. Ordained Priest June 12, 1838 A.D. Officiated a few months in St. James', Poquetonnack, Conn., in 1838 A.D. In September, 1838 A.D., became rector of Calvary, Rockdale, Pa., where he remained until his elevation to the Episcopate. Received degree of S.T.D. from Trinity, Hartford, 1841 A.D., and from Hobart, Geneva, same year. In 1860 A.D. received same degree from Harvard, and in 1877 A.D. that of LL.D. from Delaware College, Newark. Consecrated first Bishop of Delaware, in St. Paul's Chapel, New York, October 12, 1841 A.D., by the Right Rev. Alexander Viets Griswold, S.T.D., the Right Rev. Richard Chauncy Moore, D.D., the Right Rev. Philander Chase, S.T.D., the Right Rev. Thomas Church Brownell, S.T.D., the Right Rev. Henry Ustick Onderdonk, S.T.D., the Right Rev. William Meade, D.D., and the Right Rev. Charles Pettit McIlvaine, S.T.D. In 1842 A.D. became rector of St. Andrew's, Wilmington, which position he still holds.—(Living Church Annual.)

A.D., having first founded St. John's Church, Wilmington. Christ Church, Delaware City, was consecrated in 1857 A.D.

The succeeding year witnessed the consecration of St. Mark's Church, Little Creek. 1858 A.D. St. Peter's, Lewes, consecrated. St. John's, Wilmington, consecrated after the death of its founder, A. T. Du Pont, 1860 A.D. Christ Church, Dover, renewed, and consecrated. 1863 A.D., Calvary Church, Brandywine Hundred, consecrated. Christ Church, Milford, was rebuilt, during the rectorship of Rev. J. Leighton McKim, in 1866 A.D. St. James' Church, Newport, under the rectorship of Rev. W. D. Hanson, was opened October 23, 1875 A.D., and St. John Baptist, Milton, in 1877 A.D. The new Grace Church, Brandywine Hundred, was opened July 4, 1875 A.D. June 1, 1880 A.D., St. Andrew's, Ellis's Grove, was opened under the care of Rev. G. W. Johnson. St. Paul's, Georgetown, having been rebuilt, under the rectorship of Rev. B. T. Douglas, was opened in 1881 A.D. In 1882 A.D. the new Trinity Chapel, Wilmington, was opened, having been built in the rectorship of Henry B. Martin, M.D.

The only General Convention which ever met in Delaware assembled in 1786 A.D. in Wilmington. It had ten clerical and twelve lay deputies from six States. The call for the first Diocesan Convention came from Rev. John Bissett, Appoquinimink, and the vestry of Christ Church, Dover. Several years before a summons had been issued, but there is no evidence of the assembling of a Convention. In 1803 A.D., in Convention, Rev. William Pryce was commissioned to attend the Maryland Convention, and propose the election of a Bishop for Delaware and the Eastern Shore of Maryland. The Maryland Convention deemed this "inexpedient." In 1821 A.D., Rev. Richard D. Hall, of Trinity Church, Wilmington, reports two confirmations by Bishop White, the whole number confirmed being one hundred and sixty-three. In 1838 A.D., Bishop Onderdonk ordained three Presbyters in St. Ann's, Appoquinimink,—Rev. John Linn McKim, Rev. William Nelson Pendleton, and the Rev. William James Clark. When the first Diocesan Convention met in 1791 A.D., it had but three clergymen in it, viz., Rev. Messrs. Thorne, Bissett, and Skelly. Bishop Lee speaks highly of the work of the early clergy in Delaware, from the beginning of its history, and their work in connection with the laborers of after-years, under God, shows an improving state of things to-day, as the following statistics will make evident. The Bishop has prepared a table extending from 1841 to 1881 A.D. Churches consecrated, 23; built, 24; enlarged, 8; baptisms, 10,082; confirmed, 4327; ordained Deacons, 35; Presbyters, 31; parishes, 27; churches and chapels, 36; ministers canonically resident, 29; candidates, 2; Sunday-school teachers, 290; scholars, 2500. There is an Episcopal Fund, and one for the Relief of Disabled Clergy and their Widows and Orphans.

REV. S. F. HOTCHKIN.

Demiurge. The Gnostic imaginary Disposer of the Order of the Universe. The title was used by Plato, was transferred by Philo as a sub-title descriptive of the CREATOR, was taken up by the New Platonists, and so was transferred by the Oriental fancies of the Gnostics to their wild theories. The Gnostic (vide Æon) imagined a Supreme Being from whom, by successive emanations (in some 365 degrees), at last wisdom was reached, from whom sprung the Demiurge, the shaper of the material universe.

Demoniacs. Whenever, in the English Authorized Version of the Old Testament, the word "devil" occurs, and in two-thirds of the cases in the New Testament, it signifies not Satan, of whose name it is the equivalent, and to whom it, by rights, should have been restricted, but one of those subordinate spirits of whom he is the "prince," and instead of "devil" we should read "demon." Of the "woman who had a spirit of infirmity" the LORD said, "Satan hath bound her" (St. Luke xiii. 11), and certain sufferers are said to be "oppressed of the devil" (Acts), but no man is ever said to "have" or be "possessed by" Satan, always by a "demon," or "demons" (Acts), by "evil" and "unclean spirits," the "angels of the devil."

The history of the word is significant. In the Hebrew Scriptures, on several occasions objects of false worship are mentioned, and always in terms of contempt, but sometimes by names which perhaps really indicated the idol form, sometimes the regard in which the heathen held them (Lev. xvii. 7; 2 Chron. xi. 15; Isa. xiii. 21), sometimes apparently by the titles which their worshippers gave them,—"goats" or "satyrs," "idols" or "images,"—lords" (Ps. xcv. 6; Deut. xxxii. 17; Ps. cvi. 37). Among the Greeks daimon was a general term by which to designate all spiritual authority. It was applied to the gods, to the deified heroes, to guardian spirits. It included also all evil powers; but the term was one suggestive in the mind of the heathen of neither evil nor dishonor. (Vide Acts xvii. 18, 22.) Nor probably would any one of the titles used by the Hebrew writers have been objected to by a heathen. But to the mind of an Israelite believing in the one God, holding that idols were abominations, and the deities of the heathen, spirits of evil, intercourse with whom ("familiar spirits") (Lev. xx. 27; 1 Sam. xxviii. 8) was deadly sin, every one of these titles involved the idea of evil. And when he used the word daimon or daimonion he meant a wicked spirit, a "lying spirit" like him that spoke in the prophets of Ahab, an "evil angel" such as the LORD sent to punish Israel (1 Kings xxii. 22; Ps. lxxviii. 49); albeit he did not speak of these as demons unless they became objects of worship. It is in this special sense that St.

Paul uses the word when he tells the Christians of Corinth that the heathen sacrifices to idols are "sacrifices to demons and not to God, and ye cannot drink the cup of the LORD and the cup of demons: ye cannot be partakers of the LORD's table and of the table of demons" (1 Cor. x. 20, 21), while that which he cast out of the damsel at Philippi is entitled not a demon, but a "spirit of pytho," or "of divination" (Acts xix. 19). The use of the term in Tobit is more general (Tob. vi. 7, 17), but not like that with which we are familiar in the Gospels.

The difference in respect to the use of the term in its different forms is very marked. The revelation of the truth about Satan and his angels, the kingdom of darkness, is part of the revelation of the truth in CHRIST, and it comes upon us with a burst of light. The state of things into which we are introduced by the Gospels, when the "possession by demons," "having unclean spirits," was a common and recognized form of affliction, and so dealt with by our LORD that there is no possibility of doubt upon the subject without denying His truthfulness,—this state of things is in respect of the knowledge and acknowledgment peculiar. It seems not unreasonable that the powers of evil should have been given a special license just at this time in order that at their very worst they might be met by Him and overthrown; but certainly one great difference between that time and the times before and after, lay in the great flood of light which poured in upon it with the SAVIOUR'S presence.

It is noteworthy that St. John in his Gospel rarely names Satan, and any form of daemon only occurs when the enemies of the LORD bring the charge and He repels it, that He "hath a demon." Nor does he once in his Gospel refer to any "spirit" that is unclean or evil, and only once in his first Epistle (1 John iv. 3), where he repeats almost the very words of St. Paul concerning spiritual gifts (1 Cor. xii. 1, 3). Writing later and for a generation which always had the other three Gospels, his record took the form rather of a complement than of a repetition of the others. But in the earlier Gospels the dealing of our LORD with the demons and with those who were possessed by them occupies a prominent place. St. Matthew records how at the beginning of our LORD's ministry "they brought unto Him all sick people that were taken with divers diseases and torments, and those which were possessed with devils, and those which were lunatick, and those that had the palsy" (St. Matt. iv. 24). "They brought unto Him many that were possessed with devils, and He cast out the spirits with His word, and healed all that were sick" (St. Mark i. 34).

In the synagogue at Capernaum there was a man "who had a spirit of an unclean devil, and he cried out, Let us alone; what have we to do with thee, JESUS of Nazareth?

I know Thee, who Thou art; the Holy One of God" (St. Luke iv. 34), and he was one of many whom He rebuked and suffered not to speak, because they knew that He was CHRIST. "In the country of the Gergesenes there met Him one possessed of devils," "who came and worshiped Him, crying out and saying, What have we to do with Thee, JESUS, Thou SON of GOD? Art Thou come hither to torment us before the time?" ("The devils believe, and tremble," St. James says, ch. ii. 19). "And JESUS asked him, what is thy name? And he said, Legion, for we are many. And they besought Him that He would not send them out into the abyss." And at the command of JESUS "the unclean spirits went out and entered into the swine, and the herd (of about two thousand) ran violently down a steep place into the sea." And "the man out of whom the devils were departed was found sitting at the feet of JESUS, clothed, and in his right mind" (St. Matt. viii. 28; St. Mark v. 1; St. Luke viii. 26). "They brought to Him a dumb man possessed of a devil, and when the devil was cast out the dumb spake" (St. Matt. ix. 32). He cast out "an unclean dumb and deaf spirit that had possessed one from a child," so that he was lunatic and sore vexed" (St. Luke ix. 42), "and rent him when he came out of him, so that they said, He is dead" (St. Matt. xvii. 18): "out of Mary Magdalene seven devils" (St. Mark xvi. 9): out of the daughter of the Syro-Phœnician woman a devil, "an unclean spirit" (St. Mark vii. 26). But not only did CHRIST Himself exercise this power over unclean spirits. He committed it to His disciples, and "even the devils were subject to them in His name" (St. Luke x. 17). Nay, He foretold that men should "in His name cast out devils" whom He "never knew" (St. Matt. vii. 22). Some form of exorcism was indeed practiced among the Jews during our LORD's ministry, which He recognized by His question, "By whom do your sons cast them out?" (St. Luke xi. 19), as, on the other hand, they recognized His power by their charge, "He casteth out devils through Beelzebub, the prince of the devils" (St. Matt. xii. 24, 27). His promise of power was fulfilled when in Samaria, at the word of St. Philip, "unclean spirits, crying with loud voice, came out of many that were possessed" (Acts viii. 7). Afterwards in Philippi, at the word of St. Paul, the "damsel possessed with a spirit of divination" was healed (Acts xvi. 16). And later still, when at Ephesus evil spirits were cast out by the hands of the Apostle, who resisted the authority of the Jewish exorcists (Acts xix. 12). In one of his latest epistles the Apostle warns against "seducing spirits and doctrines of devils" (1 Tim. iv. 1). "Worship of devils," to be misled by "the spirits of devils," is a sin of the last times; to be "the habitation of devils," the fate of Babylon fallen (Rev. ix. 20; xvi. 14; xviii. 2).

Briefly to recapitulate the main points gathered from these passages. The active working of demons—angels and agents of Satan—is recognized in the Old Testament. But their greatest activity was shown in the time of our LORD's manifestation on the earth. Then they took "possession" of the souls and bodies of men. The "having" or being "possessed by a demon" was a condition to be recognized by certain signs, and though it produced disorder of mind and body, it was clearly and positively distinguished from ordinary physical and even mental disorders. The demoniac might be dumb or lunatic, but all dumb and lunatics are not demoniacs. Our LORD recognizes the fact by the plainest words and the plainest conduct. To question it is to impute to Him shameless falsehood. We do not know what in any case induced the affliction. It has been conjectured that it was prepared for by some habitual vice which weakened the will, and opened the way for the evil and unclean spirit to take captive the soul and body of the sufferer, but we have no reason to suppose that the demoniac was the most wicked of men. "Not the most wicked, but the most unhappy."

Nor is there anything in the condition which restricts it to those times. The work of evil spirits goes on and will. It is less open, but not less real. It may very possibly be that there are cases now in which persistent evil habit has put the will into the power of the evil spirit, and the man is driven into strange and evil ways in spite of himself (2 Tim. ii. 26). If there are such cases, they are very sad, and to human power hopeless. But if there is an evil power in the world, there is also a Son of Man, who "still hath power on earth." The hope of such must be not in ordinary human means, but added to them, in the religion, in the prayers which are offered, and the means of grace which are received "in His name," who most assuredly did not limit to one generation the promise, "in My name they shall cast out devils."

Deposition. Vide DEGRADATION.

Descent into Hell. (Vide CREED.) Our LORD's descent into the place of departed spirits is an article of faith, inasmuch as it involves the fact that in human soul and body He was in all respects as we are, sin only excepted, and that He was touched with all our infirmities, and went to the confines of all that can befall the soul upon which the law of separation from the body has passed, and from which He returned victorious (Col. i. 15; Eph. iv. 8, 9; Heb. ii. 14). But the space of time during which His soul was there was filled with the work St. Peter describes (1 Pet. iii. 18-20). This very-much-debated passage can really be taken only in its plain, common-sense meaning. There is no difficulty in recognizing the power of Him who is over all to do as He will with all souls. That souls can and do know, remember, and reason is admitted. Why these souls in prison were selected of all others we need not too curiously inquire, since His infinite wisdom is too abundantly proved for us to doubt the perfect justice and mercy of this act. The doctrine in question has been explained away chiefly on two grounds, both apparently well founded, but both untenable. First, it implies the power of repenting after death. The reply is, that the impossibility of repentance beyond the grave is rather a just and equitable deduction, by applying our present condition to what is told us of the future, than an express dogma of Holy Scripture, and therefore its limits are not really known to us; but, that in this case, if this conclusion were drawn, it would be determined only for those who were sometime disobedient, when once the long-suffering of God waited in the days of Noah; and, secondly, it is urged that it gives some countenance to the doctrine of purgatory. Rather, it expressly does not, for the underlying principle of purgatory is that it is a place of cleansing and purification by fire, or other disciplinary pain, and there is not the slightest ground for this in the text of St. Peter. Rather, for these souls, the tone of the eighty-eighth Psalm should be the one for us to feel in interpreting so difficult a passage.

The article was placed in the Creed probably about the middle of the fourth century. It probably owes its prominence to the Apollinarian controversy (vide APOLLINARIANS), when it was necessary to strongly assert the existence of our LORD's soul as distinct from His divine nature.

The Third of the XXXIX. Articles had originally a clause in addition. As it now runs we have it, "As CHRIST died for us, and was buried, so also it is to be believed that He went down into Hell." It continued thus: "for the Body lay in the sepulchre until the Resurrection, but His Ghost departing from Him was with the hosts that were in prison or in Hell, and did preach to the same, as the place in St. Peter doth testify." (Browne on the XXXIX. Articles.)

Desk. The "pulpit or pew" from which the prayers are said in many churches, which still retain the furniture common forty years ago. It was an innovation which, beginning in the minor contentions in the latter years of Edward VI., was given way to gradually till James I.'s time, when it became universal. It is now generally disappearing, and the older, more sightly, and reverent stalls are taking its place.

Deuteronomy. The second giving of the Law upon the "plains of Moab this side Jordan." The wanderings of the people had now drawn to a close. The forty years were almost ended, and Moses, knowing that he could not cross over into "that good land," recapitulated to the Israelites a rapid outline of the history of their life in the wilderness from the giving of the Law to that moment. It included a repetition (with additions) of the legal and ritual directions and a series of solemn warnings, closing both with an awful prophecy, which was fulfilled in the final destruction of Jerusalem, and with a song of triumph and thanksgiving. The last verses were added of course by some later hand. Before giving the analysis of the book, we will add that though its Mosaic authorship has been denied, this denial would seem to come out of a mere spirit of contradiction. The natural, even necessary, change of style from the historical to the rhetorical has been alleged as a proof that it could not be by Moses. The apparent discrepancies of statement are inevitable when the chronicler in his record sets down leading facts, but when reciting the same general series of events before an audience familiar with the history, nay, actors in it, he naturally neglects the full account of the leading events and mentions secondary facts connected with them. To the audience, there would be no discrepancies, but to us, unable to harmonize the allusions, they seem contradictory. So far as a close examination of the various theories against the Mosaic authorship can be made, it may be confidently denied that they have the slightest ground. A minute criticism, gathering many little seeming contradictory facts, may construct a theory but cannot present a formal case. (Vide PENTATEUCH.)

There are three main discourses, in which the history of the people and the legal, religious, and ceremonial laws are repeated.

I. The first discourse (ch. iv. 43) is mainly historical, and rapidly recites the events from the giving of the Law to that moment, mentioning incidentally the contests with the various tribes and peoples in the course of their wanderings. It is rapid, easy, connected, but very concise, and has some allusions which are not recorded in the fuller history.

II. The second discourse (ch. iv. 44; xxvi. 19) recapitulates the various enactments yet with modifications and additions, and is full of zeal and ardent enthusiasm. It lifts up the obedience of the people into a higher plane. It supposes that the discipline of the wilderness, the death of the disobedient by the way, the proofs of God's love, and the abiding presence of the pillar of light and cloud had warmed and inflamed their hearts. Warned that they were obstinate in character, they were urged to love and obey because of God's love and mercy. The laws originally given as for a wandering people, are here and there modified a little to suit their settlement in Canaan. Altogether it is difficult to conceive how a man of the mighty ability and the vast experience of Moses, one who had been the agent of God in such wondrous miracles, who had intrusted to him the training of the infancy of a nation, could speak to them with any less fervor when he was about to be separated from them. Filled with the HOLY GHOST, burning with zeal and love for the people, surely language was too poor to convey all he would pour forth out of a full heart, now that he was to be separated from them. Every law that is recited to them has behind it, and pulsing through the words which contain it, the overflowing heart of the Lawgiver. The ten commandments, the religious law; the fear of idolatry, the need of obedience; the ritual law of feasts and (naturally) the flesh allowed in them; their tithes and offering; the seventh year and the Jubilee; the feasts of the Passover, the Pentecost, and the Tabernacle,—form the section on the religious law. The rules for judges and the administration of justice, the regulation for a future king, the inheritance of the Levites, the prophecy of CHRIST the Prophet, the cities of refuge and the law of the avenger of blood, the law on perjury, on war, on homicides, on divorces, on the malefactor not to remain hanging all night, from the section on the political and criminal law. Then the social laws follow (ch. xxii.—xxvi.).

III. Then Moses associated the elders with him, and recited to the people the solemn forms of blessing and cursing which were to be recited upon Mount Gerizim and Mount Ebal. Then followed that awful passage beginning with the promise of abundant blessing, and passing on to the prophecy (the more terrible because we know how fifteen centuries later it was literally fulfilled) of the final punishment of their disobedience, and the destruction of Jerusalem. This discourse closed with a fervent appeal to the people to love and to obey. This is the last formal discourse of instruction, but there remained much more to do. The final arrangements for the leadership of the people, and the placing of the books of the Law in the side of the Ark, and His song and His blessing, were yet to be made and recorded (ch. xxxi.—xxxiii.). And Moses went up to the top of Pisgah, thence saw by the vision God gave him the extent of the promised land, and then (as the Jewish tradition beautifully phrased it) God kissed him, and so he died and the LORD buried him.

Devil. Vide SATAN.

Diatessaron. The Greek name for the harmony of the four Gospels. Tatian, it is said, introduced this mode of arranging the sacred narrative of our LORD's life. (Vide HARMONY OF THE GOSPELS.)

Diet. The Assembly of the Estates in Germany. It had at one time in German history, during the Reformation, an active influence in public, especially in religious affairs. For details, the reader is referred to the Histories of the Reformation on the Continent; the dates only of the more notable ones are here given.

Diet of Worms, 1521 A.D. To which Luther was summoned, and to which he came under the safeguard of the Emperor. In this Diet he appealed to the Holy Scripture.

Diet of Nuremberg (I.), 1523 A.D. At which the Centum gravamina were presented, and where the idea of calling a Council was first agitated.

Diet of Nuremberg (II.), 1524 A.D. Where the proposition of the Council was further agitated by the Lutherans.

Diet of Spire (I.), 1526 A.D. Under the Archduke Ferdinand, in behalf of Charles V. The Lutheran Princes led in the debates. They succeeded in directing that every one was to have liberty of conscience, till a General or National Council could be summoned in Germany.

Diet of Spire (II.), 1529 A.D. The work of the Lutherans was undone; the states which had become Lutheran could remain so, but no other of the states could change. The preaching against Roman doctrine was prohibited, the Anabaptists were to be put to death. This undid so much of the work of the first Diet, that six of the Lutheran Princes and the deputies of fourteen imperial cities protested, in writing, against the decree, which they would not obey, and appealed to a General Council, to the Emperor, and to any other unprejudiced judge. Hence they were called from this solemn protestation PROTESTANTS, which the Lutherans first took and afterwards the Calvinistic bodies, and then it became a general term.

Diet of Augsburg (I.), 1530 A.D. Charles V. tried to reunite the Princes in the discussions on religion, and to combine the resources of the Empire against the Turk. Here the Elector of Saxony, with his confederates in religion, offered the famous Augsburg Confession. The general result was the resolve to wait for a General Council.

Diet of Augsburg (II.), 1547 A.D. The decisions of the Council of Trent, then in interrupted session, produced some dissensions, but the whole decision was left to the Emperor, but the Council decrees were acceded to.

Diet of Augsburg (III.), 1548 A.D. The Diet at which the Interim was drawn up.

Diet of Augsburg (IV.), 1550 A.D. The Emperor complained of the non-observance of the Interim, but the reply was that the Lutheran deputies were not admitted to the Council of Trent as had been agreed, nor was the compact that the Pope should not reside observed.

Diet of Ratisbon (I.), 1541 A.D. Held to effect a reconciliation between the Protestants and the Romanists. After much dispute nothing was effected. Five or six articles out of twenty-two were decided on, but the Diet came to no real decision.

Diet of Ratisbon (II.), 1546 A.D. None of the Protestant powers appeared. The Council of Trent was accepted in its sessions thus far held, and action was taken which led to a war with the Protestants.

Diet of Ratisbon (III.), 1557 A.D. A conference was attempted between the Roman and Lutheran divines, but it soon broke up.

Dignitary. One who holds an office or preferment in the Church, to which jurisdiction is attached.

Dilapidation. In the English Church the Archdeacon has full authority as to deciding upon the needs of repairing churches and the extent of the dilapidations. His monition, or that of the Bishop, is directed to the incumbent, who shall thereupon take steps to have the church or houses of the benefice properly repaired; and to this end he was to expend all proper moneys raised or given upon the Bishop's consent and approval.

Diocese. This is the name now commonly given to the territory over which one Diocesan Bishop's jurisdiction extends. When the Bishop is a Missionary Bishop, not elected by his own clergy and people, the territory under him is called a Missionary Jurisdiction. Until about the end of the third century the common term for a Bishop's jurisdiction was παροικία, or, as we now say, parish. Under Constantine the word "Diocese" meant a large aggregation of Provinces,—the same that was afterwards called an Exarchate, and still later a Patriarchate. The original Parish or Diocese grew out of the Bishop, who commonly began his labors in the chief city of the region. As he multiplied his clergy they naturally lived together with him, working from a common centre. When one building would no longer accommodate all, other buildings were erected, but—as is proved by the Bishop's throne occupying the same position in each of the ancient Basilicas—the Bishop was equally the head of each and all. The other clergy were sent by him, and continued to be under his constant direction,—the Bishop himself when present in any church being the usual celebrant, preacher, and minister of adult Baptism, as well as of peculiarly Episcopal functions. Some of the old Canons seem to make his position that of a real father, his clergy being his family. When separate Church buildings became so numerous that the family feeling was outgrown, and when churches became more frequent in the remoter country parts, then there gradually came what is now known as "the parish system." At first all the churches would be served by clergy sent from the Bishop's house, in some order of rotation fixed by him,—all the churches belonging equally to the Bishop. Alexandria was the first city where a separate Presbyter was attached to each church, in something like the modern relation of a rector of a parish. In process of time, it was found that this insured more thorough knowledge of individuals and a closer application of pastoral care, and eventually the separate parishes acquired separate funds and rights of their own; and the parish system—now more than a thousand years old—became in most respects what it is at present.

In this country the process of practical development was precisely the opposite. Instead of Bishops coming first and parishes long afterwards, the parishes came first, some of them being in existence more than an hundred years before there was a Bishop in the country. As a natural result, the position of parishes is much more clearly defined with us than the inherent rights of the Bishops. Before the Revolutionary war there was no "Diocese" in the country, the whole thirteen colonies—by a monstrosity of perversion and abuse—being considered a part of the "Diocese" of London, in England. After the war was over, the first attempt at organization was simply among the parishes that happened to be within the territory of any one "State." Nor did the parishes in any State, thus organizing, at first call themselves a "Diocese." They were simply "the Church in the State of Pennsylvania," or in the "State of New York," etc. This is the language of the Constitution as originally adopted in 1789 A.D., in which the word "Diocese" is only used, and then as synonymous with "district." This is in Art. 4: "And every Bishop of this Church shall confine the exercise of his Episcopal office to his proper Diocese or district, unless requested to ordain, or confirm, or perform any other act of the Episcopal office, by any Church destitute of a Bishop." This formal style was maintained until the subdivision of New York into two Dioceses, in 1838 A.D., gave occasion for a change; and in that same year, in the Constitution the word "States" was struck out in every place except where it follows the word "United," and the word "Dioceses" took its place. There is, to the present day, no law of our Church regulating the organization of a Diocese in any State or Territory. The original Constitution provided that "A Protestant Episcopal Church in any of the United States not now represented may, at any time hereafter, be admitted on acceding to this Constitution." The Churches in nine of the States were represented at that General Convention of 1789 A.D.,—Connecticut, Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, and South Carolina. The Constitution also provided that "The Church in each State shall be entitled to a representation of both the clergy and the laity." There was no requirement fixing the number of clergy or parishes; but "A Church" in any "State" of the Union not then represented was to be admitted "on acceding to this Constitution." The proof of this "acceding," and of the election of the deputies appearing, was all. Not even a vote of admission was thought necessary. In this way Rhode Island made its appearance in General Convention in 1792 A.D., Vermont in 1811 A.D., New Hampshire in 1817 A.D., and others subsequently. At length there grew up the custom of "admitting" by vote of both Houses; but this vote always was favorable on proof of "acceding to this Constitution." Nothing else was required.

Meanwhile, the Constitution was changed so as to permit the organization of a Diocese in a Territory as well as in a State. There is absolutely no limit as to numbers either of clergy or laity in a State or Territory at the time of organization. Vermont was admitted when there were only two clergymen in the State, one of them being a Deacon, and both came to the General Convention of 1811 A.D., and were admitted without even a vote. Though any two or more clergy and parishes in a State or Territory may thus organize themselves into a Diocese, accede to the Constitution, and claim the right to be admitted into the General Convention, there is a canonical restriction in regard to the election of a Bishop of their own. This they cannot do until there shall have been, for a year before such election, at least six Presbyters settled over parishes, and qualified to vote for a Bishop; and six or more parishes represented in the lay order in the Convention electing. But this is the only restriction in the case of a new Diocese organized out of a State or Territory.

The case is entirely different, however, when the new Diocese is formed by subdividing an existing Diocese. This cannot be done without first getting the consent of the Bishop and Convention of the Diocese to be divided, and afterwards the consent of the General Convention. And the consent of the General Convention "shall not be given"—so says the Constitution—"until it has satisfactory assurance of a suitable provision for the support of the Episcopate in the contemplated new Diocese." When this phrase became law, its advocates said that it did not mean an endowment or Episcopal Fund; but it would be enough if the Bishop were to be the rector of a parish, or president or professor of a college, or was supported by assessments; and West Virginia and Southern Ohio were both admitted without one dollar of endowment, both these Dioceses supporting their Bishops by assessments. But there are still other restrictions: "No such new Diocese shall be formed which shall contain less than six parishes, or less than six Presbyters who have been for at least one year canonically resident within the bounds of such new Diocese, regularly settled in a parish or congregation, and qualified to vote for a Bishop. Nor shall such new Diocese be formed if thereby any existing Diocese shall be so reduced as to contain less than twelve parishes, or less than twelve Presbyters who have been residing therein and settled and qualified as above mentioned." And it is also declared that "No city shall form more than one Diocese." Nor is even this the whole. The Bishop may choose which of the Dioceses he will, the new or the old, and that shall be thenceforth his Diocese. If there be an Assistant Bishop, he may take as his own Diocese that which is not chosen by the Bishop, or he may choose to continue with the Bishop as his Assistant, with right to succeed him. Moreover, the Constitution and Canons of the old Diocese continue to be those of the new (except as local circumstances may prevent) until they may be duly altered by the Convention. There are several other restrictions besides, but not of so much importance as the above.

An American Diocese, as represented in its Convention or Diocesan Synod, consists of its Bishop (and Assistant Bishop, if there be one), who always presides when present; it includes also nearly all the clergy, and lay delegates from each parish. Some Dioceses restrict their clerical membership by excluding all who have not been in residence for six months or a year, as well as all who are not in active clerical duty, or whose parishes are not in union with the Convention. The Diocesan Convention elects its own Bishop, by a separate vote of both orders. It elects also a Secretary and Treasurer, as well as a Standing Committee, who are the Bishop's constant Council of Advice, and without their consent he can do no official act of much importance. The clergy and laity also elect their own deputies to General Convention, and their own Board of Diocesan Missions, who, with the Bishop at their head, conduct the business of Church extension within the bounds of the Diocese itself. At the Convention the Bishop is required to present a full account of his Episcopal work for the year preceding, and he suggests any matters which he may think expedient for the action of his Convention. A Diocese has no reserved rights which it can defend as against legislation by the General Convention. But its Constitution and Canons, though subordinate to those of General Convention, are binding, so that a clergyman of the Diocese is liable to presentment and trial for violating them. The Dioceses are by the Constitution required to provide the mode of trying Presbyters and Deacons. The vote by orders is found in all the Dioceses, so that neither clergy nor laity can infringe upon one another's rights. But very few of the Dioceses give to the Bishop a separate vote in legislation. He commonly votes as one of the clergy. But his influence is generally as strong as his veto would be. The Standing Committee is "the ecclesiastical authority" during the vacancy of a Diocese for all those parts of a Bishop's administrative duty which do not require Episcopal consecration for their validity. They have power to invite any Bishop to perform these Episcopal acts; or the Convention may put the Diocese provisionally under the charge of any Bishop. It is very common for Dioceses of any extent to be subdivided into Convocations, Deaneries, or Archdeaconries; which are chiefly of use in ascertaining, by actual experience, what may be the most convenient lines for future subdivision into smaller Dioceses.

A Missionary Jurisdiction does not elect its own Bishop, nor elect a Standing Committee, nor legislate for itself, nor send a full deputation to General Convention. In many respects its position is analogous to that of a Territory, as compared with a State, in our national political system.

REV. J. H. HOPKINS.

Diptychs. The tablets from which the roll of the names of the dead were read at the celebration of the Holy Communion. It was probably borrowed from the consular registers of magistrates. There was a class of Diptychs in which the register of the orthodox Bishops who had ruled the See was read. Exclusion from this list was often a punishment. St. Cyprian directs that one of the Bishops subject to Carthage should have his name dropped because of an infringement of Church Law. The better-known class of Diptychs was the roll of names of living and dead benefactors of the Church. These Diptychs became the basis for the Martyrologies. A prayer in the Mozarabic Liturgy is called Post Nomina, —i.e., the prayer after the recitation of the names.

Directory. A book explaining and regulating Church ceremonials.

Disciple. The name borne by the followers of CHRIST in His lifetime. It included more than the Twelve Apostles. The name continued to be given till at last the title the Antiocheans bestowed upon them, of Christians, replaced it.

Discipline. In its fundamental principles the discipline of the Church in the United States is based on the few general directions contained in the New Testament and the primitive practices. In the application of those principles and in the use of particular methods there has been a considerable departure from early customs. The difference is due to many causes. At first the Christian Church stood surrounded by the customs, institutions, and especially the corrupting games and diversions of a heathen society. To these fascinating and seductive immoralities is due the rigid and precise system of ecclesiastical penalties and purgations well known to the student of Church history. The whole social constitution and manners being changed, the Church has resorted to different measures for preserving its honor and its purity. While diverse views are held as to the expediency of enforcing the obligations of upright and holy living by imposing penalties and disabilities, it is admitted on all sides that the spirit, tone, and convictions of the modern world are such as to render the infliction of ecclesiastical penalties extremely difficult. Theologians and divines differ widely on the question how far such penalties actually promote Christian truth and righteousness, even when they are practicable.

The discipline of the clergy is provided for in detail by the Canons. Reference to them shows that the object mainly sought is the maintenance of the character of the Christian ministry and the prevention of scandal and disorder in the Church through moral transgression. As with the laity, the discipline is rather corrective than punitive, seeking the welfare of the whole body rather than to measure out a proportionate pain to the transgressor. The law for the arraignment and trial of any clergyman or Bishop, with a specification of offenses, is drawn up with great particularity, and may be found in the "Digest." The offenses may be in doctrine or in practice. Trials for heresy are perhaps as rare as those for immorality, but proceedings are much oftener initiated for the latter than for the former. On confession or by default, clergymen are suspended or deposed every year by Bishops. The rule prevails that a man shall be tried by his peers. The information and the court are found among the Clergy, who are supposed to guard both their own rights in their orders and their integrity. Minute precautions are appointed for the protection of the accused and the securing of justice in the sentence. Essentially the Bishop's function is judicial, though to some extent he has the powers of the grand jury, and the initiation or arrest of proceedings is largely at his discretion. Both from penalties for false teaching and bad living there may be restoration on a well-tested reformation or recantation. Thus far the efforts made in General Convention to establish Appellate Courts have not been successful, the best jurists not appearing to favor them. The public opinion of the Church and generally of the community sufficiently supports the judicial decisions of the Episcopate.

For the laity disciplinary authority is found in the few rather general directions on the subject (already referred to) scattered through the New Testament and in the Rubrics of the Prayer-Book, chiefly in those pertaining to the Office of the Holy Communion. As the highest privilege of the believer, and as the chief visible mark of his standing in the body, the Lord's Supper naturally becomes a criterion of fidelity to the Head of the Kingdom. Admission to it is a kind of certificate of the individual disciple's continuance in faith and obedience. Rejection from it is both the deprivation of a benefit and to some extent a public mark of chastisement or rebuke. Laymen are not brought before a Church tribunal. There is no trial by "brethren." Under the responsibility of the power of the Keys, guided by the grace of ordination and by the wise and loving judgment of the Shepherds of the Flock, the Priesthood admits or rejects. While the voluntary non-communicant can hardly be said to suffer disgrace by not participating, after once being lawfully received, to be prohibited or suspended brings reproach and must be felt as a privation. In each case the Priest depends for his knowledge on all such means of inquiry and evidence as may be within his reach. From flagrant injustice he is restrained by the civil law of the land. His duties being extremely delicate and often extremely difficult, allowance has to be made for possible errors, especially where the case in hand is one where the law of the Church and the law of the State are not agreed, as happens frequently in the States as respects divorce and the relations of the sexes. Not seldom the legal complication prevents action where action ought to be taken. By a vast proportion the instances of moral dereliction unnoticed exceed those of hasty or unjust or excessive punishment. Looking simply at the question of probable good or evil resulting, thoughtful clergymen pause even when a prima facie case of guilt is made out. That the fear of what is sometimes called excommunication does hold in check a multitude of people of inferior moral and spiritual sensibility is indisputable; it hardly needs to be said that temporary suspensions at the private suggestion or requirement of the clergy are frequent. Church law allows all persons aggrieved in a sense of unmerited restraint to appeal to the Bishop of the Diocese, who, on inquiry and a full statement from the clergyman exercising discipline, may modify or remit the penalty. Such revisions and restorations are not very common. A laxer discipline than that which now exists would tend to lower the standard at least of outward piety without much raising the standard of charity. A discipline more rigorous and more active would require a catalogue of clearly-defined and universally-recognized moral offenses, apart from the Decalogue and the letter of the New Testament, which at present is not supplied.

RT. REV. F. D. HUNTINGTON, S.T.D.,

Bishop of Central New York.

Dispensation. The word has two distinct uses. The first describes the economies under which God has dealt with men, as the Patriarchal, the Mosaic, and now the Christian Dispensation. These have had clear covenant limits, and under the last every man is living, and by it Christians are bound. It is the dispensing to us of the rights, privileges, and blessings obtained for us by CHRIST, which He gives through His Church (Eph. iv. 7, 16). In a subsidiary sense the word is used to mean some particular act or event recognized as coming from God,—an act of Providence, or a dispensation of Providence.

The second use is the right—useful at times, and belonging to each Bishop—to relax for cause the rigidity of ecclesiastical discipline. Its force does not go beyond the act and for the cause specified, and is not to be taken as a precedent overthrowing the law, but as a precedent governing the limits under which future dispensations may be granted, and it ceases when the causes which justified it cease. But this right was arrogated to himself by the Bishop of Rome, who made a traffic of his dispensations, which was checked in England by various statutes, chiefly that of Provisors (Edward III.). In this country and under our Canon Laws dispensations are not needed.

Dissenters. A title given to those who dissent from the Established Church of England. This dissent is twofold: the dissent from her government; the dissent from her doctrines. But it is worthy of all consideration that the avowed principles on which such dissent is based, e.g., the proclamation of a slighted truth, is really the principle of disruption of all bonds. The Church of England does not break the principle of Apostolic unity. Neither her history nor her conduct at any time have laid her open to that charge. But the throwing off the Apostolic government and the magnifying of any one doctrine out of all proportion to the rest of the doctrines of the Faith, really breaks the net knotted of discipline and of truth. Again, it is to be insisted on, with the fullest proof at hand, that there is no doctrine proven to be in the Scriptures but is fully held in the Church in its due place in the frame-work of the Faith. The doctrine of Predestination held and urged by the Presbyterian is taught in its place in the scheme. It is not disproportionately extolled. The doctrine of the Methodist, of Free-will, is held within those true limitations that save it from Pelagianism. And so it is a truth that each dissenter will find the truths most dear to him, held, taught, enforced, but not out of its due position, in the joining together of those doctrines left by our LORD, and taught by His Apostles as needful for salvation. (This whole subject is most admirably treated in the Bampton Lecture for 1871, by Dr. G. H. Curteis, "Dissent in its Relations to the Church of England.")

Divinity of Christ. Vide JESUS.

Divorce. Vide MATRIMONY.

Dogma. A theological principle. The term belongs, strictly, to a positive statement of doctrine derived immediately or by deduction from Divine Revelation, and enunciated by the Church through a General Council. In a looser sense it is applied to the special tenets of particular Churches, or even of sects, if put forth by an authority recognized by them. Dogma presupposes substantial proof which is generally and in the ordinary sense of an historical or logical kind; but it must be remembered that we have reached the highest possible kind of evidence when it is proved that any particular statement has come from God. There can be no real opposition between dogma and history, or dogma and logic, so long as these principles are kept in view. But it must be remembered that there are some subjects in theology, especially such as relate to God Himself, which are beyond the province of history or of mere logical deduction, for they are dogmas which are known only from His revelation of them (Blunt's Dict. of Hist. Theology). The dogmas of the faith are summed up in the Creeds, and are taught every person. But there is a popular dislike to listen to any direct teaching of dogma as such. This arises partly from the want of skill in the teachers in presenting the dogmatic teaching, and partly from a prevalent idea that dogma is exclusive, and now the desire to break down all barriers and to construct an inclusive body of doctrine, or rather to throw away doctrine altogether is the leading thought. It is an era of reaction against overstrained statements and misapplied dogmatic truths; but dogma can never be cast aside, it is the very constitution of the truth itself.

Dominical Letter. The Sunday letter for the year. (Vide CALENDAR.)

Donative. A spiritual preferment in the free gift of a patron, and without admission, institution, or induction by any mandate from the Bishop or other. But the donee may by the patron, or by any other authorized by the patron, be put into possession.

Dossel. A piece of embroidered needlework, stiff silk or cloth of gold, hung at the back of a throne or altar, but more particularly the latter.

Doubles. It may happen that the service of the Sunday and that of a Saint's day coincide. The question then occurs, Which is the service proper to the day? The ancient Sarum rule (which has not been changed by authority in the Anglican communion) is that the Saint's day service should take the place of the Sunday. So, unless that Sunday be a High-Feast day, or in Advent or Lent, the Lessons, Collect, Epistle, and Gospel of the Saint's day replace those of the Sunday. In some places the Collect for the Sunday has been read immediately after the Saint's day Collect, but this does not appear proper.

Doubt. In derivation the word doubt is related to the Latin word duo, two. The very word indicates an anxiety and trouble of mind which is painful. A man standing where two roads meet, uncertain which to take, represents the doubter.

"Man knows some things and is ignorant of many things, while he is in doubt as to other things. Doubt is that state of mind in which we hesitate as to two contradictory conclusions,—having no preponderance of evidence in favor of either." (Krauth's Fleming's Vocabulary of Philosophy.)

'Doubt is some degree of belief, along with the consciousness of ignorance, in regard to a proposition. Absolute disbelief implies knowledge; it is the knowledge that such or such a thing is not true. If the mind admits a proposition without any desire for knowledge concerning it, this is credulity. If it is open to receive the proposition, but feels ignorance concerning it, this is doubt. In proportion as knowledge increases doubt diminishes, and belief or disbelief strengthens." (Taylor, Elements of Thought, quoted in the work last named.)

defective religious life and by improper views of God. "Fluctuations of religious experience" and "relapses into sin" help to increase them. Doubt is often the result of a natural temperament of mind. Religion is a habit, as well as a belief; and constant private and public prayer, the reading of the Holy Scriptures and good books, a dwelling on God's promises, and a consideration of His goodness, with a due observance of God's laws, and a frequent faithful reception of the Holy Communion, will do much to banish doubt from the mind. A constant fellowship with devout people, that is, the Communion of Saints, is a great help to constancy in faith.

"If any man will do His will, he shall know of the doctrine" (St. John vii. 17), are the words of the Master. An active missionary who had once doubted, when at work said, "I have no time for doubts." Even Moses and the Apostles were at times in doubt by reason of human weakness, but God gave them means of putting away their doubts. Some persons are given great power to assist others in such difficulties. Daniel, the prophet, is spoken of as having the power of "dissolving of doubts" (Dan. v. 12, 16).

Our LORD's rebuke to the sinking Peter was, "O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?" (St. Matt. xiv. 31). This is applicable to all. With regard to bodily wants CHRIST says, "Neither be ye of doubtful mind" (St. Luke xii. 29).

St. Paul declares that the weak brother is to be received, "but not to doubtful disputations" (Rom. xiv. 1).

Faith is natural to man. Children only learn to doubt by the deceptions that are practiced on them, and our SAVIOUR makes a child the pattern of Christian life, and demands from all who would enter the kingdom of heaven a childlike character.

Unbelief and doubt of God's words were the sins by which the devil at first sought to cast men down. The doubt in paradise has propagated itself through all the descendants of Adam and Eve, and can only be dispelled by listening to those Divine words of the Blessed SON of God, "Have faith in God" (St. Mark xi. 22).

Newman's expression, that a hundred difficulties need not produce a single doubt, is strictly true, for in worldly matters difficulties surround men on every side, and yet they act promptly. The farmer, in faith, sows a crop which may never ripen, or which may be gathered after he is dead.

See the faith of men in the future of new countries, in building railroads at vast cost and planning public improvements, notwithstanding a host of obstacles. A nation of doubters would be a stagnant nation.

This is especially the case in religion; as Aubrey de Vere says, the skeptic contracts his being.

Colton, in "Lacon" (cxlvi.), in speaking of doubt uses these words: "He is at once the richest and poorest of potentates, for he has locked up immense treasures, but he cannot find the key." Still this strong man armed may not keep his palace in peace, for the "strong SON of God" comes to the humblest believers with the promise, "Fear not, little flock, for it is your FATHER's good pleasure to give you the Kingdom" (St. Luke xii. 32).

"Suppose a person deeply perplexed about the state of his soul, continually fluctuating between hope and fear, and overwhelmed with grief were to repeatedly utter this wish: 'O that I certainly knew that I should be able to persevere!' He might be answered thus: 'And what wouldst thou do if this certain knowledge were bestowed upon thee? Do now that which thou wouldst do and rest secure of thy perseverance.'" (Thomas à Kempis, The Imitation of Christ, ch. xxiii.) This thought occurs in Ps. xxxvii. 3: "Trust in the LORD, and do good, so shalt thou dwell in the land and be fed."

Bishop Butler, in the "Analogy" (Part ii. chap. vi.), affirms that even if a man doubts he ought to act: "because the apprehension that religion may be true does as really lay men under obligations as a full conviction that it is true. It gives occasions and motives to consider further the important subject; to preserve attentively upon their minds a general implicit sense that they may, be under divine moral government, an awful solicitude about religion, whether natural or revealed. Such apprehension ought to turn men's eyes to every degree of new light which may be had, from whatever side it comes, and induce them to refrain, in the mean time, from all immoralities, and live in the conscientious practice of every common virtue. Especially are they bound to keep at the greatest distance from all dissolute profaneness; for this the very nature of the case forbids; and to treat with highest reverence a matter upon which their own whole interest and being and the fate of nature depends."

Doxology. An ascription of glory and praise to God. These Doxologies are frequent in the Old Testament, especially in the Psalms, and in the New Testament also. The Doxology closing the form of the LORD's Prayer in St. Matt. (vi. 13) is held by many textualists to be interpolated from the Liturgies, and not to belong to its original delivery (cf. St. Luke xi. 4). St. Paul has several fervent Doxologies in his Epistles, e.g., Rom. xvi. 25-27; Eph. iii. 20, 21; Phil. iv. 20; 1 Timothy vi. 15, 16; so 1 St. Pet. iv. 11; v. 11. But the Revelation is replete with Doxologies both of creatures on earth and spirits in heaven. Rev. i. 5, 6;

iv. 11; v. 9, 12, 13; vii. 10, 12; xv. 3; xvi. 5, 7; xix. 1, 6. The Liturgical Doxologies in the American Prayer-Book are the Gloria Patri, the Gloria in Excelsis.

Dulia. A term used in Roman Theology to designate the reverence due to the Saints or to any worthy creature of GOD. But the root of the word doulos, and the verb douleuo, are used of servanthip, service, and worship of GOD. St. Paul calls himself the doulos of CHRIST. He speaks of serving (douleuo) the LORD. Dulia, is used of the slavery of corruption in Romans viii. 21. In no place is douleia used in a good sense in the New Testament, though its cognates doulos and douleuo, are. The interior meaning of the word is to serve as a servant bought with a price. Even if the theory of reverence to a creature were tenable, this term is most unhappily chosen, since no saint or angel has redeemed us. The doctrine itself savors of idolatry.

E.

Eagle. In Scripture, symbolic of GOD (Ex. xix. 4; Deut. xxxii. 11.); also the mysterious creatures seen in vision by Ezekiel and St. John. There these Living Creatures appear in fourfold form. In Ezekiel "they four." Apparently each of the four had the face of a man, the face of a lion on the right side, the face of an ox on the left side, and the face of an eagle. In St. John's vision the first Living Creature was like a lion, the second like a calf (ox), the third had a face as a man, and the fourth was like a flying eagle. The symbolism has been variously explained, and that upon which St. John's vision has been most generally received is that they are symbols of the four Gospels. The lion has been connected with St. Mark's Gospel, as setting forth our LORD as the Lion of the tribe of Judah; the ox with St. Luke's Gospel, as setting forth our LORD's sacrificial and intercessory acts; the man with St. Matthew, as setting forth our LORD as the MESSIAH, the man acquainted with sorrows; the eagle with St. John, as setting forth the Divinity of our LORD in His Incarnation. It is often used as a symbol placed beside the figure of St. John to distinguish him from the other Evangelists, since he has been permitted to soar upward into the Divine Presence as the eagle mounts upward to the sun.

The eagle has been used as a lectern to support the Bible in the Church, and has been made a very effective part of the Church furniture.

Easter. A Saxon word, Eostre, a heathen goddess whose festival fell in the spring. But the Feast of the Resurrection falling at the spring-tide, the name was transferred to the Christian feast. (Vide FESTIVALS and FEASTS.) The Church, as soon as the repression caused by persecution permitted her, celebrated this feast with peculiar rejoicings; not only the day itself, but the week following was kept with great pomp. In the Saxon Church it was a festal week. It was called the Queen of Festivals, the Royal Day of Days. It was the day of Light, and in the Eastern Churches from the midnight of Easter-eve till day the churches have ever been illuminated as brilliantly as possible, and the solemn services were celebrated with great magnificence. The catechumens who had just been baptized were admitted to their first Communion then. Every act that could testify to the glad reception of all that the Resurrection can mean was done. It is in truth the key, doctrinally, to our Faith; liturgically, to our worship; practically, to our life; and must be kept with a joyous heart by every Christian. The date of the feast, year by year, was a cause of great solicitude. For several centuries it was the privilege of the See of Alexandria to announce to the Christian world the right date of Easter-Sunday, till at last perfect tables enabled the other Churches to arrive at the same result; and, too, the schisms and quarrels of the Church interfered with and broke up the custom. But the festal epistles of several Patriarchs of Alexandria are of great value. The controversy upon the date which divided many of the Eastern Church from the West (vide QUARTODECIMAN) was an evidence of the importance placed upon it everywhere. (Upon the rule for finding Easter-day, vide CALCENDAR.)

It is one of the days upon which the Church requires all her members to commune. The Epistle and Gospel for Easter-day is apparently a change from the older English use (Col. iii. 1, and St. John xx. 1, for 1 Cor. v. 7, and St. Mark xvi. 1). But the Prayer-Book of 1549 A.D. ordered two celebrations, and gave two sets of Epistles and Gospels. In the revision of 1552 A.D. the older missal set was dropped and the later Epistle and Gospel kept. The Collect dates from 496 A.D.

Eastern Churches, The. No intelligent Christian can read the history of the Eastern Churches without emotion, or study their present condition and circumstances without the deepest interest. When we hear of the Church of Jerusalem, we remember that "out of Zion went forth the law and the word of God from Jerusalem," so that that Church may well be esteemed the mother of all Churches. We cannot forget that "the disciples were called Christians first in Antioch." What associations cling to the names of Bethlehem and Nazareth, Smyrna and Ephesus, Athens and Corinth, Nicæa and Chalcedon, Alexandria, renowned for its learning, Constantinople, the imperial city! To Eastern Christians, with scarce an exception, were addressed the Epistles of the New Testament, for them principally, we may say, were the Gospels written, and in a large part of Eastern Christendom the Gospels and Epistles are still read and understood—so little has this language changed—in the inspired original. "The humblest peasant," says Stanley,* "who reads his . . . Greek Testament in his own mother-tongue on the hills of Boeotia, may proudly feel that he has an access to the original oracles of Divine truth which Pope and Cardinal reach by a barbarous and imperfect translation."

The Eastern Churches, properly so called, are divisible into two groups: (1) the Orthodox Churches; (2) the Armenian, the Syrian,† the Coptic, and the Assyrian. Beside these, there are a number of Eastern Christians who, retaining in part, at least, their ancient rites, have come under the dominion of the Church of Rome. Not only are their ecclesiastical relations with the West, but seven-eighths of them live in the West, in Austro-Hungary.

Let us consider first of the Orthodox Churches. The Holy Orthodox Eastern Churches are commonly designated, when taken collectively, as "The Eastern Church," "The Oriental Church," "The Greek Church." They not only outnumber the second group ten to one, but they are the truest representatives of the Church as first planted in those lands. Their special claim to the title Orthodox is from this, that they have carefully held to the doctrines set forth in the undisputed General Councils, whilst the other Eastern Churches have refused, as we shall see farther on, to accept the decrees of, however it may be as to the doctrines asserted in, the Councils which have been throughout the Church accepted as œcumenical. One can hardly speak of an Eastern or Western Church as existing as such before the founding of Constantinople, and the division of the Roman Empire into Eastern and Western, which soon followed thereupon. Whilst the Gospel was soon carried into all lands, it would seem to have met with a more speedy reception in those lands where it was first proclaimed. And, as Milman well says, "For some considerable (it cannot but be an indefinable) part of the first three centuries the Church of Rome, and most, if not all, the Churches of the West, were, if we may so speak, Greek religious colonies. Their language was Greek, their organization Greek, their writers Greek, their Scriptures Greek, and many vestiges and traditions show that their ritual, their Liturgy, was Greek. . . . So, too, was it in Gaul: there the first Christians were settled, chiefly in the Greek cities which owned Marseilles as their parent, and which retained the use of Greek as their vernacular tongue."‡ The chief theological writers of the first Christian centuries were Easterns, or men of Eastern training. The earliest writer of Latin theological literature dates from the close of the second century. In the words of Dr. von Döllinger, "The Eastern portion of the Church for a long time enjoyed a complete intellectual supremacy; the Western had to learn from their Greek co-religionists, and to receive from them their ecclesiastical and theological education. All Latin theological literature before St. Augustine is, in substance, the application or imitation of Greek models."§ And the present Bishop of Lincoln calls attention to a catalogue of ecclesiastical authors, drawn up by St. Jerome in 392 A.D., in these words: "The catalogue (containing one hundred and thirty-five names) begins with St. Peter, and it is remarkable as a proof of the lack of theological learning at Rome, that Jerome, who had been a secretary of a Pope, and had the best opportunity in this respect, could only enumerate four other Bishops of Rome—Clemens, Victor, Cornelius, and Damasus—in this long list of ecclesiastical writers."||

Ages of persecution were not times for perfected organization. We find, however, the 6th Canon of the Council of Nicæa beginning with the words, "Let the ancient customs prevail," and then going on to direct that the metropolitical authority which the Bishops of Alexandria and of Antioch had exercised through long custom over the respectively neighboring Bishops should be continued to them by law. And the 7th Canon of the same Council directs that the honors which usage and ancient tradition had accorded to the Bishop of Jerusalem, then called Ælia, should still be preserved to it.

It was but natural that the Imperial City, Constantinople, should have ecclesiastical as well as political pre-eminence, and in the 3d Canon of the first General Council held in that city, it was decreed that the Bishop of Constantinople should take precedence next after the Bishop of Rome, because Constantinople was near Rome." This precedence seems at first to have been chiefly honorary. But the 29th Canon of the Council of Chalcedon confirmed and extended the privileges of Constantinople, and made that See second, and scarcely second, to Rome in honor and in authority. At Chalcedon, also, the Bishop of Jerusalem acquired for his See patriarchal privileges, having previously held a position of marked honor, and with little authority.

† The Syrian is often called the Jacobite Church, and the Assyrian the Nestorian Church. The "Christians of St. Thomas," in India, are a dependency of the Syrian Church, and the Abyssinian bears a title relative to the Coptic.

In the early part of the seventh century Antioch, Jerusalem, and Alexandria fell under the power of the Moslem. The Churches in Patriarchates of which these were the Sees were wellnigh crushed, the Christians were subject to men of another race and of alien faith, who oft made them feel the insolence of their conquerors. Constantinople had, as we have seen, a pre-eminence; it now became the only great Christian city of the East. The title of Œcumenical Patriarch, given at times in early days to the Bishop of the Imperial City, seemed not to ill befit one of so unrivaled influence in the Eastern Church, and ere long came to be recognized as his proper title.

From time to time difficulties and misunderstandings arose between the Eastern and the Western Churches, but the temporary divisions which thence occurred, "however much they diminished the glory of the Church, did not altogether destroy the principle of Christian charity. It was still universally held that the Church formed but one spiritual fraternity, that all Christians were members of the same body, and that it was their duty to hold communion with each other. When divisions arose, excommunication consisted generally in a simple withdrawal of communion. . . . These withdrawals of communion were intended to procure the reformation of the offending party, and the divided Churches . . . sincerely endeavored to be reunited to their brethren in CHRIST.*"

At length the time came when there was to be a lasting separation. In regard to this lamentable division there was fault on both sides. Nevertheless, to use the words of Dr. von Döllinger, "No one acquainted with history can doubt that by far the greater share of the blame rests with the West. An imperious despotism, attended by the fear that the sight of the free Eastern Church might produce an unfavorable feeling towards the Papal monarchy in the West, an evil ignorance of Papal antiquity, and especially of Greek tradition and ecclesiastical literature, on the part of the Westerns, these were the real causes of the schism."† The separation, which some have dated from the time of Photius, in 880 A.D., and others from that of Cerularius, in 1054 A.D., each of these being Patriarchs of Constantinople, was not consummated until the taking of the Imperial City by the Latins in 1204 A.D., and then, "above all, by the part which Innocent III. took throughout by supporting the acts of violence"‡ connected with the taking of Constantinople, "with the whole weight of his authority and power, and openly forwarding the subjugation and Latinization of the Eastern Church," setting Latin Bishops over Greek Sees, and so declaring the Eastern in a state of heresy and schism. Attempts were made at Lyons in 1274 A.D., and at Florence in 1438 A.D., to bring about a reunion. But the Popes demanded an admission of their autocratic power, which the Easterns would not give, and so the negotiations were fruitless.

At the time of the separation of the Eastern and the Western Churches there is reason to think that, in number of Bishops and of the faithful, East and West were as nearly as might be on an equality. Palmer, in his "Treatise on the Church of Christ,"§ gives the data for believing there were in each about one thousand and twenty Bishops. A large part of the Patriarchate of Constantinople having already fallen under the power of the Turk, that city itself was taken by them in 1453 A.D. But while the ancient seats of the Eastern Church were fallen into the hands of the infidel, a hardy race of the north received the seeds of Christian enlightenment from the East. There is a tradition that St. Andrew preached the Gospel within the bounds of what is now called Russia. But it is about the middle of the ninth century before we have historic mention of Christianity in connection with Russia,—and shortly before the year 1000 A.D., that Russia, largely through the influence of Vladimir, its first Christian prince, adopted the religion of CHRIST.

The Holy Orthodox Church of the East is made up at this time of ten independent Churches, in full communion with each other, and fully agreeing as to doctrine, while varying to some extent in discipline. These Churches, including in all about 80,000,000 of the faithful, are the Churches in the Patriarchates of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, the Church of Russia, of Cyprus, the Orthodox Church of Austro-Hungary, the Church of Montenegro, of Greece, and of Servia. Roumania having been set free from Turkey at the same time with Servia, its Church claims a like independence with that of the Servian Church from the Patriarch of Constantinople, but this claim has not yet been allowed. The Bulgarian Church also claims an autonomy, which has not yet been conceded. There seems to be a difference of opinion among the Eastern Churches as regards the claims of these two Churches, which the Patriarch of Constantinople accounts as still subject to his jurisdiction. It is to be hoped that a satisfactory arrangement may soon be arrived at.

Let us take a survey of these various autonomous Churches in their order.

1. The Patriarchate of Constantinople.—"The Most Holy Archbishop of Constantinople, New Rome, and Œcumenical Patriarch," Joachim III., has under his jurisdiction in Turkey in Europe, and part of Turkey in Asia, including the Roumanian Church and the Bulgarians, about 11,500,000 of the faithful; seventy Metropolitans, two Archbishops, and twenty-five Bishops in active service, six Metropolitans and eight Bishops who have retired from active duty, and seventeen other Bishops without Sees, but for the most part engaged in assisting other Bishops. In all one hundred and twenty-eight Bishops, of various degree, own him as their ecclesiastical superior. It should be said here that, throughout the East, the titles of Metropolitan and Archbishop are, for the most part, honorary distinctions. In many cases, when the titles were first bestowed, they were most fitting. The Metropolitan of Ephesus, for instance, had once nearly as many suffragans as there are days in the year, now he has but four. It does not seem unreasonable that the title held of old should be continued to the present occupant of so venerable a See.

The Patriarch of Constantinople has a precedence among his brother Patriarchs, but claims no authority over them. As the chief representative of the Greeks in Turkey, he has a position which often exposes him to great annoyance, and not seldom to real danger. Faithfulness in the discharge of his duties has frequently led to his removal from office, by the more or less direct influence of the Turkish government. Cyril Lucar, two hundred and fifty years ago, was four times removed from his office as Patriarch, and when Patriarch the fifth time was basely murdered. Nor are such vicissitudes things quite of the past. Within a very few years there were living at one time five ex-Patriarchs of Constantinople. And no longer ago than 1821 A.D., the Patriarch Gregory, over fourscore years of age, with three of his Bishops and eight Priests, were hung on Easter-day, by the Grand Vizier's order, at the door of the church in which they had just been celebrating the Paschal Feast. The present Patriarch is in the prime of life, and a man of zeal and enlightenment.

2. The Patriarchate of Alexandria.—The early Patriarchs of Alexandria held a position not only of great dignity, but of authority and influence equally great. But Sophronius, "the Most Holy Pope and Patriarch of the Great City Alexandria, Libya, Pentapolis, and Ethiopia, and of all the land of Egypt; Father of Fathers, Pastor of Pastors, Archpriest of Archpriests, Thirteenth Apostle, and Universal Judge," has under him at this time but one Bishop in active service, and 5000 of the faithful. When the Saracens took Alexandria, in 641 A.D., the Greeks in Egypt for the most part lost their lives or left the country. The native Egyptians of the ancient race, who met with fitful favor from the conqueror, had previously become, as their descendants still remain, members of what is known as the Coptic Church, of which a brief account is given below.

3. The Patriarchate of Antioch.—"The Most Blessed and Holy Patriarch of the Divine City Antioch, Syria, Arabia, Cilicia, Ileria, Mesopotamia, and all the East; Father of Fathers and Pastor of Pastors," Hierotheus, resides chiefly in Damascus, the principal city in this Patriarchate. The Christians owning his authority number about 100,000. He has under him eleven Metropolitans and three Bishops, the latter having no Sees. When, in 658 A.D., Antioch was captured by the Saracens, the throne of the successors of Alexander, the seat of the Roman government in the East, which had been decorated by Cæsar with the title of free, and holy, and inviolate, was degraded under the yoke of the Caliph to the secondary rank of a principal town.* The Crusaders, who held Antioch for many years, were scarcely less inimical to Eastern Christians than were the Saracens. Taken from the Latins, in 1268 A.D., by the Sultan of Egypt, its inhabitants were put to the sword or sent into captivity; and for hundreds of years, indeed, until the beginning of this century, believers in CHRIST were almost absolutely excluded from the place where the disciples were first called Christians. The few Orthodox Christians there, until very recently, had no proper church, but worshiped in a grotto in the mountain-side.

4. The Patriarchate of Jerusalem.—"The Most Blessed and Holy Patriarch of the Holy City Jerusalem, and all Palestine, Syria, Arabia beyond Jordan, Cana of Galilee, and Holy Sion," has under him five Metropolitans, four Archbishops, and about 20,000 of the faithful. After a vacancy of more than a year, Nicodemus, Archbishop of Mount Tabor, has just been chosen Patriarch, but when these pages went to press had not entered upon his high office.

Until the destruction of Jerusalem, it was regarded not only as the metropolis of Palestine, but in one sense of the whole Christian world. On its overthrow, Casarea, the civil metropolis of Palestine, became the seat of the Metropolitan, though, from the remembrance of what Jerusalem had been, its Bishops ranked next after the Metropolitan among the Bishops of the province. Jerusalem attaining a degree of prosperity under Constantine and his successors, its Bishop acquired in the fifth century, as has been already mentioned, the Patriarchal dignity. From Persian, Saracen, Crusader, and Turk Jerusalem suffered like vicissitudes with Antioch. An object of deepest interest to all Christians, it has not seldom given occasion to strifes, civil and ecclesiastical.

* Gibbon, Decline and Fall, II.

"O pray for the peace of Jerusalem!"

5. The Church of Russia.—We now come from the consideration of ancient Patriarchates, depressed by long ages of subjection to the infidel, to study a daughter Church, the Church of a vast empire, by far the largest of National Churches; numbering among its members about 64,000,000, or more than three-fourths of Eastern Christendom, and among its prelates three Metropolitans, fourteen Archbishops, thirty-six Diocesan Bishops, twenty-eight Vicars, or Assistant Bishops in active service.

If, as tradition states, St. Andrew first preached the Gospel within the bounds of the Russian Empire, little, if any, visible fruit of his teachings remained when Queen Olga, about the middle of the tenth century, and her grandson, Vladimir, just before its close, embraced Christianity,—his conversion being followed by that of a large portion of his subjects. Vladimir asked that a Bishop might be sent from Constantinople to his capital city, Kieff, which for many years remained the ecclesiastical metropolis of Russia. Then Vladimir became the Metropolitan See, and in 1820 A.D. Moscow. Much of this time the Church of Russia was strictly dependent upon Constantinople. While Russia was overrun by the Tartars, and Constantinople retained its freedom, this arrangement had its advantages; but when the situation was reversed, and Russia was freed from the Tartars, while Constantinople was subjected to the Turks, the Russian Church became virtually self-governed. In 1583 A.D. a Patriarchate was established at Moscow. Ten Patriarchs in succession presided over the Church of Russia, the last of them dying in 1701 A.D. It is considered that the Russian Patriarchate is still in existence, though, for a number of years, it was in charge of one of the Bishops, and since 1721 A.D. it has been administered by the Holy Governing Synod. This Synod now consists of the Metropolitans of St. Petersburg, Kieff, and Moscow, the Exarch of Georgia, two or more other Bishops chosen for two years at a time, and two priests, one the chief chaplain of the Emperor, the other the chaplain general of the forces. The Ober-Procurator represents the lay element in the Church. In matters of practical administration he has an influential voice, but none at all in questions of doctrine.

Much has been done of late years to improve the position of the Russian clergy. Great attention is paid to their education, and for this purpose admirable institutions of learning are provided. A revised translation of the Bible has recently been published, by authority, and steps have been taken to have it widely circulated. No little interest has been manifested lately in missions among the heathen, both within the Empire, in Siberia, and without it, in Japan. The Russian Church is one in which there are manifest and abundant signs of life and influence.

6. The Church in Cyprus.—The story of the first planting of Christianity in Cyprus is no doubtful tradition, but is recorded by St. Luke in the Acts of the Apostles (ch. xi. 19-26; xiii. 4-13; xv. 36-41). Cyprus being reckoned from the time of Hadrian a part of the civil prefecture of the East, the Patriarch of Antioch claimed authority over the Church in that island. This claim was stoutly resisted, and the question being brought before the Council of Ephesus in 431 A.D., it was decided that the Church in Cyprus should retain the independent character it had had from the first. Cyprus has had its full share of trials from Saracen, Crusader, and Turk. It is now in the hands of the English. The Orthodox Christians of Cyprus number about 90,000. "The Most Blessed and Holy Archbishop of Nova-Justiniana, and all Cyprus," Sophronius, has under him three Bishops.

7. The Orthodox Church in Austria.—In Austro-Hungary there are about 3,500,000 members of the Orthodox Church, under three Metropolitans, entitled respectively "Metropolitan of all the Servians in the Austrian Empire," "Metropolitan of all the Roumanians in the Austrian Empire," "Metropolitan of the Buckovine and Dalmatia." There are also ten Bishops.

8. The Church in Montenegro.—"The Metropolitan of Scanderia and the seacoast, Archbishop of Tsetin, Exarch of the Holy Throne of Pek, Vladika of Montenegro and Berda," Bessarion Lubitch, is the only Bishop in Montenegro, that brave little country which has for so many years withstood the Turk. Until about thirty years since, the Metropolitan of Montenegro was also its ruling prince. A second See has lately been set up in the territory recently regained from Turkey. But it appears that the new Diocese has at present no Bishop of its own. The inhabitants of Montenegro, with hardly an exception members of the Orthodox Church, number about 300,000.

9. The Church in the Greek Kingdom.—When Greece became independent of Turkey, the Church of Greece, which had hitherto been a dependency of Constantinople, naturally desired to be self-governed, and there were many reasons why it was best this should be the case. The Patriarch of Constantinople was often placed in a false position towards them,—kindly disposed himself, but forced by the Turkish government into a position of antagonism. A National Synod was held at Nauplia in July, 1833 A.D., when it was declared, (1) "That the Eastern Orthodox and Apostolic Church of Greece, which spiritually owns no Head but the Head of the Christian Faith, JESUS CHRIST our LORD, is dependent on no external authority, while she preserves unshaken dogmatic unity with all the Eastern Orthodox Churches. . . . (2) A permanent Synod shall be established, consisting entirely of Archbishops and Bishops, appointed by the King, to be the highest ecclesiastical authority, after the model of the Russian Church." The Metropolitan of Athens is always the President of the Holy Synod. With scarcely an exception, the people of Greece, numbering something over 1,600,000, belong to the Orthodox Church.

10. The Servian Church.—When the Servians became Christians, they acknowledged a sort of primacy over them as belonging to the Patriarch of Constantinople, but as they aspired to civil freedom so also they sought for ecclesiastical autonomy,—each being attained in the fourteenth century, when Stephen Dushan took the title of "the Macedonian Czar" and Joannicius was chosen Patriarch of Servia. The Servian kingdom lasted but a short time, but the Patriarchate continued. In 1689 A.D. the Patriarch Arsenius took part with the emperor of Austria against the Ottoman power, and when the movement proved a failure, with about 200,000 of his people took refuge in Austria, where he was made Metropolitan of Carlovitz, retaining, as do his successors in the office, the title Patriarch of Servia. Since 1838 A.D. the Archbishop of Belgrade has been recognized as the head of the Servian Church. While Servia remained a dependency of Turkey, the Servian Church had a dependence, little more than nominal, upon Constantinople. Since Servia has become independent, the autonomy of its Church has been recognized. The Servian Church numbers about 1,600,000, under an Archbishop and four Bishops.

Beside the ten Churches which have a recognized position among the Orthodox Eastern Churches, there are two others, the Roumanian and the Bulgarian Churches. The Roumanian Church numbers about 4,500,000, under two Metropolitans and six Bishops. When Roumania was set free from Turkey, its Church naturally claimed to be independent. But this independence is not recognized at Constantinople. It seems probable that the differences between the Roumanian Church and the Patriarchate will soon be settled by a compromise. In regard to the Bulgarian Church, the difficulties and the antagonisms are greater. It is to be hoped, however, that some means of settling these differences also may soon be devised, since the interests of religion are suffering, and a Romish propaganda has taken advantage of a time of discord to make proselytes. As has been said, the Bulgarian Bishops are not recognized by the Patriarchs. They number in all 16, viz.: Exarch, 1; Metropolitan, 8; Bishops, 2; Vicar Bishops, 2; retired Bishops, 2.

To summarize the information given, according to the best authorities, the Orthodox Christians number:

1. In the Patriarchate of Constantinople:
Greeks, etc.	3,500,000
Bulgarian	3,500,000
Roumanian	4,500,000	11,500,000

DOCTRINE, DISCIPLINE, AND WORSHIP OF THE ORTHODOX EASTERN CHURCHES.—The Orthodox Eastern Churches and the Anglican alike recognize that "The only pure and all-sufficient source of the doctrine of Faith is the revealed word of God contained in the Holy Scriptures; that "Everything necessary to salvation is stated in the Holy Scriptures, with such clearness that every one reading them with a sincere desire to be enlightened can understand them;" that "Holy Scripture, being the word of God Himself, is the only supreme judge in controversies," so that "No Council whatever can set up an article of faith which cannot be proved from the Holy Scriptures."^{*}

The Eastern Orthodox Churches are not afraid of an appeal "to the Law and to the testimony." Philaret, in the work just quoted, says, "Every one has not only a right, but it is his bounden duty, to read the Holy Scriptures in a language which he understands, and edify himself thereby." And Methodius, Archbishop of Syros and Tenos, in a Pastoral Letter addressed to his people, in June, 1882 A.D., uses, with other like words, this language: "Lay hold upon this Book of Life, the Book of Light, the Book of the world's salvation. Study the Holy Gospel, meditate upon it day and night, regulate your lives by its holy teachings, and happy will you be."

The Anglican and the Eastern Orthodox Churches holding like views as to the supreme authority of Holy Scripture, and as to the principles of its interpretation, we are prepared to find that, as to matters of chief importance, they are in essential agreement, and that in other cases, where there seem to be differences, such differences may for the most part be shown to be rather in appearance than in reality. There is a seeming difference as to the number of the Sacraments. The Anglican Churches defining a Sacrament as "An outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace given unto us, ordained by

* These extracts are from "A Comparative Statement of Russo-Greek and Roman Catholic Doctrines," by Philaret, Metropolitan of Moscow; published in an English translation in Paper No. IV. of the Russo-Greek Committee. CHRIST Himself," acknowledge two Sacraments; the Eastern Orthodox Churches defining a Mystery (the word they use instead of our word Sacrament) as "A visible sign of invisible grace," sometimes say that "their number is indefinite, but that they are not all necessary to salvation. There are two Sacraments necessary to every man, namely, Baptism and the Holy Eucharist."* Sometimes to the two which they and we esteem the chief Mysteries they add five others, as coming next after these in importance, namely, Confirmation, Penitence, Ordination, Matrimony, and Prayer Oil. In regard to Prayer Oil, which is not to be confounded with the Extreme Unction of the Romish Church, administered only to the dying, the Easterns follow literally the injunction of the Apostle (St. James v. 14, 15), and anoint the sick for their recovery. To them we seem to be neglecting a plain command of God's Word. The Eastern Orthodox Churches have not attempted to define the mode of our LORD's Presence in the Holy Communion, believing it, in the words of a distinguished Metropolitan of the Russian Church, to be "A Mystery to be apprehended by faith, and not a matter to be speculated and dogmatized upon, or reasoned about." "All definitions, or pretended explanations," continues this learned divine, "such as the use of the word 'Transubstantiation,' are but attempts to penetrate the mystery, and in so far tend to overthrow the very nature of the Sacrament."† In the Eastern Churches the Holy Communion is always given in both kinds, according to our LORD's commandment. The Eastern Orthodox Churches believe neither in Purgatory nor in works of supererogation. In the words of Philaret of Moscow, "The condition of a man's soul after death is fixed by his internal state, and there is no such thing as Purgatory, in which souls have to pass through fiery torments in order to prepare them for blessedness." . . . "There is no need of any other kind of purification, when 'the blood of JESUS CHRIST cleanseth us from all sin.'" "Works of supererogation in the saints are impossible, as they themselves are only saved by grace."‡

It is well known that there has long been a difference between the Churches of the East and of the West in regard to what is commonly called the Nicene Creed. The Orthodox Eastern Churches have adhered to the original form of the Creed, while in the West, by steps which it is not always easy to trace, the words "and the Son" long since made their way into the Creed at the end of the clause, "And I believe in the HOLY GHOST, the LORD and Giver of Life, who proceedeth from the FATHER." From this addition to the Creed arose the "Filioque Controversy" (the added word in Latin being filioque). The Greeks were right in claiming that what had been established in a General Council should not be altered by any lesser authority, but they have often gone further than this, to find in the added words an heretical meaning. At the Conferences held at Bonn in 1874 and 1875 A.D., under the presidency of Dr. von Döllinger, between members of the Eastern Orthodox, the Anglican, and the Old Catholic Churches, it was freely admitted by all that "the addition of the Filioque to the Creed was not made in a canonical manner;" but after a full discussion, a statement as to the Procession of the HOLY GHOST was drawn up, in which the members of these three communions could cordially unite, showing that whilst it might be difficult, at this day, to restore the Nicene Creed in the West to its earlier form, so far as concerned Anglicans and Old Catholics, there was no doctrinal difference between them and the Eastern Orthodox.

We should find in no Orthodox Eastern Church sculptured representations of our LORD or of the saints, it being believed that such may have an ill influence. But sacred pictures abound in churches and in private houses, and much honor is paid to these icons, as they are called, as serving "to remind us of the works of God and of His servants, to the intent that we, by looking upon them, may be stirred up to the imitation of holiness." Perhaps, at times, among the more ignorant, the honor paid to the icons goes beyond what the Church would approve, and has a character of superstition.

A clergyman of the American Church conversing with a learned Russian priest, expressed the objection that we should have to the manner in which the Virgin and other saints are addressed in hymns and prayers. The reply was that, "to understand these properly, we should interpret them in the Oriental sense, regarding them as poetical apostrophe and pious ejaculations, in accordance with the fervid imagination which characterizes the Orientals, rather than as set prayers, in the literal matter-of-fact way of people of the West." "Translated into English," he went on to say, "and taken in the sense in which you use such language, I should object to many expressions no less than you do; but to understand us as using these expressions in your sense is quite to misunderstand us."§ There is much force in this answer. We would ourselves wish to be judged, not by the meaning that might be given to our words, but by our intent in using them. The language of many of the prayers we use, expressing the deepest emotions of our hearts, would doubtless seem very cold to an Oriental.

The Orthodox Eastern Churches wish to offer to God a reasonable service, and so the Liturgy is celebrated in not less than ten different languages. In Greece and Russia more ancient forms of the language than that in common use are employed in Divine service, but the difference between ancient and modern Greek, between Slavonic, or old Russian, and modern Russian, is less than is often imagined. We are thankful not to have too modern English in our Bibles and Prayer-Books.

So far as the Eastern Churches from enforcing clerical celibacy that parish Priests among them must be married men.

The Armenian, the Syrian, the Coptic, and the Assyrian Churches.—Besides the Orthodox Eastern Churches, there are in the East several other Churches, occupying an abnormal position. They have been accounted heretical in regard to so important a matter as the Incarnation of Our Blessed LORD. The first three of these Churches reject the Council of Chalcedon, in which was condemned the error of those who confounded in CHRIST's Person those natures which they should have distinguished. The Assyrian Church has refused to accept the Council of Ephesus, condemning the error of dividing CHRIST into two persons. But although these Churches have erred in not acknowledging Councils owned as General by the Church Catholic, it is not certain that in the case of any one of them is there a real departure from the Faith as set forth in those Councils.

In regard to all of them we need fuller and more definite information than we have. In the brief sketches of these Churches which follow, the facts are given according to those statements which seem best authenticated.

The Armenian Church is the largest and most important of these Churches at this time. When the Council of Chalcedon met, in 451 A.D., the Armenians, being at war with the Persians and hard pressed by them, were not represented at the Council. The reports of what was done at Chalcedon were either erroneous in themselves, or were misunderstood by them, and so the Armenian Church denounced the Council of Chalcedon, while, as there is good reason for saying, holding substantially the Faith as there established. Time and again has it seemed that the division between the Eastern Orthodox and the Armenians was on the point of being healed, but political or race feeling has thus far always prevented. A well-informed theologian of the Russian Church states that "it is quite certain that the Armenian Church separated from the Church Catholic, in the fifth century, in consequence of a misunderstanding, and that it is quite orthodox in the Faith. . . . If a union is possible between any two Churches, it is between the Eastern Orthodox and the Armenian, since they are only kept apart by external circumstances."*

The Armenian Church numbers at this time about 4,000,000, and is presided over by a Catholicos, or Supreme Patriarch, at Etchmiadzin, at the foot of Mount Ararat; three Patriarchs, at Constantinople, Sis, and Jerusalem; twelve Archbishops, and thirty-two Bishops. About forty Sees are vacant, and in charge of Vicars.

The Syrian, commonly called the Jacobite Church, after the name of Jacobus Baradæus, an early leader among them, would seem, like the Armenian Church, to have at once rejected the Council of Chalcedon and to have held fast to its teachings. There is much in regard to the history of this Church which is not clear, but its authorities disavow at present, and in behalf also of their predecessors, erroneous doctrines which, as they say, have been falsely ascribed to them. The parent body of the Syrian Church numbers at this time about 125,000 souls, under the care of a Patriarch residing at the convent of Der Zafran, near Mardin, in Mesopotamia, and eleven Metrans, or Metropolitans.

In India a branch of this Syrian Church exists, numbering about 120,000, with one Metran. These Syrians of India are often called "The Christians of St. Thomas," they having a tradition that their ancestors were converted to the faith by the preaching of the Apostle St. Thomas. For many years they formed part of the Assyrian (or "Nestorian") Church, of which we shall speak presently. At the close of the sixteenth century the Portuguese made efforts, by force and guile, to bring them into communion with Rome. After nearly one hundred years of subjection, a large part of them threw off the Roman yoke, and, obtaining a Bishop from the Syrian Church, considered themselves henceforth as forming part of it.

The Coptic Church of Egypt is in full agreement and communion with the Syrian Church. Dioscorus, Patriarch of Alexandria, was, as his people thought, unjustly condemned at Chalcedon. They took sides with him, and henceforth the Copts, the descendants of the ancient inhabitants of Egypt, have been in a state of formal separation from the Church Catholic. The few members of the Orthodox Church in Egypt have been almost entirely of the Greek race. An "Association for the Furtherance of Christianity in Egypt" has recently been formed in England, one of whose chief aims is to promote education among the Copts. It is believed by many who have given the matter attention that, whatever may have been their case in the past, the Copts at the present day are not averse to the true Faith. The Coptic Church has a Patriarch, three Metropolitans, and ten Bishops at this time, and numbers about 200,000.

The Abyssinian Church is part of the Coptic. It numbers not less, it is believed, than 1,500,000, and has at present an Archbishop and two Bishops.

The Assyrian, often called the Nestorian Church, was in early days distinguished for its missionary zeal. In the eloquent words of Gibbon, "From the conquest of Persia they carried their spiritual arms to the north, the east, and the south. In the sixth century . . . Christianity was successfully preached to the Bactrians, the Huns, the Persians, the Indians, the Pers-Armenians, the Medes, and the Elamites; the barbaric Churches from the Gulf of Persia to the Caspian Sea were almost infinite. . . . The pepper coast of Malabar, and the isles of the sea, Socotra and Ceylon, were peopled with an increasing number of Christians. . . . In a subsequent age, the zeal of the Nestorians overleaped the limits which confined the ambition and curiosity both of the Greeks and Persians. . . . In their progress by sea and land, the Nestorians entered China by the port of Canton, and the northern residence of Sigan. . . . Under the reign of the Caliphs, the Nestorian Church was diffused from China to Jerusalem and Cyprus, and their numbers, with those of the Jacobites, were computed to surpass the Greek and Latin communities."^{*} The Assyrian Church now is reduced to little, if any, over 75,000, under a Patriarch at Kochanes, in Kurdistan, and twelve Metropolitans.

In regard to the orthodoxy of the Assyrian Church, these words of the learned Bishop of Maryland, Bishop Whittingham, are most weighty: "Since there is reason to doubt whether the doctrine condemned by the Council of Ephesus, and, in consequence, by the whole Church throughout the world, was held by Nestorius; since it is certain that it is not now held by the Churches known as Nestorian; . . . since the Churches called Nestorian have constantly denied that they held the error they have been called on to forsake; since they profess their faith in the Catholic Creed, conformably with that of the Catholic Church, they are not lightly to be rejected from the number of the Churches of CHRIST, but rather to be regarded as brethren long alienated, not without some fault on both sides."[†]

Romanized, or so-called "United" Eastern Christians. Of these there are about 4,000,000 of the Greek Rite, chiefly in Austria, 120,000 of the Armenian Rite, 15,000 of the Syrian Rite in Turkey, and 120,000 in India, about 5000 of the Coptic Rite, 20,000 of the Chaldean Rite, and about 150,000 Maronites. These, while they have been allowed to keep many of their ancient ways, are members of the Church of Rome, and do not constitute, in any real sense, "Eastern Churches."

REV. C. R. HALE, S.T.D.

Easton, Diocese of. The Diocese of Easton comprises that portion of the State of Maryland, known as the "Eastern Shore," lying east of the Chesapeake Bay and the Susquehanna River; it is composed of the counties of Cecil, Kent, Queen Anne, Talbot, Caroline, Dorchester, Wicomico, Somerset, and Worcester. The Diocese of Maryland, of which Easton was originally a part, is the oldest Diocese but one in the American Church. Connecticut was organized in April, 1783 A.D., and Maryland in August of the same year. The history of the Church in Maryland, however, goes back to a much earlier date than that. It was in the year 1629 A.D. that a colony of about one hundred persons, composed of members of the Church of England, made a settlement on Kent Island. We learn from the scant records of that settlement that provision was made for the maintenance of religious services, and we know that a clergyman of the Church of England officiated on Kent Island for some years prior to 1637 A.D. Our space forbids us to enter into the early history of the Church in Maryland, so we will pass at once to the history of the Diocese of Easton. Soon after his consecration Bishop Whittingham declared that "The time would soon come when the interests of the Church would be furthered by a division of the Diocese." He had always been an advocate of small Dioceses, and while a Presbyter in the Diocese of New York had published an article in defense of his views upon that subject, which had great weight in causing the first division of the Diocese of New York, and which has since done good service in promoting the same good work in other Dioceses. Though the Bishop gave expression to his views so soon after his consecration, they do not seem to have had any effect until the year 1867 A.D. At the Diocesan Convention of that year a memorial was presented, asking "for the erection of the Eastern Shore into a separate and distinct Diocese." The memorial was referred to a committee, who recommended that the request be granted. Acting upon this recommendation, the Convention voted to grant the request, the Bishop gave his consent, and there the matter rested until the General Convention of 1868 A.D., when that body ratified the action of the Diocese of Maryland. The Bishop of Maryland called a Convention of the clergy and laity of the Eastern Shore to meet in Christ Church, Easton, on Thursday, the 19th day of November, 1868 A.D., "then and there to assemble and organize as a new Diocese."

The Convention met on the day appointed. The opening sermon was preached by the Rev. John O. Barton. The Rev. John Crosdale was elected President, and the Rev. James L. Bryan, M.D., Secretary. Twenty-one clergymen and twenty-eight lay delegates, representing thirty-two incorporated parishes and congregations, were found to be present. "Easton" was the name given to the new Diocese, and the assent of the Bishop and Standing Committee of Maryland to this name was announced. After the transaction of certain routine business, the Convention proceeded to the election of a Bishop, and the Rt. Rev. Henry C. Lay, D.D., LL.D., Missionary Bishop of Arkansas and the Indian Territory, was chosen. The Rev. Henry M. Mason, D.D., who had taken an active interest in the division of the Diocese, had entered into rest before this meeting, and the Convention adopted resolutions of regret at his decease. The Constitution of the Diocese of Maryland was so amended as to adapt it to the use of the new Diocese, and resolutions respecting the separation from the Bishop and Diocese of Maryland were adopted and ordered to be spread upon the journal. The Episcopal fund was reported as pledged or paid to the amount of $41,845, and the Bishop's salary was fixed at $2500 per annum. After the transaction of some other business, Christ Church, Easton, was chosen as the place of meeting for the next Convention, and 26th of May, 1869 A.D., appointed as the time. Upon the day appointed the clergy and laity assembled, but owing to the absence of the Bishop and the Standing Committee, in accordance with an informal arrangement previously made, the Convention adjourned until the 9th of the following June. The Convention met pursuant to this adjournment. The opening sermon was preached by the Bishop. Sixteen clergymen and twenty-four lay delegates were in attendance. The Bishop in his address gave a detailed account of his Episcopal labors from the 1st of April, when he surrendered his missionary jurisdiction of Arkansas. The address closed with specific recommendations under the following heads: "Review of the Diocese," "The Diocese of Maryland," "The Diocese Convention," "Convocations," "Church Work in the Future," and "Specific Recommendations." Under the latter head the Bishop urged the attempt to sustain missionaries in every county, and the appropriation of offerings at Episcopal visitations to Diocesan missions. The Diocese was divided into three Convocations: the northern, comprising the counties of Cecil and Kent, containing seven clergymen; the middle, comprising Queen Anne, Caroline, Talbot, and Dorchester, containing thirteen clergymen; and the southern, comprising Wicomico, Somerset, and Worcester, with seven clergymen. These Convocations were made the subordinate missionary organization of the Diocese, and were to be composed of the rectors and assistant ministers of the counties contained in the Convocation, with two lay delegates from each parish. They were to meet at least three times a year. And at each meeting there was to be a mission service, and an offering made for Diocesan missions.

Having traced the history of the Diocese from the preliminary steps taken towards its separation from the old Diocese to its organization, we have but little else to add. It has gone on quietly doing its appointed work, and those who have been identified with it from the beginning are satisfied with its quiet and steady progress, and feel that they have reason to thank God and take courage. If our space permitted, we would like to speak more in detail of the men who, under God, were the means of securing for us a separate Diocesan organization. Of John Crosdale, the faithful priest and missionary, who spent his entire ministry in an obscure country parish in order to strengthen the things that remained and that were ready to die; of the faithful rector of St. Michael's Parish, who canvassed the Diocese and raised the Episcopal fund, and of others whose labors in the same good cause were none the less zealous or effective. But we can only say of them all that they did their work well; some of them still survive to see the good results of their labors, and the names of those who have fallen asleep will be held in everlasting remembrance. In conclusion, it may be said that, in spite of the declaration made in certain quarters that the Diocese of Easton is a failure, those who are familiar with her affairs are quite satisfied with the result of division, and see no reason for discouragement. While the growth of the Diocese has not been startling, it has been real, and the following statement by the Bishop of what has been accomplished during the first twelve years of her existence, while it proves that the growth of the Diocese has been steady and marked, will serve as a sufficient answer to the statements of those who, from an insufficient knowledge of the facts in the case, were led to take a different view of the matter:

"The nine counties on the Eastern Shore of Maryland were made a Diocese by reason of a geographical necessity. As a matter of fact and experience, it had proved impossible for the Bishop of Maryland, with the superior claims of the Western Shore, and the intervention of Chesapeake Bay, to render the necessary offices to the less significant region. It does not at all follow that the like course should be pursued where there is no like necessity, and where nobody is neglected in the Episcopal ministrations.

"Furthermore, I suppose that none of our people anticipated that our Diocese would be a splendid example to others. It is peninsular, no tide of travel or emigration flowing through. It has no cities, no towns of more than 3000 inhabitants. It has no extensive manufactures, no foreign trade. In a word, it is emphatically a rural Diocese, made up of farms of moderate extent and of the villages necessary to supply the local trade. As for population, it has 157,000, which is less (according to late estimates) than that of the one city of Washington in the old Diocese from which it was taken.

"Reasonable people must see that we cannot vie with Dioceses of large numbers and resources, having the centralized wealth of a city to sustain Diocesan institutions. . . .

"So far as we ourselves are concerned, we are not at all discomposd, and would not care to make reply. But inasmuch as our example is imported into the general question, it seems right to demur to this disparagement. It has occurred to me that the fairest test of success or failure would be to take the roll of the parishes as I found it at the first Convention over which I presided (viz., that of 1869 A.D.), and to state in each instance the gain or loss, if any, in those particulars which can be computed and measured. I freely grant that success and failure in the highest and truest sense cannot be thus computed. Yet a certain significance attaches to the outward manifestations of zeal and enterprise. Let us, then, go over in order the list of the parishes. I omit none,—not even those which exist only on paper. What are the changes within the last twelve years?

"1. St. John's, Caroline.—A new church builded at Greensboro', and rectory improved. Increase, $3000.

REV. J. WORRAL LARMOUR.

Ecclesiastes. One of the books written by Solomon. It contains many difficulties which have proved to be a great puzzle to commentators. So much so that though its inspiration and Canonical authority have been admitted, yet it has been denied that it was written by Solomon. The internal difficulties are confessedly very great; but objections can readily be mustered against any theory of interpretation, so that it may very well have been the genuine work of Solomon the Preacher, the Son of David, king in Jerusalem. It has been alleged that the Aramaisms (words and phrases from one of the dialects of Babylonia) number one hundred, and show a late date,—later by four hundred years and more than Solomon's time,—probably after the return from the Babylonian exile. The reply reduces the number of Aramaisms to eight, and denies that they and the style are out of harmony with Solomon's reign, for the Hebrew was a singularly poor language, and was better fitted for sententious, pithy aphorisms than for any diffuse discourse. It is alleged that the tone is not such as Solomon could have felt, but so far from that, it is directly in the line of thought a man who had a large share of insight and keenness would feel after having blunted his spiritual perceptions and then have repented. The first tender devoutness is lost, the trustful innocence has disappeared, and the conclusion is that of a man who, having tried everything in his reach of human joys and earthly excesses, at last finds the sum of the whole matter to be, Fear God and keep His commandments. It is, however, a result in words identical with, but in tone dissimilar to, the trustful, "The Fear of God is the beginning of wisdom, a good understanding have they that do thereafter, the praise of it endureth forever." It is a shock to our ideas of truthfulness to suppose that a book written under the name of Solomon, by a later writer, could be admitted into the Canon without a comment or note explanatory of it. It might be defended in ordinary literary work, but it is absolutely opposed to any right conception of the fact that the Canon of Scripture was formed by men, but by the defending and guiding influence of the HOLY GHOST.

The truest appreciation of the book is found in considering it the Confessions, in a kind of mental debate, of one who, having had wisdom for spiritual things given him, debased it to searching the depths of earthly happiness; and is in accord with what one in Solomon's position—having wealth, yet corruptions in the state and society destroying his pleasure; having royal power, yet seeing it thwarted; enjoying life keenly, yet having its cup dashed from his lips—would acknowledge to be the sum of his experience. In fact, the objections are more ingenious and plausible than really sound; since we know that conclusions drawn from internal evidence not buttressed by external facts are very treacherous, as they are based upon arbitrary assumptions that may be wholly out of accord with the real contents of the book. The Salomonic authorship may be considered as established.

Ecclesiasticus. A book of the Apocrypha, written by Jesus, the son of Sirach, 190–170 B.C., and translated from the Hebrew by his grandson (130 B.C.). The book was composed at Jerusalem, and was translated in Egypt. It is based upon and imitates the Proverbs, and was evidently the work of a very devout and earnest student of the Scriptures. It is well worth reading and study, since it is full of practical wisdom. It was considered Canonical by a few writers, and was quoted by them freely,—Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Cyprian. It is quoted by Augustine and Jerome, but as useful, excellent, but not in the Canon.

Economist. An officer in some Irish Cathedrals, who is appointed to manage the common Cathedral fund, to see to necessary repairs, to pay Church officers, etc.

Economy. The management of a household by a steward, but used to mean a dispensation, as the Christian Economy administered by the Son of God. It was so used by the Apostle St. Paul (Eph. i. 10): "That in the dispensation of the fullness of times he might gather together in one all things in CHRIST." It also was used to signify the Apostolic office: "I have intrusted to me a dispensation" (as a steward) (1 Cor. ix. 17). "For His body's sake, which is the Church whereof I am made a minister, according to the dispensation of God" (Col. i. 25). But the Fathers generally keep it to refer to the administration of redemption by the Son of God. St. Athanasius speaks of the Economy of the Cross, of His blood-shedding, of His human nature. St. Basil of the Economy of our God and SAVIOUR in man's behalf, which is the calling from falling and the restoration to the household of God. So, too, Gregory Nazianzen: "But when we speak of God as saving, avenging, justifying, as the God of peace, of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob, or of all Israel, as spiritual and seeing God, these phrases are used of the Economy." Such a term could also readily fall into Gnostic phraseology very readily, and was so misused. But there was another use of the word too. It was used to express the plan by which the Catechist limited (or was limited by the Church) the amount of instruction which would be intrusted to the catechumens. They were intrusted "according to the stewardship," with varying degrees of knowledge in Christian doctrine. It lost this sense with the disappearance of the catechetical classes. It has been very seriously debated how far this concealment was carried, and whether the catechumens were purposely misled or had unfairly withheld from them the proportion of the Faith. To us now it is by no means so important, still, in a lesser degree, it is a very important question how far a teacher, having to attract those ignorant of Church doctrine to receive it, should ignore differences, and dwell upon the agreements and harmonies of the truths held in common. So Clement of Alexandria dwells upon the apparent agreement of Platonic philosophy with Christian truth. St. Paul's speeches at Lystra and at Athens give the fundamental rule to be followed. What we need is a deeper study of irenics, not of polemics; there has been too much of that.

The word Economy has returned into use, latterly, in its older theological sense.

Edification. A building up; a growth in grace, in love, in faith, in all Christian virtues by the help of the HOLY GHOST. It is not identical with sanctification, which has a larger meaning. It is rather applied to individual than to communal development and growth, though this sense is very frequent in Holy Scripture. It includes the idea of instruction, and this has often been wrongly made the exclusive import of the word. Edification refers for its primal force to house-building. Hence this word is used, ekodomé, by St. Paul in 1 Cor. iii., to describe a spiritual building, and often elsewhere. Ekodomos is used in Acts iv. 11 as a builder, an edifier. And this term wherever used implies man's co-operation. So the discipline of the Church is for edifying, "building up" the Church. The teaching in the Church is for edification, Apostles, Prophets, Evangelists, Pastors, Teachers,—i.e., government and instruction for the same end, "till we all come into the unity of the Faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God, . . . may grow up unto Him in all things which is the Head, even CHRIST, from whom the whole body fitly joined together and compacted by that which every joint supplieth according to the effectual working in the measure of every part maketh increase of the body unto the edifying of itself in love." The growth in all virtuous and godly living, the example of patience, courage, love, of all the Christian virtues, is edifying,—i.e., it builds up others, who see it and who are influenced by our conduct. Therefore edification comes by the indwelling of the HOLY GHOST, and is in a sort the work of confirmation, which builds us as consecrated stones into God's Temple, and by which we are built up in our most holy Faith, and through the gifts thus come to us by it are edifying others in the truth. The unity of the Church and our own union with it in the power and grace of the HOLY GHOST are the means of our receiving edification and contributing to the edification of others. The compactest building is best built. The closest communion in the Church is the truest edification, for it is most deeply bound up in the graces of the SPIRIT.

Elder. In Holy Scripture, the office of the Presbyter (from which the word Priest is formed by contraction), who exercised a spiritual function. In scriptural usage and in Church history such a person as a lay Elder is an impossible person; the words contradict each other. The first hint of such an officer was given by Calvin.

Election. I. The title of the XVII. "Article of Religion" is, "Of Predestination and Election." The words are used as though they were synonymous, and the first sentence is a definition of their meaning. "Predestination to life is the everlasting purpose of God, whereby (before the foundations of the world were laid) He hath constantly decreed by His counsel, secret to us, to deliver from curse and damnation those whom He hath chosen (legit) in CHRIST out of mankind, and to bring them by CHRIST to everlasting salvation." After enlarging upon the last clause of this sentence, the Article goes on to state the comfort and the danger which attend the consideration of the doctrine, and closes with an appeal to the general (generaliter—universally) promises of God as set forth in Holy Scripture. The word "elect" occurs also in the Collect for All-Saints' day. In the English Prayer-Book it is also found in the Office for Baptism, "Thy faithful and elect children;" and in the Catechism, "me and all the elect people of God." The natural question is, how these different uses of the term agree with each other and with the doctrine of Holy Scripture. For as the terms, and therefore the doctrines of predestination and election, occur in the Scriptures, all Christians must hold some "doctrine" upon the subject, and the question for us is, whether what we hold is the doctrine of Holy Scripture.

In the first place, however, it is well to remember that questions about fate and foreknowledge, providence and free-will, are not confined to any time or class of men. "The Essenes among the Jews, Zeno and the Stoics, and the followers of Mohammed were all rigid predestinarians, believing that all the affairs of the world and the actions of the human race were ordered by an eternal and inexorable decree." St. Augustine, in the fourth century, was the great exponent of the doctrine in the Church. Owing to his authority and influence, it was the more general doctrine of the Western Church. After St. Augustine, its great expounder was St. Thomas Aquinas. It was the doctrine of Zwinglius and John Calvin. It is natural that the questions which it involves should arise whenever men think at all, but it is certain that when they depend entirely upon their own reason and knowledge they will fall into one of two errors. Reasoning from the sovereignty of God they exclude the freedom of man, which they cannot reconcile with it, and are led into fatalism. Reasoning from the freedom of man, they are led to deny the sovereignty of God.

II. The Christian faith does not explain to us the problems which we discover in nature and in ourselves, but it reveals to us Him in whom God and man are reconciled, and by whom evil is conquered and man delivered from it. It does not remove the darkness, but it throws light upon us and around us to guide us. It does not explain God's eternal purposes, but it declares to us one purpose and one "decree," the coming of the Son of God for man's salvation. "I will declare the decree. Thou art my Son. This day have I begotten Thee" (Ps. ii. 7). If we are to understand the meaning of "the election" of God, we must begin from the ground of Christian faith, and not narrow that faith by some preconceived notion of the doctrine.

Another principle is as necessary. The Old Testament and the New are one, and the union of them is in CHRIST. The Old foretells Him and prepares for Him. The New reveals Him. The New is the fulfillment of the Old. The faith of the Old Testament is the faith of expectation, believing the promises of God, looking for CHRIST. The faith of the New Testament is the faith of possession, having CHRIST. The Old and the New will use the same words even, and their meaning will unite in CHRIST.

III. We find this word election, a choice, in frequent use in the Old Testament. It is perhaps unfortunate that the more frequent word in the authorized version of the Old Testament is choose, chosen; and elect is rare, while in the New elect is used in a large proportion of cases. But it will help to clear our view if we fix it in mind that the words are translations of the same word. The chosen are the elect. Election is choice.

• In the Old Testament the choice or election of God falls upon men, cities, peoples, inanimate things. He chooses "a place to set His name there" (Neh. i. 9), one man for a king (Deut. xvii. 15), a people to be His people (Deut. vii. 6, 7), a tribe to be His priests (Deut. xxi. 5), a family to be High-Priests (Ps. cv. 26). Israel is His chosen generation (Ex. xix. 5, 6), Abraham His servant, David His servant (Ps. lxxviii. 70), Israel His elect (Isa. xlv. 4). God has a purpose, and with that purpose in view He chooses men to carry it out, while as regards that purpose He passes by and puts aside others. That purpose becomes more and more clear as time goes on. It is the purpose which was indicated by the promise made in the Garden of Eden, and repeated to Abraham, and again to David. Abraham is chosen with reference to that purpose, and after him the people Israel. Israel was therefore elect "according to the purpose" of God, and for that purpose elect to special privileges. Pharaoh stood in the way of that purpose and went down before it. Esau was set aside and set himself aside, and in comparison with his brother and with reference to this special purpose of God is "hated" (Rom. ix. 14). This, therefore, is election or choice in the Old Testament, the choice of the people Israel, and of men and things belonging to them for the carrying out of God's one purpose of blessing the world "in CHRIST." In the way of that purpose their choice to special blessings; a choice which was indicated by God and claimed by them in the rite of circumcision. By which rite they entered upon an inheritance not only of temporal but of spiritual and eternal blessings,—unless indeed they forfeited them.

IV. The purpose of God with Israel was fulfilled when "of them CHRIST came, who is over all God blessed forever." That purpose was His eternal purpose, and had been declared before Abraham in the Garden. It entered "the parenthesis of the Law" (Rom. v. 20) with Abraham and passed out through the "broken wall of partition" (Eph. ii. 14) into its fulfillment in CHRIST. The Kingdom of Israel is fulfilled in the Kingdom of CHRIST, the law in the Gospel "preached to every creature," the election of Israel in the Church of CHRIST, "which is His body, the fullness of Him that filleth all in all." The same principles underlie the old dispensation and the new. The relation of one to the other throughout is defined in our LORD's words, "I am not come to destroy but to fulfill" (St. Matt. v. 17).

Two of St. Paul's Epistles may be said to deal especially with this subject of the election and eternal purpose of God. The Epistle to the Romans is often appealed to as though it taught the narrowest doctrine of individual election. If we will remind ourselves that it was manifestly written to rebuke the narrowness and exclusiveness of those Jewish Christians who would have claimed the Church as the special heritage of Judaism, and to show how God's purpose reached out towards all who would believe in Him, we will agree with the early Church, which read it as though it breathed the spirit directly opposed to exclusiveness and narrowness, the very spirit of liberty and liberality. It sets before us the purpose of God and the election of God according to that purpose, but it shows us how that purpose extended to all men, and how it is being accomplished in its fullness by CHRIST. Love and hate, honor and dishonor, calling, glory, and mercy, and hardening and casting off and destruction are defined by this purpose of God and explain the relation of men to it (Rom. ix.).

Next after the Epistle to the Romans St. Paul wrote that to the Ephesians, and the two are closely connected by common words and thoughts. In both he bases his argument on the eternal purpose of God as it is revealed in CHRIST, but in Ephesians he advances a step in the development of the thought which he had sketched in the Romans, and the subject of the Epistle is, the Church as the Body of CHRIST and the body of the elect, "whom God hath chosen in Him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and blameless before Him in love, having predestinated us to adoption by JESUS CHRIST to Himself, according to the good purpose of His will, to the praise of the glory of His grace" (i. 7), "being predestinated according to His purpose, who maketh all things according to the council of His will" (i. 11). If we use the Epistle to the Galatians as a preface to the Romans, we will therefore have in these three a chain of thought like this,—first, in Galatians, the setting aside of the old system of the law; then, in Romans, the transition stage, the transfer of the rights of the old election to the new; and last, in Ephesians, the full purpose of God being fully accomplished in the sight of angels and of men by the Church.

The Epistle to the Ephesians is perhaps the most systematic and complete treatise of any of the Epistles. The thoughts and arguments can be arranged without violence in a kind of concentric circles, of which the centre and sun of the system is CHRIST. "In Him" all things are summed up in heaven and in earth, past, present, and to come. In Him the purpose of God is revealed and in Him accomplished. From Him the influence goes out and fills the circle of the Church, which is "His fullness," by which His "wisdom is made known to the powers in heavenly places," which, "with all saints," as a body comprehends His surpassing love, and in which and by which the glory that goes out from Him is returned to Him. Then that circle widens into another, of the members of that body who are made members of it by the one baptism, hold the one faith, belong to the one LORD, worship one God the FATHER. By that union by our baptism God's predestination of us is manifested and His election effected. The reason and final cause of His choice of us is "the good pleasure of His will." The fact of our election is proved by His act of calling and receiving us. Then this circle widens again into the practical lessons of the duties which belong to them that are members of the body of CHRIST and elect of God. If we bear in mind and add to all this the further thought that God is "the living God" and "the God of the living," and that therefore whatever is His "hath eternal life," so that, as the purpose of God is from eternity, so it goes on through eternity, we will have a fair idea of this wonderful Epistle, and of what St. Paul meant by election. The Church of God is the body of the elect. Election is the choice of men according to the will of God to special privileges for the carrying out of His eternal purpose, and with the purpose included of their present and eternal blessing.

One fact will show us how true the view is which identifies the Church with the body of the elect, viz.: that the Apostles constantly address the whole body of the Christians as elect and holy. St. John addresses them as "in Him that is true" St. Peter salutes them as "elect according to the foreknowledge of God," and addresses them as "a chosen generation, a royal priesthood," quoting the very words addressed to the Church in the wilderness, and bids them "make their calling and election sure." And the idea of all St. Paul's Epistles is the same, as can be seen by reading the salutations to them. They are addressed as a body. There is no if or hesitation. They have these rights and privileges. The one question is not whether they are sanctified and elect of God, but whether they live accordingly.

Otherwise, unless they "work out their salvation," and "make their calling and election sure," their present gifts shall become their condemnation, and they "become castaways," even as "all our fathers were baptized into Moses, and ate the same spiritual food and drank the same spiritual drink. For they drank of that spiritual Rock that followed them, and that Rock was CHRIST. But with many of them God was not well pleased: for they were overthrown in the wilderness. Wherefore let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall" (1 Cor. x.). But, on the other hand, "by their fruits ye shall know them." "The fruits of the Spirit are in all goodness, and righteousness, and truth." And by them "the Spirit witnesseth with our spirit that we are the children of God. And if children then heirs. Heirs of God and joint heirs with CHRIST." So when "the LORD shall present unto Himself a glorious Church," "an entrance shall be ministered unto you abundantly into the everlasting Kingdom of our LORD and SAVIOUR JESUS CHRIST" (2 Pet. i. 11).

V. This view of election leaves many questions unanswered of which we would be glad to know the answers, but which we do not and cannot, because they have not been revealed. But it has this advantage,—that it does not profess to be wise above what is written; and this also,—that it does not need to explain away anything that is written either in the Old Testament or the New. It was the view which was accepted in the Church before St. Augustine, and is now the generally accepted view in the Church of England and in our own Church. It will not satisfy those who are determined to have a logical theology, even though they come to conclusions like those of Calvin when he said of his own dogma, "It is a horrible decree indeed." But it will satisfy Christian faith.

It only remains to inquire whether this view of election, which identifies the body of the elect with the Church of CHRIST, agrees with the doctrines and formularies of the Church. The view which would give a Calvinistic meaning to the XVII. Article is negatived by the fact that the language of that article is of Lutheran and not of Calvinistic origin, and was drawn up before the Calvinistic system had made any headway in England, by the fact that thorough-going Calvinists have never been satisfied with its language, and at one time made serious efforts to change it. But the strongest argument is that the Calvinistic interpretation cannot be made to harmonize with other articles even, and still less with other formularies. In the Collect for All-Saints' day, and in the Church of England offices for Baptism and the Catechism, "the elect" is synonymous with "the baptized," and though the word is omitted in our office, the idea is the same throughout,—that by baptism this child "is made the member of CHRIST, the child of God, and an inheritor of the Kingdom of Heaven," by God's "good will towards him." And in the Holy Communion, "CHRIST died for thee" is asserted to each communicant. And throughout the services of the Church the same idea prevails and underlies them all,—that those who believe and are baptized are numbered with the elect and are in the ark of salvation. Now let them see to it that they "make their calling and election sure."

Elements. The outward and visible signs in the Sacraments, so called both because water, wine, and bread are simple substances, and because they are of the very essentials of a complete Sacrament. They are the channel of conveyance, the sign and the seal of the Sacrament. How God chooses to use them we cannot tell. It is a mystery; but that He does so use them He has repeatedly taught us, and we have but to use them as He appoints: water to the mystical washing away of sin, bread and wine for giving us the Body and Blood of our risen LORD, "whereby He does assure us of His favor and goodness towards us; and that we are very members incorporate in the mystical Body of His Son, . . . and are also heirs through hope of His everlasting kingdom." No baptism can be administered otherwise than by water, nor the Holy Communion otherwise than with bread and wine. These are elementary to the administration of the Sacraments.

Elements; human and divine in Holy Scripture. In the discussions so rife at present about all parts of religion, there is a singular omission to weigh well the different elements which make it up. It is of God, and so divine. It is for man, and so must suit, and sympathize with, his nature at all points. It is lived in and assumed by man, and so there is mingled in it a human element. As a document perfect and flawless when it issues from the author's pen, by repeated and careless copying becomes filled with errors and varying readings, and sometimes with perversions, which yet do not destroy, though may nominally impair their own authenticity, and which all point by their varying errors to the true text, so is religion. Its Divine authorship is overlaid or perverted in minute things which amount to real errors, if they do not compensate each other or are not eliminated with care by the human elements. This mixture of the human and Divine is most completely exhibited in the Church, which is the Body of CHRIST and yet is made up of men, and in the Holy Scriptures, which are inspired by God and yet were intrusted to men to write and to transmit. Indeed, we bear about in our body the same wonderful commixtion,—our souls the Breath of God, our bodies of dust.

Inspiration takes and uses men for its purposes, as heralds, declarers, accurate recorders, and mouth-pieces for its messages. It does not destroy, but it sanctifies and greatly magnifies the powers of such men. Isaiah inspired by the same HOLY SPIRIT did not speak as did Jeremiah or Daniel. Balaam divinely directed by the same HOLY GHOST was not more willing to bless the People than the High-Priest was to prophesy of the death of CHRIST as a blessing for all men. David sang by the HOLY GHOST, but so did Isaiah. And they were preserved from error in any way; their own natural idiom He used to accurately convey His messages, whether of mercy or of warning, of love, and of peace, or His revelations. There was the human element. Each man, with his capacities and devout or indevout temper, his command of language, peculiarly his own,—this man with all his traits of character was chosen and used by that one and eternal SPIRIT of GOD.

The Church receives the inspired record, but is herself founded upon the Resurrection of CHRIST, each member being united to Him by baptism, and bound up with his brother by the double bond of a natural and spiritual brotherhood. The Head, CHRIST, is immortal, the members of CHRIST are now mortal. He is sinless, they are struggling with sin. He is ever present, and educates, feeds, and reconciles us, yet we are restless, oblivious, willful, and ungrateful, still the bond is never broken between the Head and His body, which is to grow in holiness.

The omission to comprehend these two apparently conflicting yet actually ever-present facts both in inspiration, the Church of God, and our own nature leads many into fundamental errors upon religion and the soul's relation to God, and through Him to his neighbor.

Elevation. The elements of bread and wine in Canon of the Mass in the Roman Church, after consecration, and for the purpose of adoring them. It was an innovation introduced in the twelfth century, and afterwards defined by a rubric in 1271 A.D. by Gregory X., enjoining the celebrant and people to kneel and adore. There was an elevation of the elements in the earliest Liturgies, also after consecration, which was made with the words "Holy things for holy places" (according to Archdeacon Freeman). Neither the later nor the earlier elevations are sanctioned in the Prayer-Book; nor are they consonant with the leading feeling of our Liturgy. The Article XXVIII. closes with this sentence: "The sacrament of the Lord's Supper was not by CHRIST's ordinance reserved, carried about, lifted up, or worshiped." It was a mere deduction of common logic from the previous rejection, in the Article, of the Roman figment of transubstantiation.

Elohim. GOD. One of the names by which He was known to the Jew, and the first name used by Moses. "In the beginning ELOHIM made the heavens and the earth." It is a plural noun, and when used in Hebrew with a singular verb always refers to the CREATOR; with a plural verb it may refer to the false gods and idols. It is translated GOD, while JEHOVAH (JAH) is translated by the word LORD. The word ELOHIM means mighty one, strong one (and is referred to the MESSIAH in Isaiah ix. 5), while the root of JEHOVAH is JAH, the Living One. The plural form, ELOHIM, then wraps up the doctrine of the HOLY TRINITY, while the singular, JEHOVAH, sets forth the self-existence of GOD. The use of the name GOD thus in the first chapter of Genesis is very significant when compared with the first verses of St. John's Gospel, and we can understand why these words, "let us make man in our image;" "behold, the man is become as one of us, to know good and evil," could be used by Moses, whose language is ever supposed to teach the unity of GOD in person as well as in nature; but he does teach really the Unity and the Trinity in the famous Shema: "Hear, oh Israel, the JEHOVAH ELOHIM is one ELOHIM." Keeping these facts in mind we can easily see why Moses could use both names, and we shall have a ready answer to those who observe only that Moses did use these names separately, and so conclude that he compiled his first book out of two separate documents, one in which the name ELOHIM was used, and a second in which the name JEHOVAH was used, but who refuse also to observe that he uses the words interchangeably or together. These hypercritics are compelled, to be consistent, to divide sentences into two parts in order to show where, according to their theory, Moses wove two distinct documents into one narrative. The absurdity of the criticism is made glaring by such an effort. That ELOHIM and JEHOVAH were names of their fathers' GOD, well known to the Jews, and that Moses used these names not by direct inspiration and revelation, but from the very religion he was taught, is true. But his use of each name, separately in some places and together in others, is based upon the inner meaning of those passages, and when duly considered will give them a depth which they had not before for the student. To take but the Decalogue: in the first commandment, "Thou shalt have no other ELOHIM but me." In the second commandment, against graven images, "For I, JEHOVAH, thy ELOHIM, am a jealous ELOHIM," where all the names are used with the deepest meaning of the Christian religion. In the fourth,—"For in six days JEHOVAH made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day, wherefore JEHOVAH blessed the sabbath day and hallowed it"—the unity of the Divine nature of GOD and His self-existence is appropriately used, setting forth His awful, perfect omnipotence over all His works. In the fifth, "that thy days may be long in the land which JEHOVAH, thy ELOHIM, giveth thee," brings out the deeper meaning of the words land,—in the land of the living (i.e., in heaven,—and they desire a better country, that is, a heavenly), and at once JEHOVAH ELOHIM acquires a wonderful richness of reference to the life and immortality which JEHOVAH, by His CHRIST, has brought to light for us. The absurd criticism has the use of developing the deeper hidden meanings of the sacred text.

Elvira. The Council of Elvira (or Illiberis), in Spain, was held early in the fourth century. Some place it in the year 300 A.D., others as late as 309 A.D., both being influenced by doctrinal views probably to fix it either before or after the date of Constantine's edict of toleration to Christians in Spain (306 A.D.). The occasion of the Council appears to have been troubles in the Church arising out of persecution and oppression by the heathen. There were present at it Hosius, Bishop of Cordova, and eighteen other Bishops; while twenty-six Priests and certain Deacons took part in the deliberations. A large number of strict Canons were passed relating to discipline, some of the chief ones being as follows: Those who had voluntarily sacrificed to idols were to be finally excommunicated; those who had not gone beyond offering a present to an idol might be received into communion again, after penance, at the point of death; the use of marriages was forbidden to the clergy; pictures ought not to be allowed in churches; and severe penalties were enacted in detail against adultery, prostitution, murder, false swearing, and slander.

Emanation. A Gnostic theory, which was worked out in Alexandria, of the creation. It was founded upon the Zoroastrian doctrine of Light,—as the type of the Divine nature, and so that the higher we ascend the nearer we are to the true source of all matter and spirit,—conjoined to the Platonic theory of the Archetypal idea, that is, the self-existent Being,—Plato's idea,—and the absolute light of the Persian coincided, for as the thought and as the substance receded from the central light and self-existence, so it became more attenuated, and the fullness (cf. Col. i. 19; Eph. i. 23) became emptiness when the limit was reached. This was worked up into the Gnostic doctrine of æons (vide Æon), and probably, as the Gnostic taught successions, emanations, and generations of æons, it was against their wild vagary of "the fullness" St. Paul used the phrase as referred to above, and against these generations of æons that he warned St.

Timothy "neither to give heed to fables and endless genealogies which minister questions." Emanation appears to have been an early form of the now so-called doctrine of evolution.

Ember-days. The derivation of the word ember is very doubtful. It has been derived from ember,—ashes, i.e., of each of the four seasons, which is not at all a probable derivation; from a corruption and contraction of the Latin jejunia quatuor temporum; German, Quatember; Dutch, Quartertemper; Danish, Kratember; or from the Saxon Ymbren,—a revolution or circuit, which, as these are recurrent days in the Church's year, seems to be the most likely. They are three days of fasting in the four seasons, which have been specially observed, to intercede for God's mercy on each of these four divisions of the year. The Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday after the first Sunday in Lent, the Feast of Pentecost, September 14 and December 18. The date of the establishment of these fasts lies probably between the Council of Nice and the time of Pope Leo I., 440 A.D. Four fasts were observed, according to Philastrius, after 325 A.D., but they were not the ember fasts, though it is likely that the ember fasts grew out of them. In Leo I.'s time we have a clear description of them, and from that time on there is a continuous notice of them. But they were of Italian origin. The Gallican Church did not receive them much before the ninth century. The African and the Milanese Churches could not have observed them, at least in Leo's time. They were accepted in Spain in the seventh century. In the East they have received no observance. From the beginning of their appointment, it is probable that they were connected, though not canonically till later, with the ordinations of the clergy, a connection which has ever since been maintained with more or less laxness. There are two prayers appointed for those to be ordained, either one of which is to be read at these seasons. They should be used on the Sunday previous and throughout the week, ending with the Sunday after the Ember Saturday. The first of the two prayers is probably by Bishop Cosin, a remarkably beautiful prayer, and the second is from the Collects appointed for the ordination of Priests and Deacons, which is an imitation rather than a translation of the older Salisbury Collects in the like offices.

Emblem. A symbol, or typical representation of some spiritual thing. Under some symbol a solemn Christian truth may be suggested, as the Anchor represents Hope; the Circle and the Triangle within it represents the Mystery of the TRINITY; a Dove symbolizes the descent of the HOLY GHOST. These and many others, as the Cross with the Crown, the Fish (which was an ancient emblem), the Ship, the Chalice, the Emblems of the four Evangelists, the Lily, and others which are in common use. These are natural and proper, and may be fitly used as suggestions of the great truths of Christianity, being themselves alluded to in Scripture (as the Anchor, the Ship) in metaphor or in parable.

Embolismus. An intercalated prayer,—i.e., a prayer added after the petition "Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil," and before the doxology, "For Thine," etc. It was a universal custom at one time, but has left scarcely a trace in the Western Church. A single petition is all that is left, "Deliver us, LORD, we beseech Thee, from all evil," in the West. But in the early Eastern Liturgies this Embolismus holds a very important place, and is often of extreme beauty. It was as it were an expansion of the last petition, uttered in passionate entreaty, as is finely exemplified in this example from the Liturgy of St. Mark: "Even so LORD, LORD, lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from the evil one; for Thy long-suffering knoweth that we through our great infirmity are unable to resist him, but make with the temptation also a way to escape, that we may be able to bear it; for Thou hast given power to tread on serpents and scorpions and on all the might of the enemy; (aloud) for Thine," etc. The deep fervor of this prayer is well expressed. Possibly it may be some such feeling of desiring to expand the perfect compression in the Lord's Prayer that has placed as a preface to it in the Mozarabic and Gallican Liturgies a short, humble petition which varies with the season. This is for Christmas-day from the Mozarabic Liturgy: "That which the Word showed us to follow, that which the Life taught us to speak, that which the Truth instructed us to hold, to Thee, FATHER ALMIGHTY, let us pronounce from on earth with fear and trembling, OUR FATHER," etc. It is after this example, though probably not consciously following it, that in the Institution office the Collect, Direct us, O LORD, precedes and is joined to the Lord's Prayer with the words, "who hath taught us to pray unto Thee, O ALMIGHTY FATHER, in His prevailing Name and words, OUR FATHER."

Enccenia. The anniversary festival of the dedication of a Church. The word means the "renewal,"—i.e., the remembrancer; hence, the Feast of the Dedication. This feast was also kept on the anniversary of the day on which a city was founded.

Encyclical. Originally meant a letter sent by a Bishop or by the officers in authority to other Dioceses for certain purposes. The letter from the Church in Smyrna, recounting the noble martyrdom of St. Polycarp, was an encyclical. The Bishops who deposed Paul of Samosata sent an encyclical to other Dioceses declaring their act and the reasons for it, and warning them of the heresy. The Festal Epistles of the Patriarch of Alexandria were also Encyclicals announcing to all the Churches of the East and of the West the true date of Easter-day. A Primate would send an Encyclical to his suffragans. But though they do not bear this title, it may help us to appreciate better the Catholic Epistles of St. James, St. Peter, and St. John, to consider them (what they were) Encyclicals. So too, as many copies of the Epistles to the Ephesians do not contain the words "in Ephesus," it has been supposed that this was an Encyclical Epistle from St. Paul to that and the neighboring Churches. But the term now is used solely of a circular letter from the Pope to the Bishops and Churches which acknowledge his authority.

England, Church of. Under the title BRITISH CHURCH will be found an outline of Early English Church History preceding the Reformation. Under this last title will be found a sketch of the work of Henry VIII. In the rapid sketch which follows only the most salient points can be cited.

Edward VI. succeeded his father in 1547 A.D. A council of sixteen, by his father's will, formed a Regency. In this Regency the reformers, led by the Lord Protector and Cranmer, were balanced by the Chancellor and Bishop Toustal. The strong hand of Henry being removed, confusion was imminent, especially as the lay lords were greedy for Church lands. Much violent preaching was common. A royal visitation was ordered (1547 A.D.). Injunctions were issued, and a book of Homilies, chiefly by Cranmer, was left for the use of each Church. Resistance was made by Gardiner, Bonner, and a remonstrance came from the Princess Mary. Gardiner apparently had legal grounds, since the Homilies were without Parliamentary and Convocational sanction; for this he was imprisoned. Bonner protested but yielded. Serious alterations of the law were initiated; the Bishops were to be appointed by Letters Patent, not by a conge d'élire; the clergy were to administer the Communion in both kinds; the treason acts of the late reign were repealed; the charities, hospitals, and guilds were despoiled of their endowments. Convocation relieved of the penalties threatened by the Six Article Act, demanded a revision of the Canon law, representation in Parliament, a review of the remodeled services to be acted on by them, but their demands were disregarded. A new Communion office was set forth (March, 1548 A.D.) upon the sole authority of the Privy Council, but it was not unanimously received. The many proclamations which were issued show how disturbed the state was with fanatical and imprudent preaching and disputation. Sacrilege was rife, for the Councillors themselves set the example. But by the close of this year the draft of the first Prayer-Book of Edward VI. was submitted to Convocation (November), and was approved by the Commons (December) and, after some opposition by eight of the non-reforming Bishops, by the Lords (January, 1549 A.D.). Its use was legally enjoined by Whitsunday, but many Churches began its use on Easter (April 21). It was generally received, but there was some disturbance, especially in the Devonshire rising. Many who disliked the change made it as nearly like the Romish ceremonial as they could. Its tone and spirit were thoroughly Anglican, and as such it won its way quite as much as for its simplicity, rhythm, and devoutness. In 1549 A.D. the act permitting the marriage of the clergy was passed. In the fall, the efforts to assimilate the Prayer-Book to the "Popish Mass" was checked by a second royal visitation. Bonner, for encouraging such attempts and for his unsatisfactory apologetic sermon at Paul's Cross, was tried, but refusing to admit the authority of the Commission appointed, was imprisoned. When Somerset was replaced by Warwick (1549 A.D.), the reforming policy was still carried on. Old service-books were called in and destroyed. A Commission was ordered to revise the Canon Law. The Ordinal was drawn up and approved (February, 1550 A.D.). Cranmer now desired to form a sort of bond of union among the English and Continental Reformers against the Council of Trent, and so admitted them to a partial influence in English Church affairs. This brought Hooper to the front as Calvin's friend. He was offered the Bishopric of Gloucester (July, 1550 A.D.), but he refused to be consecrated in the prescribed vesture. Since he would not yield to argument, he was sent to the Fleet. After two months, rather than lose the power of the proffered office, he withdrew his objection and was consecrated March 8, 1551 A.D. Ridley, Bishop of London, so wise in all else, removed the altars and ordered Communion-tables. This introduced unseemly contentions, which have not since been wholly quieted. Cranmer was now busy drawing a series of articles, and was also occupied with a review of the Prayer-Book. It is said that Bucer and Peter Martyr influenced the formation of the second Prayer-Book. But their objections were not as many as the English Divines themselves admitted, nor were the corrections made as they wished. Peter Martyr had seriously influenced Cranmer upon the doctrine of the Eucharist, and indirectly it effected a great deal, as was apparent when the second Prayer-Book was issued (November, 1552 A.D.). This book made some alterations for the better, but it sacrificed much which was worth retaining. A revision of the Ordinal was also made, and some symbolic ceremonies dropped. Cranmer now reverted to the articles he was drawing up. These were rapidly drawn up and submitted to the King, who had them reviewed, and then they were laid before the Council. They were ratified (May, 1553 A.D.) by Convocation and signed by the King; with them was bound up Poyntet's Catechism,—the basis of Nowel's Catechism later. This work, which could not be undone, was a great gain. Still, in other ways much evil had been done. Church furniture and vessels had been embezzled; Church lands were appropriated; parishes were defrauded and wasted by the lay lords in office. The King alone seemed to see the evil, by trying to apply the money to Church uses. From his care two hospitals, once monastic houses, are now in London, and he founded twenty-two Grammar Schools. His death (July 6, 1553 A.D.) delayed reform. The cruel use made of the Lady Jane Grey only deepened Queen Mary's avowed purpose of restoring Romanism. Out of sympathy with the temper of her subjects, ready to make every sacrifice, deeply attached to Philip of Spain, and therefore under the lead of Spanish policy, had it not been for Bishop Gardiner's wise advice she would have acted in a more headlong fashion. Cranmer, who could have escaped, Latimer, Holgate of York, and Ridley, were imprisoned together in the Tower. Rogers, Saunders, and Taylor and Bishop Hooper were the first martyrs (February, 1555 A.D.). This fatal policy, due to secret Spanish influence, horrified all England. Gardiner withdrew from the work. Meantime, the Parliament refused to repeal the statutes against the Papal supremacy and to be reconciled to Rome until the Pope had confirmed the titles to the holders of the monastic lands. Reluctantly the Pope sent Cardinal Pole as Legate to England, with a Bull empowering him to "give, aliene, and transfer" all Church property to its present holders.

On St. Andrew's day (November 30, 1554 A.D.) the assembled Parliament at Lambeth were solemnly absolved and the nation reconciled to Rome. Later (December 6) he absolved and reconciled the clergy in Convocation, and (December 24) confirmed the lay titles to all Church property.

Farrar, Bishop of St. David's, was burned at Carmarthen (March 30, 1555 A.D.). The horror at these executions brought on a pause, till the Queen's Council urged the civil magistrates to present cases to the Commission. But the greatest cruelties were principally in three Dioceses,—London, Canterbury, and Norwich; in these in three years one hundred and eighty-nine persons suffered. In fourteen other Dioceses, ninety-seven, and in six none were burnt. But now it did not avail to recant. The persecution descended to the lower classes, and many poor persons were burned. After much disputing and delay, Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer were tried and condemned at Oxford. Ridley and Latimer lighted "that candle which by God's grace in England shall never be put out" on October 16, 1555 A.D. Cranmer wavered and signed several recantations (which would not have saved him), but suddenly he cast off all fear and publicly denounced his past vacillation, though he supposed he was pardoned, and was burnt March 21, 1556 A.D. The next day

Cardinal Pole was consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury.

The civil magistrates now shrank back, and a list of twenty laymen was added to the ecclesiastical commission to proceed to extremes. The Pope, who was opposed to Spain and was prejudiced against Pole, revoked his legantine commission, but the Queen wrote to him that it was her pleasure that Pole should continue legate, and the Pope finally yielded. The Convocation took advantage of the loss of Calais, and the consequent demand on them for a war subsidy, to urge the continuance, in another shape, of some of the practical reforms already gained; but before these could be properly presented the Queen died (November 17, 1558 A.D.); Cardinal Pole died the next day. The check which this reign placed on the Reformation brought in the seeds of future trouble from the Continent, but the persecutions thoroughly alienated the nation from Romanism.

Elizabeth was received enthusiastically. The exiles flocked home and began to act in a violent manner, and to introduce the unchurchly principles they had learned abroad. The Roman See, of course, tried to hamper her. The violent language of Paul IV. caused the cessation of all intercourse, which has never been renewed. It influenced some of the clergy who had conformed, but none as yet renounced their mother-Church to set up a foreign schism. The Queen, herself of wide statesmanlike purposes, and her advisers sought to unify and conciliate all parties; but the excesses of the returned exiles alienated her sympathy. The Prayer-Book of 1552 A.D. was put into revision. Meantime, the English Litany and Ante-Communion and the Mass as it was in use were ordered, till Parliament (1559 A.D.) restored to the Crown its ancient jurisdiction of power to visit in causes ecclesiastical. It was a broad and dangerous power. The Queen would accept only the title of "Supreme Governor" of the Church on earth. The Bishops were to be nominated by the Crown to the Cathedral Chapters. In opposition to the Queen's known wishes the revising committee adopted the Prayer-Book of 1552 A.D. It was sanctioned by Parliament, but apparently the Queen had among other things the now vexed Ornaments Rubric inserted after the act was passed. By the Act of Uniformity the use of the Book was made binding from June 24, 1559 A.D. The Marian Bishops, except Landaff, manfully refused to take the oath under the Act of Supremacy and were deprived. All but one hundred and eighty-nine clergy yielded. The Queen now issued a series of Injunctions and Articles of Inquiry. Pius IV. tried a conciliatory policy, and it is said offered to recognize the Prayer-Book and her right to the throne if the Queen would return to the Roman obedience. But her reply was to forbid the Nuncio to set foot in England. Dr. Parker was consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury (December 17, 1559 A.D.) by Bishops Barlow, Scory, Coverdale, and Hodgkin. In January, Parker consecrated ten Bishops for vacant Sees. They found much to set right. The parishes were badly served, and few fit men came forward for orders. There was needed a new translation of the Scriptures. Ecclesiastical Courts needed reform. Fanatical preachers gave much trouble. It was difficult to enforce a decent rubrical use of the Prayer-Book. Parker had a difficult course to steer, but he had much tact and resource.

The Convocation of 1563 A.D. arranged and agreed to the XXXIX. Articles, but the Queen quietly interpolated the opening clause of Article XX. before ratifying them. The rejection of all holy-days and a lowering of ritual was barely defeated, and the second Book of Homilies was ordered. Parliament, to meet disorders, passed a second, more stringent Act of Supremacy. It was tendered by Bishop Horne to Bonner, who was in his charge. Bonner raised some questions upon the Ordinal, which led to an act re-establishing the legal (not the spiritual, for that was undoubted) authority of the Ordinal of Edward VI. These acts, yielding to neither Pope nor Puritan, offended both, and both now strove to destroy the English Church.

To enforce the rubrical use of the Prayer-Book, Parker issued his Book of Advertisements. It enjoined a minimum of ritual with the use of surplice, or of alb and chasuble. But it was now decided to force conformity, and scruples against the surplice led to a formal schism 1566 A.D. Four years later the rash act of excommunication by Pius V. caused many, under a mistaken notion, to withdraw from the Church and set up a Roman schism, adding to the troubles and intrigues of the time. England's reply was to make the presence of a Roman priest in England a capital offense. Conspiracies followed rapidly, making the position of the Roman party uncomfortable and adding violence to the Puritan faction. The Queen, misled by those lay councillors who looked to profit by the troubles, would not aid the Bishops, but urged them to unpopular policy which they would have avoided. This added fuel to troubles, which led to Parliament requiring the clergy to subscribe to the Supremacy, the Articles, and the Book of Common Prayer, with a recantation of past rubrical disobedience.

Political plots fomented by Rome, and hard measures almost compelled by zealots at home, made England a scene of great turmoil. Parker died in 1575 A.D. Wise, firm, tolerant, had he been thoroughly backed by the Queen he could have added much to the great work he did. Grindal, a Marian exile, was translated to Canterbury from York, to the joy of those who sided with him. But his acts were restrained by the Queen. He tried to enforce discipline, and established a plan of prophesyings resembling a modern Methodist class-meeting. The Queen ordered him to withdraw it. This order he resisted as an interference, and wrote a very admirable letter to her. The Queen suspended him, and had the prophesyings suppressed; but his suspension did not interfere with his proper Episcopal functions, as many acts could be in the name of his subordinates. It lasted for five years, when he made a partial submission. The next year he died. Whitgift (1583 A.D.) was a man prompt and ready with resources. Cartwright and Travers, the leaders of the nonconformists, hoped to defeat his measures. Travers was nominated to the Mastership of the Temple by the lay advisers of the Queen. But Whitgift succeeded by a compromise to place Hooker there. He also protected the Church property from overvaluation. 1587 A.D. was marked by the scurrilous Mar-Prelate libels. The controversy with Travers set Hooker to produce his splendid Ecclesiastical Polity. The effort to silence the libels led to recourse to the Queen's Bench, and this drove out of the country many of the libelers. Whitgift's Calvinistic leaning led him to draw up the famous Lambeth Articles, but they were afterwards quietly withdrawn. After a glorious but troubled reign, Queen Elizabeth died 1603 A.D.

James showed his leaning at the Hampton Court Conference when he had the Dissenters and Bishops confer upon some of the chief objections to the Church. Whitgift was succeeded by Bancroft (1604 A.D.). In the interval between the two Primates the Canons of 1603/4 A.D. were passed, which are the chief English Church Law, and which bear upon our own polity, and may be really in force with us.

Bancroft tried to push the Test Oath, but the courts interfered, with the result that many emigrated to Holland and to this country. The absurd Gunpowder-plot and the conspiracies of the Jesuits made the position of the Romanists still more uncomfortable, and led to the, to us indefensible, act compelling Popish recusants to receive yearly the Eucharist at the Parish Church. Yet James, a little later, was negotiating a Spanish alliance for his son Charles. The glory of the reign was the translation of the Bible. James had projected it soon after his accession. It was discussed in 1604 A.D., resolved on 1607 A.D., and completed 1611 A.D. The king tried to introduce Episcopacy into Scotland (1607-1610 A.D.), and had three Bishops consecrated. Abbot succeeded Bancroft (1610 A.D.), and was as lax as Bancroft had been vigorous. What with his inattention and James's intermeddling, chiefly by the notorious Book of Sports, trouble and nonconformity were stirred up afresh. Court intrigues and change of policy led indirectly to Dr. Laud's advancement to the Bishopric of St. Davids, 1621 A.D. The negotiations with Spain had led to such relaxation of the laws against recusants that Abbot remonstrated.

Charles succeeded his father (1625 A.D.) and to his principles as well. His main misfortune was in having Laud as an adviser. Laud was honest, conscientious, but inflexible, and with no sympathy for those who differed from him. Brave, imprudent, and gifted with power to influence friends by his sincere singleness of purpose, he could not conciliate opponents.

He had a minute mind that descended to details, yet he saw and initiated remedies for greater evils. He tried to protect the poorer clergy and the Church from spoliation, and he made a strong effort to restore ritual, which bore fruit in happier times, in more decent setting of the furniture, and the seemlier celebration of Divine service. Toleration was not known to either side, it was not thought of by friend or foe. His action drove many to New England, where they enforced the like intolerance. The laxness of the past had taken the fancy of influential laymen, and the attack upon Laud was partly from the desire to do as they pleased. The wish for a moderate Episcopacy was only apparent. His inflexible conduct, and abetting the conduct of others in the Council, led to his arrest in 1641 A.D. He was kept in the Tower for three years, his papers were seized and misused, and finally he was tried upon the monstrous principle that petty infractions by cumulation constitute a treason, and was martyred 1645 A.D. The King was powerless to save him, hampered by his own troubles. He was beheaded in 1649 A.D. The Church was beaten down, the Bishops driven off, the clergy ejected, the use of the Prayer-Book made a crime; and the country for ten years was given over to swarms of sectaries. At the Restoration (1660-85 A.D.) Charles promised full liberty to religious opinion, but he held that later political events absolved him from the pledge, and by harshness towards Dissenters tried to hide his Roman intrigues. The Savoy Conference between the Bishops and leading Dissenters did no direct good, but led to the Revision of the Prayer-Book (1662 A.D.). The State now led the Church into painful blunders. The Divine right of kings, held by a majority, led to difficulties in resisting James II., and a reaction as a Latitudinarian party sprang up, which led to Arian views in some influential men in Queen Anne's reign. The false political principles misled James as to what he could hope to effect. His effort to coerce the Church in the famous case of the "Seven Bishops" was a part of the many acts which led to his expulsion. Those of the Bishops and clergy who could not give up their absolutism became non-jurors, refusing the oath of allegiance to William and Mary (1688-1702 A.D.) The men now at the head of affairs sought to carry out a "scheme of comprehension," but the clergy in Convocation saved the Church by refusing to be lowered to the grade of Dissenting bodies, and be numbered as one of several holding the "Protestant religion." A Toleration Act was passed, a tardy and imperfect accordance of right to Dissenters. The devout and lofty tone of the non-jurors measurably counteracted the lowering ideas of such men as Tillotson and Tennison. Guilds, associations, and societies for Church instruction were very numerous. Queen Anne's reign (1702-1714 A.D.) was mainly marked by contests between the upper and lower Houses of Convocation, and by the notorious Sacheverell trial. The influence and hold of the Church on the nation was at its height. She was active and doing good work, and her services were full, and frequent and decorous.

The importance of what followed later, the Bangorean controversy with its disastrous influences, the depressing effect of the Georgian reigns, the laxness and deadness because of the change in the character of the body of the clergy, the rise of the Wesleys and the form it resulted in of Methodism, the giving the Episcopate to the American Church, the lethargy of the early decades of this century, and the wonderful awakening of the past forty-five years, demand a space and a fullness of treatment, bearing as they do upon our own development and conduct, which cannot be afforded. In fact, this history has yet to be written.

Enthronization. In England, after a Bishop has been consecrated, he is solemnly admitted to the Cathedral of his See and placed on the Throne by the Dean and Chapter, thus taking possession of his See. So too the Archbishop is enthroned in his Archiepiscopal Throne.

Enthusiasm. However much this term is misused, the feeling is a real and a deep motive-power in the Church of God. Enthusiasm as we generally see it displayed is fitful, wanting depth and wanting stability. For this cause sober men are afraid of any manifestation of an enthusiastic spirit. Enthusiasm is generally connected in our minds with the system of Revivals, and with prearranged efforts to produce an excitement. This must be rejected as a spurious form. But a truer understanding of this feeling, and an appreciation of the fact that it requires not little tact and some wisdom to guide it, will lead us to see that God puts into our hands an instrument of great power. It was enthusiasm in this sense that enabled the first converts to not only endure persecution and to suffer with joy, but to go forth upon the work of evangelizing the world. St. Paul is one of the most wonderful examples of true, sustained, and well-controlled enthusiasm. Enthusiasm really underlies all great movements, and so far from suppressing or rejecting it, it should be fostered and developed and guided. It can take the shape of energetic guilds, brotherhoods, co-operative work in the Parish work, or any form that the religious earnestness of each Christian can display itself in readiness and zeal for work. If the test of obedience be applied and can be endured, the person is really enthusiastic. For this reason, every member in a Parish should have some of its work intrusted to him to do faithfully, and as proof of his love to God in return for the love shown him. This impression of enthusiasm is one of the oversights we have been too long guilty of committing, and have consequently lost the valuable work of many who would be ready to labor faithfully. The cultivation of a true, holy, persevering enthusiasm develops greater depth and spiritual power. It does more to strengthen the character than any other thing. It helps to form holy habits, and to grave them indelibly upon the soul. It gives intensity to our convictions of the reality of the unseen, under the guidance of the HOLY GHOST. It was enthusiasm which led to the efforts and work of the missionaries of the Primitive Church. It was such an enthusiasm which gave power to the martyrs to endure. It was such an enthusiasm which drove men into the desert to escape the pollutions around them. It is such an enthusiasm now in this generation which is filling the souls of the many engaged in developing the Church's work here. It will be such an enthusiasm which will attempt to solve the problems given us to work out for this nation. It has been well said, "Most religions have sprung from an enthusiast and a band of disciples; but no religion save Christianity has been revived from time to time by a succession of enthusiasts." "One thing is certain, that no community save that against which 'the gates of hell shall not prevail' has shown so wondrous a power of self-repair from within, of renewing by the spontaneous ardor of its own members the vigor of a religious sentiment which has been tending to dissolution." "When we see that the light which enthusiasm has kindled in men's minds, however fitful and delusive, has yet cast its rays into the darkest corners of the world,—that its fervor, however morbid and unreal, has often given a healthy glow to the chilled heart of Christendom, we ought to conclude that it too comes from the FATHER of Lights, and that we should attempt wisely to direct rather than sternly to resist its manifestations, 'lest haply we be found to fight against God.'"

It is an instrument for good within, and a weapon of attack upon the world which we are slow to use as we well can.

Epact. Vide CALENDAR.

Ephesians, Epistle to. This Epistle—one of the noblest of the Pauline Epistles—was written during St. Paul's first imprisonment at Rome (61–63 A.D.), probably in the spring of 62 A.D. There was, so far as appears now, no cause beyond that care of the Churches that lay upon the Apostle's heart to move him to write this Letter. It was quite likely that it was written to several of the Churches in Asia Minor, and that the copy we have was the one directed to Ephesus, for the words "at Ephesus" are not found in some of the best manuscripts, but are yet too well attested to doubt their genuineness. Then there is another fact: the Ephesians were to exchange this with the Laodiceans, who had received a letter from him. The title may have been readily dropped out of the copy of a letter sent to a neighboring Church. But there can be no doubt at all that this is a letter from the great Apostle which was intended for and received by Ephesus, even if we suppose that it was to be sent to other Churches. But the contents of this Epistle are as remarkable, its enunciation of revealed truth as profound, as any in the whole number of St. Paul's letters. It is chiefly occupied with the unity of the Church of CHRIST; with the gracious gifts which are given by it; and it has been well said that a thorough study of the Epistle to the Ephesians, with prayer, together with a devout use of the Litany, would bring any fair-minded man into the Church. Its arguments are so clearly put, its declarations of God's revelation are so cogently worded, that the conclusions from them are irresistible. The contents may be divided into two parts,—the doctrinal portion and the hortatory.

The doctrinal (ch. i.), beginning immediately after the salutation, recites in a long sentence, reaching from the 3d to the 14th verse, the outline of the redemption, the Atonement of CHRIST, their faith in the Gospel, which involved Baptism and Confirmation. A second similar sentence (15–33) declares to us that wonderful outpouring of the Love of the FATHER to us through CHRIST in the gifts of wisdom and knowledge of the inheritance of His glory, that we may be in Him whom He raised from the dead, and under whom He put all things and made Him head over all things to the Church, which is His body, the fullness of Him that filleth all in all. But as we, forgiven, washed, accepted, are in Him, He hath raised us to heavenly places (ch. ii. 1–10) in CHRIST JESUS, and created us in Him for good works, which God prepared that we should walk in them. Thence the Apostle declares the unity of the Church for both Jew and Gentile in a magnificent passage, which, beginning with "He is our Peace," goes on to show the breaking down of the partition between them, the reconciliation in one body, the gift of the one Spirit, the membership in the household of God, upon the Apostolic foundation, the sanctification of our bodies by being temples of the HOLY GHOST. And (ch. iii.) the mystery of the Church of God founded in CHRIST, with its gifts, its inclusion of all men, was now revealed through the Church itself to the principalities and powers of heaven. The chapter closes with a prayer that strengthening and increased wisdom should be given to the Ephesians, and a beautiful ascription of praise. In the fourth chapter the Apostle gathers up into one all the practical results of the doctrinal foundation. "As we have the vocation, let us with all Christian grace use it. Endeavoring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. There is one body and one Spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling; one LORD, one Faith, one Baptism, one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all." On His ascension our LORD bestowed the manifold gifts which He had received upon His Church, in Apostles, in Prophets, in Evangelists, in Pastors and Teachers for our perfect training in the body of CHRIST, which is His Church. Within the remainder of the Epistle are contained, under practical directions to a holy life, allusions to Baptism (ch. iv. 24; compare with Rom. vi. 4), to Confirmation (vs. 30 and Acts xix. 6), and the use of music in the Eucharist (giving of thanks, ch. v. 18-21) antiphonally in psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs. Their unity in the Church under the type of marriage is again taught (ch. v. 23-33). The spiritual warfare, the reality of the unseen and supernatural, is grandly described (ch. vi. 10-20). If we may reverently say so of a Book wherein all is given by the wisdom of the HOLY GHOST, this Epistle is one of the most valuable at this day for the Church in the series of Pauline Epistles. Its study will prove to the devout reader the Divine origin, the Apostolic continuity of the Church, its mysterious supernatural relations to the unseen world around us and to our LORD at the right hand of the throne on high, and the need of the constant use of His gifts through the HOLY SPIRIT for our spiritual life. We need no better devotional and doctrinal manual could we enter into the depths of its revelations.

Epiphanies. Manifestations (vide ANGELS and THEOPHANY) of a spiritual messenger sent from GOD to His people.

Epiphany. The "manifestation" of CHRIST. The word is not confined merely to the Feast-day, for which it stands usually, but it is also used to mean (2 Thess. ii. 8) the Second Advent, and (vide EPIPHANIES) the manifestation of CHRIST to His Prophets as the JEHOVAH ANGEL. But we generally mean by Epiphany the Feast-day on the 6th of January. On it we in the West celebrate the manifestation of CHRIST to the Gentiles, who were guided to His cradle at the inn in Bethlehem by the miraculous star. The Eastern Church commemorated His birth and His baptism on this day as representing the natural birth of our LORD, and also the LORD's baptism, which was a prophecy in act of our own mystical second birth. Upon it fell one of the three solemn seasons at which baptism was administered. But, except in Spain, this was not the custom of the West.

It is not necessary to seek for astronomical explanations of the wonderful star which led the magi to the Infant JESUS. Ignatius

(Ep. to the Eph., 19) speaks of it as a wondrous phenomenon. The Evangelist records that the star led them, moved, and "went before them till it came and stood over where the young child was." All of which forces us to accept the account as it stands, that it was a miraculous star, or to reject it altogether.

The Feast in the West has always commemorated this visit of the wise men. All the homilies and liturgical services of this part of the Church's year have reference to this fact, and all make some spiritual or figurative explanation of it. The worship of the wise men, as representatives for the whole Gentile world, was offered Him. Their gifts of gold in honor of His kingly birth, were laid at His feet. The frankincense, as due to Him as Eternal GOD, worshiped forever more, was given to Him. The myrrh, signifying by its bitterness the sorrows of His coming human life, and by its perfume the spicery of His burial, was presented, too. And so, at the outset of that wondrous life, were typical gifts given by wise men, themselves miraculously led by the star of Jacob to Him whose true humanity and perfectly sinless life were to be the most precious gifts ever given to man, and these given to us by miracles.

Episcopacy. The form of polity of the Church Catholic as represented by the succession of her Bishops from the Apostles, who were themselves the Divinely-appointed ἐπίσκοποι from whom all others since derive their authority and commission. In sacramental form, this transmission, known as the Apostolic succession, is conveyed through the "laying on of hands" by three or more Bishops, as set forth by Canon in the Council of Nice. In spiritual efficacy the succession is transmitted by the HOLY GHOST, who gives His seal to the external act of the laying on of hands for the continuation of the Apostolic ministry, the conservation of the Apostolic faith, and the perpetual witness to the Resurrection.

The word itself is accommodated from the Greek, and signifies overship. In the New Testament the title ἐπίσκοπος is applied interchangeably to Bishops and Presbyters; but as, when the last of the original twelve had passed away, the name Apostle, signifying any one who had been sent, was thenceforth confined to those who had first borne it under CHRIST, in like manner ἐπίσκοποι, or Bishops, came to designate those only who were the Apostles' successors in rank and order. Episcopacy is thus the Apostolic regimen, which was formally instituted by our LORD when He gave to the first ministry its commission in the words, accompanied by solemn action, "Receive ye the HOLY GHOST. As my FATHER hath sent Me, so send I you." That this commission was not intended by Him to be limited to those on whom it was originally conferred, but was to be extended to their successors, is seen by the promise which ac-accompanied it: "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world."

Although Episcopacy was thus constituted, in its original membership, in one order, it was invested by its Divine Author (as appeared soon by Apostolic sanction and practice) not only with the power of self-perpetuation, but of setting apart other orders of clergy inferior in spiritual power and dignity to itself. Hence by Episcopacy is understood generally the threefold ministry of Bishops, Priests, and Deacons, derived by an unbroken succession from the Apostles.

From the oneness of this threefold ministry, always existing from age to age and inhering in its original and highest order, comes, as a corollary, the primitive principle of the Church's concrete unity.

Thus St. Ignatius (circa 106 A.D.) writes to the Philadelphians: "Take ye heed to have but one Eucharist. For there is one flesh of our Lord JESUS CHRIST, and one cup to show the unity of His blood; one altar; as there is one Bishop, along with the Presbytery and Deacons."

This threefold ministry in the Christian Church was held by many in ancient times to harmonize with, and even to fulfill in a completed and more highly spiritual and perfect form and function, the ancient Levitical institution of the priesthood. Some of the earliest writers do not scruple to apply the title of High-Priest to the Bishop, and of Levite to the Deacon. To this Hooker seems to refer approvingly when he says, "Bishops are now as High-Priests were then in regard to power over other Priests; and in respect of subjection unto High-Priests, what Priests were then the same now Presbyters are, by reason of their place under Bishops."

Against the Papal or Italian theory of Episcopacy, viz., that all other Bishops are by Divine appointment made inferior in spiritual authority and order to him who is the alleged successor of St. Peter; and that our Lord conferred on St. Peter a primacy and spiritual principality which made the throne of his successors for all time the Divinely recognized centre of unity and fountain of authority for the Universal Church, the Anglican Communion utters her protest. She maintains, with the ancient Church, the absolute Unity of the Episcopate, and the consequent equality of all Bishops in respect of spiritual order and function. She adopts the rule of St. Cyprian (circa 240 A.D.) as her own: "Episcopatus unus est; Cujus a singulis in solidum pars tenetur,"—"The Episcopate is one; each part of which is held by each member for the substantial whole." From this principle springs her rule of the independence of National Churches, whose independence of any one central human authority, except that of a General Council, which she accepts and appeals to, does not, therefore, make them judges of doctrine, but rather custodians of a doctrine once for all received; each sharing in this regard with the others a common responsibility. The Anglican Communion does indeed accept for convenience' sake and as a Catholic tradition, the ancient arrangement of Provinces, with their Archbishops and Metropolitans, and is not unwilling to accede even to a Primacy which shall be founded upon universal consent claiming no Divine prescription in its favor. But the principle, which she maintains as inherited from the Fathers, of the Unity of the Episcopate, forbids her acceptance of the sovereignty of one Bishop over the rest founded on pretensions of Divine right and superior order which were unknown, as she is firmly persuaded, to primitive times.

As the Apostolate or Episcopate first called and then Divinely commissioned "to send out other faithful men" was the norm of the original Christian ministry, and, as continued in Episcopacy, it has been its alone fountain since, it follows that validity of orders is dependent upon Episcopal consecration, and that no true Episcopacy can exist which has not historic continuity. "It is evident unto all men diligently reading Holy Scripture and ancient authors (says the preface to the Ordinal), "that from the Apostles' time there have been these orders of ministers in CHRIST'S Church, Bishops, Priests, and Deacons." From this fact, simply considered as such, it results, by stress of necessary inference, that the continuity of the faith, sacraments, and discipline of the Church must be in historic connection with the same order of men who have from the first administered them. Accordingly the preface to the Ordinal first referred to continues: "No man shall be accounted or taken to be a lawful Bishop, Priest, or Deacon in this Church, or suffered to execute any of the said functions, except he be called, tried, examined, and admitted thereunto according to the form hereafter following (i.e., the forms for making Bishops, Priests, and Deacons), or hath had Episcopal consecration or ordination." In this rule the English Church and our own do but echo what St. Ignatius, in the second century, wrote to the Smyrnaeans: "Let that (says St. Ignatius) be deemed a proper Eucharist which is administered either by the Bishop or by one to whom he has intrusted it." And again: "Wherever the Bishop shall appear, there let the multitude of the people also be."

The objection that is commonly brought against Episcopacy as necessarily "unchurching" all who do not receive it, has no value or force as an argument against it. Those who hold such are not responsible for inferences that may be drawn from it. But aside from this consideration, this Church maintains that all who are baptized are made in baptism "members of CHRIST," and she declines to dogmatize upon the question of God's sovereign will and power, or to affix limits to the operations of His grace.

On the human side Episcopacy is largely paternal. While it does more than reflect in its spiritual character, rather while it supplies, and in a higher sense fulfills the mission and significance of the Levitical, it is at the same time comprehensive even of the Patriarchal Priesthood. Ruling with such authority as CHRIST's law gives, it should blend with its rule the love, forbearance, and mercifulness of a genuine fatherhood; and as every Bishop is, in Hooker's sense, High-Priest and ruler, so he should be father also over that portion of God's family committed to his care. But Episcopatus unus est; and as Episcopacy viewed as a whole does on its spiritual side symbolize, so should it on the human side, i.e., in the persons of its members, illustrate the Fatherhood of God.

Episcopacy, thus broad in its comprehensiveness, strong in its unity, and paternal in its character and spirit, offers the best remedy for the distractions of the day, in being able to reconcile fidelity to ancient and Catholic truth with the diversities of opinion which, on minor points, reflect the enlarged intelligence of the age and the consequent demands of a greater mental freedom. While on the one hand the rigor of a central and despotic spiritual rule and headship either enfeebles the will or drives it into rebellion, and on the other hand the unchecked license of private judgment de-thrones authority and substitutes, in the end, the reign of rationalism for that of faith; primitive and Catholic Episcopacy, as illustrated in the branches of the Church which maintain it, knows how to reconcile faith with a reasonable exercise of private judgment. "Quod semper ubique et ad omnibus," is with them but the complement of another truth which underlies the entire spirit of their teaching: "In essentials unity, in non-essentials liberty, in all things charity."

Episcopacy is not affected in its spiritual character by the varying civil conditions under which it is found existing in the world. In the Empire, while it remained heathen, it was marked by a greater simplicity than when Christian Rome rebuilt its churches and endowed its Bishopsrics. In England, where alliance with the State gives prestige to the clergy and baronial privileges to the Bishops, it wields a greater influence than in the colonies or in this country, where it is unendowed and free from the honors as from the trammels of the State. But everywhere, and in all times, when not overridden by a despotic ruler, civil or ecclesiastical, Episcopacy has been, to the extent of its ability and the measure of its light, the conservator of ancient law and the promoter of present and reasonable liberty. It suffers to-day, in this land, from many popular encroachments, as in the past it has suffered from usurpations of another and very different kind. But it is destined to endure. It has the Divine promise, "Lo,

I am with you always, even unto the end of the world.

Episcopate, List of the Anglican and Eastern.

The Essential Unity of the Church of Christ, for which every Christian should pray, for which our LORD pleaded in the night in which He was betrayed, is ever presented before Him in the Church's service.

"We humbly beseech Thee . . . to inspire continually the Universal Church with the spirit of truth, unity, and concord; and grant that all those who do confess Thy Holy Name may agree in the truth of Thy Holy Word, and live in unity and godly love."

"They are one in their One Original from which they continually and unchangeably derive their being. They adore GOD, the FATHER, SON, and HOLY GHOST, with the same new song of the Gospel; they confess Him in the same words of Apostolic Faith; they offer to Him the same incense of praise, and the same Holy Offering whereof Malachi foretold, 'from the rising of the sun even unto the going down of the same,' pleading on earth to the Eternal FATHER that One Sacrifice as presented in heaven; they receive the same 'Bread which came down from Heaven to give life to the world.' Unknown in face, in place separate, different in language, opposed, alas! in some things to one another, still before the throne of GOD they are One Holy Catholic Apostolic Church; each several portion praying for itself and for the rest, united in the prayers and oblation which it offers for all, by the One Bread and the One Spirit which dwelleth in all."—Dr. Pusey.

In the following list of the Anglican and Eastern Communions, the first place is given to the Anglican Churches, than which we believe that, to say the least, none come nearer, in all essential respects, to the Primitive Church. Then come the "Old Catholic" Churches, professing, as do the Anglican, to hold fast all Catholic doctrine, while, and therefore, rejecting the innovations of later days. In grouping these Churches together, it is not meant to be implied that they all carry out to like extent their good purpose. The Eastern Orthodox Churches have, in good degree, preserved the Christian traditions of the first ages. Among those set down as "Other Churches" are some whose doctrinal position has been questioned, others the validity of whose orders has been disputed. It may well be that, with fuller information on points of which we know too little, some at least of these objections may be found to have come from misconceptions.

In the list of the Anglican Episcopate, care has been taken as to the due arrangement in Ecclesiastical Provinces.

The Bishops of Roman, Chotza,
Rimnik on the Alouta, Ardjetsch,
Bizya, Stratonicia.

THE BULGARIAN CHURCH.

(This Church is not recognized as in communion with Constantinople.) "The Exarch of Bulgaria," having under him the Metropolitans of

Widdin,	Lophitzus,
Varna-Prestilava,	Tirnova,
Samocab,	Bratch,
Castentil,	Philippopolis,
Sophia,	Slivno,
Dorostolo-Tchervlen,	Adrianople.

There are also two Vicar Bishops and two Bishops retired from their Sees.

THE ARMENIAN CHURCH.*

"The Supreme Catholics of all the Armenians, exercising special jurisdiction in Russia and Persia," has under him the Archbishops of

Erivan,	Bessarabia and New
Tiflis,	Nakikheran,
Karabagh,	Tabriz,
Zhirvan,	Ispahan and Calcutta,
Astrachan,

together with an Archbishop and five Bishops without Sees, residing at Etchmiadzin as members of the Holy Synod.

* The Armenian, Syrian, Coptic, Abyssinian, and Assyrian Churches have long been thought to have departed widely in essential matters from the Catholic faith. It would appear, however, that their doctrines are, to say the least, much less erroneous than has been supposed. Further information in regard to them is much to be desired.

The Patriarch of Constantinople has under him the Archbishops of Brousa, Van.

The Bishops of Adrianople, Moosh,
 Sivas, Balekissar,
 Cesarea, Trebizond,
 Urho, or Edessa, The Convent of Ar-
 Harpoot, mash,
 Smyrna, The Convent of Surp
 Arapkir, Daniel,
 Erzinguian, The Convent of Mag-
 Rhodosto, hapayetzolz-Vank.

The following Sees in the Patriarchate are vacant, and in charge of Vicars :

Aguen, Amasea-Marzuan, Angora, Aphion, Kara-Hissar, Arghen, Babert, Babylon, Bagdad, Bayazid, Biledjig, Bitlis, Charsand-jak, Chenkoosh, Diarbekir, Djanig, Egypt and Alexandria, Erzeroum, Givindj-Moosh, Gurin, Hassan-Kale, Kars, Keghi, Kemack,
 Kutahia, Moldo-Wallachia, Nicomedia,
 Palu, Papert, Shaborn, Kara-Hissar, Siourt, Tertchan, Themesyadzak, Tokat, Varna.

The Patriarch of Jerusalem.

The Patriarch of Sis, having under him the Bishops of Hadjin, Yozghad,

 Malatia, Zeitoun.
 Adana,

The following Sees in this Patriarchate are vacant, and in charge of Vicars :

Aintab, Aleppo, Antioch, Behesne, Derende, Divringhi, Gurium, Halys, Husnimansur, Marash.

The Patriarch of Akhtamar, having under him the Bishops of Limm-Anabat, Guedontz-Anabat.

THE SYRIAN CHURCH.

(Commonly called the Jacobite Church.)
 "The Patriarch of Antioch (resides at the Convent of Zaaferan, near Mardin), having under him the Metropolitans of Jerusalem, Damascus,
 Mosul, Constantinople,
 The Convent of Mar Egypt (the Convent of Mattai near Mosul, Mar Behnam), Jezirah, Boudgia,
 Nisibis, Bishirri,
 Midyat, Aleppo,
 Diarbekir, Adana,
 Harpoot, Malabar (in India).
 Oorfa,

THE COPTIC CHURCH.

"The Patriarch of Egypt, Jerusalem the Holy City, Nubia, Abyssinia, the five Western Cities (i.e. the Pentapolis), and all the Preaching of St. Mark," having under him the Metropolitans of Cairo, Kouds (the Holy City, Lower Egypt, Jerusalem), Menouf (Memphis), and the Bishops of Fayoum and Beh- Abuteg, mase, Aschumin,

 Miniyeh, Kos,
 Kuskam, Esna and Luxor.
 Manfalout, Khartoum and Nubia.
 Siout,

THE ABYSSINIAN CHURCH.

The Metropolitan of the Abyssinian Church is called "The Abouna." The office is now vacant, and the Church is in charge of an Archbishop and two Bishops.

THE ASSYRIAN CHURCH.

(Commonly called the Nestorian Church.)
 "The Patriarch of the Chaldeans and of the East." (Resides at Kocbanes.)

He has under him at

Be Sheems Ood-Deen,	4 Metropolitans.
Ooromiah,	3 "
Berwari,	2 "
Jelu,	1 Metropolitan.
Gawar,	1 "
Doori,	1 "

THE CHURCH OF SWEDEN.*

Upsala.—The Archbishop of Upsala, Primate of Sweden. Under him are the Bishops of

Linkoping,	Lund,
Skara,	Gothemburg,
Strengas,	Calmar,
Westeras,	Hermosand,
Wexio,	Wisby.

THE CHURCH IN FINLAND.

Abo.—The Archbishop of Abo. Under him are the Bishops of Borgo, Kuefico.

THE MORAVIAN CHURCH.*

This Church has no Diocesan Bishop. In the German Province it has five Bishops, in the British three Bishops, in the American four Bishops, in the West India Mission Province one Bishop.

REV. C. R. HALE, S.T.D.

Epistle. 1. A letter. Chiefly the Epistles of St. Paul, St. James, St. Peter, St. Jude, and St. John in the New Testament. These were letters called forth by various circumstances, which were addressed by the writers to the several Churches or persons needing the teaching, advice, or warning contained in them. St. Paul's fourteen Epistles cover nearly all the ground of Christian doctrine and practice. Each of them has some special doctrinal subject except that to Philemon, while some of them are more largely hortatory than others. In doctrine we may group together Romans, Galatians and the three Epistles of the Roman imprisonment, Ephesians, Philippians, and Colossians, and the Epistle to the Hebrews. The two to the Thessalonians and the two to the Corinthians may be classed as hortatory and minatory. The two to Timothy and that to Titus are upon Church government, but both doctrinal and hortatory topics are included. While that to Philemon is an intercession in behalf of Onesimus. The Catholic (or Encyclical) Epistles of St.

* The Orders of these Churches, fully believed in by some, are seriously questioned by others, who have examined into their validity.

James, St. Peter, St. John, and St. Jude are chiefly hortatory upon the principles of Christian life, as works (St. James), practical duties (St. Peter), minatory (St. Jude), love (St. John). There is but little certainty as to the year in which either of these Epistles in the New Testament were written, except in the date of the Epistle to the Romans, but we know with certainty enough within what limits of the Apostolic age they must have been written. The approximate dates of the Epistles are as follows:

1 Thessalonians.....	53 A.D.
2 Thessalonians.....	54 A.D.
1 Corinthians.....	57 A.D.
2 Corinthians.....	57 A.D.
Galatians.....	57 A.D.
Romans.....	58 A.D.
Ephesians.....	62 A.D.
Colossians.....	63 A.D.
Philippians.....	63 A.D.
St. James.....	62 A.D.
Philemon.....	63 A.D.
1 Peter.....	64 A.D.
Jude.....	65 A.D.
2 Peter.....	65 A.D.
Hebrews, 1 Timothy, }.....	{ 66 to 68 A.D.
Titus, 2 Timothy, }
St. John's Epistles, after.....	98 A.D.

These dates are, after all, but approximations, except in the case of the Epistle to the Romans, whose date is so nearly ascertained that it forms one of the points from which the other data of the Apostle's life may be fixed. The dates of St. John's Epistles are wholly conjectural. The other dates have an approximate and a very probable accuracy.

II. But this title, Epistle, is used to designate that portion of Scripture (usually from the Epistles of the New Testament) which is read before the Gospel for each Sunday, holy, or fast-day in the Church's year. It is so called because it is very generally taken from the Epistles.

This selection of sections of the Epistles for each Sunday, holy-day, saints' day, and fast-day must have, in principle at least, been an early custom. The Epistles and Gospels, arranged nearly as we now use them for the Sundays, are found in the book attributed to St. Jerome,—the Comes (vide Comes). But there must have been an earlier use, though it probably varied in different Dioceses. Basil the Great (389 A.D.) comments on Matt. ii. 1–12 as the Gospel for the Feast of the Epiphany; Gregory Nozianzen on Acts ii. 1–13 as Epistle for Whit-Sunday. Ambrose refers to portions of Scripture selected for Christmas-day and Feast of the Epiphany and St. John's day, which are identical with our own. These show a concurrent usage before the year 400 A.D. If the Comes is St. Jerome's work and brought to us from Gaul, as seems likely, then our Epistles and Gospels now are of ancient British use and were found here by Augustine the Monk in 596 A.D.

As the Epistle was taken usually from some portion of the Apostolic writing, the Liturgies called it "the Apostel."

The Epistles and Gospels were chosen with very great care to illustrate, first, the two great divisions of the Christian year,—the Sundays from Advent to Trinity-Sunday, and then the Sundays after Trinity; and, second, and more in detail, to fit in with the glorious recital of our LORD's redemptive acts from Advent to Pentecost. His acts are presented with an inspired fitness in the selections of the Gospels, and the Epistles are the practical comment upon the history or parable in the Gospel. The original idea of the harmony between the two Scriptures in the mind of the persons who arranged them is not in all cases very clear at first sight to us now. But a little study will often show that there does exist such a special fitness between the two.

These Epistles are not always selected from the Apostolic writings; but some are taken from other books of the Bible, according to their fitness for the lesson to be given on the days for which they are appointed.

The Epistles for these two Sundays are taken from other Scriptures:

Whit-Sunday, Acts ii. 1;
Trinity-Sunday, Rev. iv. 1.

The Epistles on Fast-days from other Scriptures are:

Ash-Wednesday, Joel ii. 12; Monday before Easter, Is. lxiii. 1; Tuesday, Is. l. 5.

The Epistles for Holy-days from other Scriptures are:

Monday in Easter-week, Acts x. 34; Tuesday, Acts xiii. 26; Ascension-day, Acts i. 1; Monday in Whitsun-week, Acts x. 34; Tuesday, Acts viii. 14.

The Epistles for Saints' days, taken from other Scriptures, are:

St. Stephen, Acts vii. 55; Innocents, Rev. xiv. 1; Conversion of St. Paul, Acts ix. 1; Purification, Mal. iii. 1; St. Matthias, Acts i. 15; Annunciation, Is. vii. 10; St. Barnabas, Acts xi. 22; St. John Baptist, Is. xl. 1; St. Peter, Acts xii. 1; St. James, Acts xi. 27; St. Bartholomew, Acts v. 12; St. Michael and All-Angels', Rev. xii. 7; All-Saints', Rev. vii. 2. Also in the Ordinal for Deacons, Acts vi. 2 may be read in the Ordinal for Bishops; the alternate Epistle is from Acts xx. 17. The Puritans at the Savoy Conference objected to the heading as it then stood, "the Epistle, Acts," etc., for the Acts and the Prophets were not Epistolary Scriptures at all, and charged that it was a falsehood to say here beginneth the Epistle written in Acts or in other Scripture than an actual Epistle; so, to remove all objection, the heading in such places was changed to "For the Epistle," and the rubric in the Communion office was changed also to agree with this alteration.

Epistoler. The Priest or Deacon who reads the Epistle. Where there are two clergymen present at a service, the one who reads the Epistle should stand on the south side of the Holy Table, while the Gospeler stands on the north side. An old custom was when there was but one clergyman officiating, that he should read the Epistle from the south side, and then cross to the north side to read the Gospel.

Epoch. An era; a cycle of time, or a series of events having a closer interconnection and sequence than other events forming an era in history. These are variously described by different historians, as each groups historical facts or appreciates the boundaries of the different eras in the world's career. The word epoch is applied almost indifferently with the word era to the same general divisions, but more usually it is used with the date of the creation of the world, according to Archbishop Ussher, and in our Bibles on the margin, B.C. 4004, with the date of the deluge usually given as 2349 B.C. But these epochs are discussed in the article CHRONOLOGY.

Erastianism. Erastus, a physician of Baden (1524-88 A.D.), who asserted the authority of secular legislation over the Church. It was a reaction from the opposite theory of Calvin. It was a favorite principle of the Independents against the Presbyterians, and seems to have been taken as a refuge from the natural claim of Divine authority set up by each dominant sect. It really destroys all true conception of the foundation and functions of the Church, making it a creature of the State, and reducing its work to one but little more important than that of doing a sort of moral police duty. Erastianism will always exist as a reaction against extravagant and bigoted conceptions of Divine authority in the Church; but especially, whenever any sect obtains a controlling power, it will be held by opponents. The Church of England, because of the aid it receives from the State to enforce its Canons, has become at times deeply tinged with Erastian notions, especially among the statesmen who give their aid or influence to her work. But it is not true to charge the Church as countenancing any such principle in any way. In this country, with the utter separation between Church and State, it would seem impossible that such ideas could become at all prevalent, yet the current view of those outside of the Church is practically an Erastian view.

Eschatology. The Revelation concerning the Last Things, and the doctrines and conclusions drawn from it. These "Last Things" are Second Advent, Judgment, Death, Hell, Resurrection, Heaven, State of Souls in the future world, and the Millennium. Purgatory and other "fond things vainly invented" concerning the Last Things cannot be discussed here. To us as we are living in time, the eternal world around us, but beyond our spiritual grasp or comprehension, must be in the future. So however present in God's Presence all things are, yet the Judgment, Heaven, and our eternal Condition must be treated by us as of the "Last Things." Since Death is not only a physical act, but involves spiritual acts and conditions, that must be the starting-point for us in considering the end of all things. What lies beyond? Revelation has really given us central facts and has added but few details. As these several facts can here be only enumerated, and will be discussed under their several titles more fully, it will be only necessary to give the definition of each here, and it is hardly needed to load the page with texts familiar to every Christian.

I. The Place of Departed Spirits. The Greek translations of the Old Testament and the Evangelists call it by its heathen name Hades. It is unfortunately (now by the drift of language principally) translated Hell in King James's Version. Hades (A. V. grave) in the Old Testament is for the Hebrew Sheol. It is in the New Testament also called (1 Pet. iii. 19) a guard-house (prison A. V.). It is divided into two, (a) Abraham's bosom, or Paradise. (b) That side parted off by an impassable gulf,—the place of sorrow and torment, or Tartarus (2 Pet. ii. 4), the lowest abyss of pain and despair.

II. The Second Advent. The revelation is clear and emphatic. It is the sole prophecy embodied in the Creed: "He shall come to judge the quick and the dead."

III. The Millennium. So many commentators differ upon the place of the Millennium, whether before or after the Second Advent, that it is best to refer the discussion of it all to that title.

IV. The Resurrection, involved in and consequent upon the Second Advent.

V. Judgment. The immediate purpose of the Resurrection.

VI. Heaven. The award to those who die in the Lord given at the Bar of Judgment.

VII. Hell. The sentence passed upon the wicked at the same time.

VIII. A further discussion which involves the last two topics, but must be noticed under a different title, is the States of Heaven and of Hell.

Several minor topics, Angels of Judgment, the physical, mental, and spiritual nature of the joys or pains in the future of the Soul after Judgment, the seat of Heaven or of Hell, are really speculative topics. But it is to be clearly noted that there is no final conciliar declaration by the Church defining what CHRIST has chosen to leave so indefinitely described. The Resurrection and the Life of the world to come, in the Creeds, is the nearest definition. She has chosen to declare upon this whole class of subjects, and upon these her words are clear and positive.

Esdra. The Apocryphal books numbered 1 and 2 Books of Esdras. They were very generally rejected in the Primitive Church, though they were quoted by some with approval. Jerome, however, rejected them with decision. The absurdities, the contradictions, not only of the Canonical Scriptures, but of the facts as recorded in profane history, are such as to destroy their claim to any historical value. The first Book seems to be a rearrangement, according to the compiler's idea of the sequence of events, of the sacred history from the last two chapters of 2 Chronicles to the close of the books of Ezra and Nehemiah, whose contents he has altered and mistaken. Its facts may have had some basis as isolated occurrences, but the book is worthless historically. The second Book of Esdras is quite as valueless historically, though it is a record of Jewish dreams and anticipations at the period of its composition. The precise date is not known, but it lies about 25 B.C. and 110 A.D. It is influenced in its numerous interpolations, and, if it be by different writers, in later editions by the Christian Scriptures. (An excellent account of these two books is to be found in Smith's Bible Dictionary.)

Esposals. The Betrothal. There is a distinction between Marriage and Esposals. Esposals were binding indeed, but preceded the Marriage ceremony often for years. The ancient Canon Law recognized this and acted upon it. But its basis was to be found in the Old Testament (e.g., Jeremiah ii. 2; Hosea ii. 19, 20), where it is used typically of God binding His Church to Himself, and in the New Testament, where St. Paul tells the Corinthians that as a bridesman he has espoused them to CHRIST (2 Cor. xi. 2). There are only passing references to the esposals or betrothal, in the Law, as a fact, e.g., "a betrothed damsel." But Eleazar, Abraham's steward, betrothed Rebecca for Isaac with formal presents, jewelry, and raiment (Gen. xxiv.). The forms of betrothal are only dwelt upon by the prophets, and then in a very slight and allusive manner, most fully, however, in Ezek. xvi. 10-13; compare Rev. xxi. 2.

Established Church. The idea of the "Established Church" is misunderstood very often. It is not that any government ever imagined the absurdity that it could establish the Church, but that religion being necessary to the well-being of the State, the Church was recognized, protected, and allied to the State by law. Its officers received political recognition, and part of the revenues of the State went to its support. Its canons and discipline were enforced by civil enactments, and in time the State had great influence in the affairs of the Church. This joining of Church and State began in the time of Constantine (320-350 A.D.). The alliance was not at all at variance with the notions then current. It was inherited from the protection pagan religions received by becoming State religions, and in their ideas of religion it was an indifferent matter whether they worshiped Jupiter, or Serapis, or Astarte. These notions being current, to divorce Church and State would have seemed to them an unnatural proceeding. That this alliance should ever have been formed, and that the Church ever should be recognized as the religion of the State established by law, is to us quite as unnatural. Yet it was inherited from the Jewish Church, and in it was involved the popular idea of orthodoxy. In fact, the Church and State, both in New England and in the other colonies, was a constitutional fact, and the final severance of the State from religious affairs was effected, e.g., in Massachusetts in the early decades of this century. The perverted idea that the State created the Church only shows how little attention is paid to history.

Esther. The Queen of Ahasuerus,—a very remarkable character. Noble, lovely, deeply devout, obedient even in the king's harem to the traditions of her race, she was probably not raised to the rank of the Queens of Persia, but was chief among the royal concubines, whose state was within that of a real marriage, who yet had no political rank. Her patriotism and wisdom were of the greatest use to her people in their dire need. Her grace and loveliness and exquisite charms are told in such simple language, that we see how holily she bore her honors in the midst of a licentious court. She is to be judged by the ideas and manners of her age and surroundings, and under this test she is one of the fairest characters in Holy Scripture.

Book of Esther.—Its author is not known, but may have been Mordecai, the Queen's uncle. The minute details given, both historical, social, and personal, make this conjecture quite probable. The book of Esther was brought from Babylon and placed in the Canon by Ezra, and put afterwards under the (later) arrangement of the Hagiographa (which see). The simple, straightforward flow of the narrative is strongly marked, while the strangeness of the incidents and the picture of the manners of the sensual despot, the audacity and superstition of Haman, the passive, proud bearing of the Jew, are all fully borne out by what is well authenticated of that time. That Ahasuerus is the Xerxes of the Grecian war is quite clear, and gives to this book almost the appearance of touching upon profane history. In another way, too, this coincidence of time has a curious relation to its contents. The name of God does not occur in it, though fasting, prayer, and weeping attest the devoutness of the Jews in their danger. But we have a book placed in the inspired Canon which does not draw aside the veil, as is done in so many other books, and does not show us the presiding care and watchful Providence, but leaves that to be surely inferred from the events of the history itself. In this respect it is to be most highly valued. The translation of Esther in the Septuagint is interpolated, and contains some items which were very likely traditional.

Latter Chapters of (Apocrypha).—These chapters contain a supposed dream of Mordecai, in which Esther is likened to a little fountain which became a river, an account of the conspiracy against the king, and Mordecai's revelation of it, the king's letters to destroy the Jews, and the prayers of Mordecai and Esther to the God of Israel. There is also a description of Esther's intercession with the king, and of the king's mercy to her people. Mordecai's pedigree is also given. These apocryphal additions may have arisen in part on account of the desire of the Jews "to dwell upon the events of the Babylonish captivity, and especially upon the Divine interpositions in their behalf." Traditions would be ripe. The most popular, or most historical, or those by the most eminent authors, or the most ancient stories, and those which fed the love of national greatness, might obtain special authority. The deliverance of the Jews by Mordecai and Esther would be a favorite subject. The chapters in the Apocrypha are not found in the Hebrew or Chaldee. They were written in Greek, translated into Latin, and were a "part of the Italic, or old Latin version in use before the time of Jerome." They are thought by Horne to be "evidently the production of an Hellenistic Jew."

Eternity. In a strict sense, and as it relates to God, eternity has neither beginning nor end. As regards human beings, it has a beginning but no end. "One day is with the LORD as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day" (2 St. Pet. iii. 8). As Estius "expresses it, all eternity is one day." (Liddon's Bampton Lectures on our LORD's Divinity, p. 301, note.) Ages are lost in eternity. No human being can grasp the idea fully, because he measures things by comparing them with the finite things about him.

Addison (Spectator, No. 590) calls eternity a line which has neither beginning nor end. The present time he says has been wisely compared to an isthmus in the midst of an ocean. He allows the division into an eternity past and an eternity to come. While this is not strictly scientific, it is convenient, and desirable as a help in grasping the subject.

The incessant anticipation of the human mind has been adduced as a proof that it is fitted for future endless existence. Cato calls it, "This longing after immortality." Time, like a constantly flowing stream, ever rolls on, but it empties into the ocean of eternity.

Eternity is constantly spoken of as future, but we are already in it. Aubrey de Vere (The Subjective Difficulties in Religion) uses this illustration. Eternity is not a prolongation of time, but a vaster sphere clasping a smaller one, and reaching with its penetrating influences to beings at once inclosed within both.

Still time, as but a piece of eternity, so to speak, is transient. Thucydides may speak of a possession for eternity, and Keats of the "joy forever" that springs from "a thing of beauty," but nothing earthly can abide, and outward adorning must perish, as the earth itself, which hastens on to destruction.

In striving to catch an idea of eternity by means of time, astronomy comes to our aid. The thought of heavenly bodies which have kept their appointed courses for thousands of years, while men and nations have vanished from the earth like forest leaves, is a step towards the knowledge of that infinite duration which none can perfectly search out. The idea of Huygenius, that there may be stars whose light has not reached us since creation, is one of the vastest that may be imagined.

When it is considered that time is measured by the revolutions of the heavenly bodies, and yet that the period during which they have revolved in space since the creation is as nothing in comparison with an eternity past, the subject assumes a majestic and overpowering aspect. A spectacle of the starry heavens belittles man in his own estimation, as David expresses it in the eighth Psalm: "When I consider Thy heavens, the work of Thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which Thou hast ordained; what is man, that Thou art mindful of him? and the son of man, that Thou visitest him?" But he fails not to add, "For Thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honor." When the Blessed SAVIOUR declares that the very hairs of our head are numbered, God's peculiar care is evident over apparent creatures of a day, who are, however, only waiting on the threshold of eternity.

As character can never change in a future state of existence, the "ornament of a meek and quiet spirit," which may be attained in this life, will beautify the next; the charity, which never faileth hereafter, is to be learned and practiced here. In the eternal loss of earthly things by death are foreshadowed the irrecoverable losses met with during life by reason of wastefulness, forfeiture, dishonor, robbery, or defective title. When men daily see the fearful effect of improper actions on this present life, what can be said of the supreme folly and utter madness of those who treat the passing hour as if it were given them merely for pleasure, or sin, and even crime, careless as to the conditions of a future state commensurate with the existence of God, in which they are to continue to be the same persons essentially as they have been on earth? "For evermore!" (Rev. i. 18.) "Words easily uttered, but in comprehension vaster than human thought can grasp, till man, entering upon eternity, shall rise to faculties fitted for the scene! 'For evermore'; for an existence to which the age of the earth, of the starry heavens, of the whole vast universe is less than a morning dream; for a life which, after the reiteration of millions of centuries, shall begin the endless race with the freshness of infancy, and all the eagerness that welcomes enjoyments ever new. The blight of all our earthly pleasures is decay; our suns have scarcely risen when they set; we have but just persuaded ourselves that we are happy when the happiness is vanished. Pining after something that will endure, we are not to be forever disappointed; born for eternity, eternity shall surely be ours. But, oh!—horrible thought!—if all this tendency to the eternal, this longing for everlasting mansions, be to any of us but the prophetic twilight, the forecast shadow of unending darkness! oh! agony insufferable, if the eternal life of CHRIST—the Christian's warrant of justification, of sanctity, of happiness—be but the guarantee of a death as everlasting as His everlasting life; if the prolongation of His divine existence be but the seal and surety of that never-dying death which, by a dread union of opposites, seems described as protracting dissolution itself into immortality!" (Archer Buller's Sermons, First Series, Sermon x.)

When Christianity, with its "life and immortality," presented itself to the notice of Edwin, the Saxon King of the North of England, he held a consultation about it, and a nobleman remarked that he had seen a swallow flying through the king's house, entering one door and passing out of another, while the king sat at supper in the hall, and the fire was burning on the hearth, and a tempest of rain or snow raging without. The bird felt the temporary warmth, and escaped. Such he declared was the life of man without Christianity, buried in darkness as to what preceded or followed it. Hence he advised a consideration of the new doctrine.

On the dark future Christianity sheds its light. While it tells of coming years more numerous than the sands on the sea-shore, it declares that they may all be happy if time is spent in preparation for eternity.

REV. S. F. HOTCHKIN.

Ethics, Christian. In order to get a distinct idea of Christian Ethics we must consider it in relation to "the Law." In St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, he contrasts "the Law" very sharply with the Gospel, or with the grace which came by JESUS CHRIST (Rom. iii. to v.). There can be no doubt but that St. Paul in this discussion had in view chiefly the Jewish Law. But the Law of the Jews, the laws or religions of all other nations, and the Law of nature as indicated in Natural Theology and in Moral Philosophy were viewed in common, so that what St. Paul says of the one is applicable with certain modifications and with greater force to all the others.

Moral Philosophy tries to find from a study of man's nature the circumstances under which he lives, the ideal of perfection at which he ought to aim, and the laws and rules of life and duty for men. It appeals to the ideal as a motive, and often doing what it can to excite and cultivate the best motives, it leaves the result to depend on will force, upon the power or the weakness, as it may happen to be, of each one's own will,—his power of self-control and of personal exertion. Its rule is justice,—a law of equality or of rights. It has no idea of forbearance, of pardon, of mercy, or of help from above. Its tendency is therefore to produce rather a sternness of character than the more amiable disposition and that softness of character at which Christianity aims. It tends to puff one up with pride, self-reliance, in view of what he has attained or done for himself, rather than make him humble and self-denying, in view of what has been done for him.

All heathen religions were alike in this very important respect; their ideal of life was not very high; and although they taught and inculcated some form of worship to the gods in which they believed, they did not ascribe to their gods the very highest excellence of character; nor did they teach their devotees to look to their gods for spiritual help. The heathens prayed to their gods and worshiped them with sacrifices, but the help they sought was deliverance from some present evil or some future impending calamity of a temporal or purely physical and bodily nature. For purity of heart, and inward strength to resist temptation and to do right, they relied on themselves, so far as they had any thought or care for such things. They did not expect nor seek for any help from the gods in which they believed, or from their religion, in this direction. Hence their religion can hardly be regarded as a help to their morality, or to their efforts at moral purity and moral excellence. And in many cases its influence was quite the reverse. Their religion often led and even compelled them to acts which the very instincts of their nature abhorred, and it familiarized their minds with such vices by ascribing them to their gods.

The Jewish religion, while it was unmeasurably superior to all the others in most respects, was much like them in the one that we have chiefly in view now. It was a religion of law and not of grace. It did indeed inculcate the idea of God's moral excellence, not only His power, but His purity, His goodness, and His righteousness and justice in all things. This idea exerted a most powerful influence for good on the Jewish mind. It was a help upward and not a debasing influence, tending downward, as did all the heathen religions. And, too, the Jewish system of sacrifices was intended as a help and served that end. It inculcated the idea of sin as constituting personal ill desert on the part of the offender, and that all our unhappiness and misfortunes in this world come either directly from our own faults and sins, or indirectly from the sins and transgressions of GOD's most righteous laws by others with whom we are most intimately connected. It recognized the impossibility of ever living up to the perfect standard, and of fulfilling all the requirements of the Law. In view of this fact, it made a fuller and clearer revelation of that Law, in order that the people might better understand what to do, but more especially, and above all in importance, for our present purpose, it provided sacrifices of such a nature that there was no one who could not provide the victim that was required, and have it offered for him as an atonement or expiation for his sins and shortcomings. There was thus a help to the performance of duty, and a means of escape from the penalty and punishment which this view of the Divine justice could not but force upon them as a consequence of their transgressions and the failures in duty, which, after they had done their very best, would sometimes occur; but this was rather a help by way of escape from deserved punishment than a means or help to greater purity and holiness of heart or life. Immeasurably superior therefore as the Jewish religion was to all others, in these two respects it falls, nevertheless, far below the Christian religion, in the one respect of inward help and grace.

It does not come within our present purpose to discuss the matter of the Jewish sacrifices and contrast them with the one Sacrifice of our LORD, in reference to their efficiency in securing forgiveness of sins and Divine favor. The contrast which we wish now to pursue is of a different nature. The Jewish religion put into the foreground the Law to be fulfilled. It presented all rites and sacrifices of this religion as a help, a means to either fulfilling the Law or making amends and atonement for its non-fulfillment. The Christian religion, on the other hand, put into the foreground, and in the most conspicuous position, "the grace" that is to help us. This is indeed a fuller disclosure of the love of God and the more attractive attributes of His character, if we may properly so speak of them. There is also a fuller revelation of the future life and of what depends there upon our conduct here. But all these things serve only to strengthen motives. Over and above this there is a fuller exhibition of the efficiency and the sufficiency of the sacrifice which God has provided for us, and the assurance of Divine help by the inward operations of the HOLY GHOST in the heart of every one that truly believes and will submit himself to that holy influence. And this, what the Law, the natural law of morality, or the Jewish Law, with rites and sacrifices, could not do, through no fault of its own, but on account of the weakness of the flesh, CHRIST hath done for us through grace.

Nor is this all. CHRIST has added to all the motives we had before, and, in addition to the clearer views and brighter hopes of the future life, a motive still stronger and more efficacious in His own example and suffering for us. He said of Himself, signifying what death He should die, "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." This has been found in all experience to be the strongest motive if measured by its influence upon the human heart. Men are touched and drawn by the simple story of the SAVIOUR's life and death for us as they are by no other motive, and often when all other considerations have failed to reach them.

No life on earth was ever so beautiful, no death so tragic as His. The thought of it when truly presented softens and wins the heart and makes one's sins and ingratitude seem too odious to be any longer persisted in. Men and women are melted and won to repentance and newness of life by the consideration of what CHRIST has done and endured for them, when they could not be reached or touched by any consideration of their own imperfections considered as a mere matter of morality and of "law," or by any estimate or apprehension of the consequences of their own guilt as seen merely in the light of nature or of reason. We have, then, as constituting the Christian Ethics, clearer light, stronger motives, and Divine help, the immediate influences of the HOLY GHOST, and the result is, accordingly, a type of Christian character which is peculiar and unlike everything else ever seen anywhere else. The doctrine of the Atonement, of our dependence for salvation upon such a Sacrifice, upon the suffering of such a Person, is well calculated to take away all the pride of self-sufficiency, and to produce a disposition to do and to endure in all humility and submission whatever God's will may require or appoint for us. Then, too, in the promised help we have our trust, and thus accomplish what we might otherwise fail even to undertake through want of confidence and hope of being able to accomplish anything.

Another important peculiarity of Christian Ethics is the fact that the attraction is so much fixed on the motives, and the assurance that right motives are more important than right actions whenever there is, or can be, any doubt about our having both. Our LORD made this contrast very conspicuous in His Sermon on the Mount, by putting three cases in which He contrasted His teaching and the character of His Gospel with the law: "Ye have heard that it was said to them of old time, Thou shalt not kill, . . . but I say unto you, That whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause shall be in danger of the judgment: and whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca, shall be in danger of the council: but whosoever shall say Thou fool, shall be in danger of hell-fire" (St. Matt. v. 21, 22). So likewise with the other two examples that are given in the same connection, the design of our LORD was evidently to impress on His hearers and followers the doctrine that the greatest evil, in the evil of each case, was the motive, the condition of the heart from which the evil act proceeds. Law seeks to prevent wrong acts by prohibiting them and by punishing the offender. The Gospel, on the other hand, while disapproving of the wrong acts not less severely than the Law does, aims rather at making the heart right first,—the tree good that the fruit may be good also. And in the Epistles, especially those of St. Paul, are the doctrines brought out, that we are saved or depend for our salvation rather upon the state of the heart, upon faith, than upon the perfection or merit of any works we can perform.

In fact, in the Christian view there can be no merit properly so called. In the estimation of mere Law merit is possible. The Law prescribes a duty, and the extent to which we are obliged to perform the duty, and, of course, it implies also a limit beyond which we are not to go, or need not go. But the Gospel, by summing all duty in the Ten Commandments, love to God and love to man, removes all these limits; and then by representing an excess of love as impossible it removes all possibility of any limit to obedience. Whatever may be done must be; nor can it ever be regarded as more than duty or as work of supererogation. We may easily come short of Divine requirement, but we can by no possibility and in no conceivable way go beyond it; so that, do what we may, we still have reason to consider ourselves but "unprofitable servants," and, feeling so, to continue to recognize our dependence on Divine grace.

But while Christianity thus directs the attention of the believer to his motives,—the state of his heart, as if that were the most important thing, if not the only thing to be kept in mind,—it clearly recognizes the possibility of self-deception, and of our mistaking or misdirecting our motives. Here it refers to the acts that our motives lead us to perform as the best and only infallible test by which to judge of our motives. "By their fruits ye shall know them" is His statement. And our LORD urges the fact that "A good tree cannot bring forth corrupt fruit, nor a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit." "Men do not gather grapes of thorns, nor figs of thistles." Any system of mere "law" is defective also in another very important point. Such a system can lay down general rules, but it cannot go into the thousand details and "small cases" that will arise in the practical affairs of life. Here for any system of moral rules prescribed as a mere matter of morality there must be a department of "Casuistry," consisting of rules to enable us to decide such questions when they arise. These rules look only to the decision of what we ought to do. And they might be all-sufficient if only we could always be able to decide by means of them when we are really in doubt. But that is impossible as a mere matter of intellect or judgment; we are often still in doubt after we have done all we can. Besides that, there is always the very great danger that we shall be misled by feelings and self-interest in the case.

To meet this difficulty our LORD prepared His "Golden Rule," as it has been called. "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye the same unto them." Now it is not supposed that this rule will guide us to the exact knowledge of right actions and to what ought to be done in all cases, irrespective of motives, but it is a plain and practical guide for us to what it is, in a spiritual point of view, always best for us to do in the circumstances. Considered as a principle of mere morality or moral philosophy, the rule is open to criticism, and quite fairly. But as we come short of our duty mainly from either self-indulgence or self-love, or from deficiency of love towards our neighbors,—while it may not be best for us always in a selfish or worldly point of view to do to others as we would like to have them do to us or for us,—it is better always in a spiritual point of view to err, if we must err at all, on the side or in the direction of self-denial rather than in the direction of self-indulgence, and on the side of generosity towards others than in the direction of selfishness. We had better go beyond the rule,—the mere requirements of Law in the direction of self-denial and generosity,—rather than run any risk of sinning and injuring our own souls by indulging our ease or our pleasures, or pursuing our own private or personal ends to the detriment of others. Whatever we may lose of the things of this life and its enjoyments, honors, or possessions, this we gain in and for the world that is to come. Nor is this all. Even in this life it is seldom the recollection of an occasion of self-indulgence or an act of selfishness affords us any pleasure; but the recollection of generosity or self-denial for the good of others is a never-failing source of enjoyment.

Eucharist. Vide LORD'S SUPPER.

Euchologion. A service book of the Greek Church, containing the offices, rites, and ceremonies of that Church, and corresponding to our own book of Common Prayer. It is the Ritual book for all the greater offices, as the Anthologion contains the hymns and festal offices.

Evangel. The Gospel. The glad tidings of salvation through our LORD. The word is used with the greatest latitude. It may mean but the glad tidings of the Resurrection, or it may embrace the Four Gospels. Any central fact of the whole extent of the Redemptive work of CHRIST may be called an Evangel.

Evangelist. An office in the Apostolic Church,—mentioned three times in the New Testament. St. Philip the Evangelist (Acts xxi. 8) is the only one spoken of as actually exercising it. St. Timothy, who held another office, was bidden to do the work of an Evangelist (2 Tim. iv. 5); and it is enumerated by St. Paul in the passage in the Epistle to the Ephesians (iv. 11), together with other divinely-appointed orders. "And He gave some (to be) Apostles, and some Evangelists, and some prophets," etc. It was not an order in the Church, as were the Apostle, the Presbyter, and the Deacon, but an office connected with them, and exercised by any one who had the proper gift. So St. Philip is one of the seven Deacons, St. Timothy is an Apostle; St. Paul saying of himself and Silvanus and Timothy, "We might have been burdensome as the Apostles of CHRIST" (1 Thess. ii. 6); but they have a special gift,—that of preaching the Gospel, as Evangelists.

The "work of an Evangelist," as the mission intrusted to special men, has been revived in the Church of late years. It is practically an itinerancy. The Evangelist has certain limits assigned him, within which he visits those places where the Church has not yet been preached and searches out those church-members who have been cut off from their privileges and opportunities. Very efficient work has been done by these Evangelists.

Eve. The day before a festival. If a fast is appointed for that day it is a Vigil, if it is not a fast-day it is called an Eve. There are but two Eves observed in the American Church,—Easter-Even and New Year's Eve. The Vigils have been dropped out of our Prayer-Book. According to the old rule, all festivals are preceded by an Eve or a Vigil, including Sundays. All martyrs have Vigils, except those which fall upon Christmas-, Easter-, and Whitsuntide. The other feasts are preceded by Eves. The Collect for the day is said, according to English rule then, on the evening service before, if it be an Eve, but if it be a Vigil, the Collect for the week is recited, and then the Collect of the Feast-day of the morrow.

Eve. The woman whom GOD formed of a rib from Adam's side. Her name is taken from the Hebrew "Havah," living, for she was the mother of all living. Her temptation and fall, and her own tempting Adam in turn, with the fatal results, are most intimately woven into our history, and form the sufficient motive for our redemption. To her was given the promise of the MESSIAH, the restorer, in very enigmatic language, yet she certainly knew somewhat of its import, for she named her first-born Cain,—Acquired, Gotten,—for she said, "I have gotten a man from JEHOVAH." Then when at the birth of her second child she thought herself disappointed, she named him Abel,—Vanity. After Abel's murder, when Seth was given her, she named him so in her gladness. "For GOD hath appointed me another seed instead of Abel whom Cain slew." It is, of course, impossible to say how far she comprehended the promise of the REDEEMER, but that she must have known something of its meaning is but reasonable, both from the names she gave her children and from the use of sacrifice, of the meaning of which she must have been aware. The history about her closes with her joyous naming of Seth (Gen. iv. 25).

Evidences, Christian. In its ordinary and natural significance this expression means any evidence by which Christianity comes to human knowledge, whether in the facts of its origin or in the material of its doctrines; or by act, in these facts and doctrines, it is proved a revelation of Divine truth. Technically, its meaning is more restricted, and has reference more predominately to such evidence defensively exhibited,—evidences of Christianity, called forth in view of objections and difficulties urged against it, misconceptions of friendly inquiries, misrepresentations of enemies. At the same time, from the very nature of the case, and manifested in every great period of conflict, the defense, as part of a successful defensive movement, becomes an assault; such assault involving the positive exhibition of Christianity, by contrast, and as superior to the opposing, and all other systems. Even in such case, however, the expression "Evidences of Christianity," or "Apologetics," its more recent equivalent, carries with it predominantly to ordinary readers its technical and more restricted meaning. Thus taken we recognize the necessity for such Christian evidences, or evidential defense, in its first contact with Jewish and Heathen feeling and thought, in their respective communities. While to a large portion of what afterwards became the Jewish discipleship, there was no existing prejudice, nor even specific knowledge of the person and ministry of JESUS, and the task of the Apostolic teacher, as with Philip to the Eunuch, was simply to show from the Old Testament Scriptures that "this JESUS was the CHRIST," yet with others there was a very different condition of things. Many of them, and this more peculiarly the case with Palestinian Judaism, were full of bitter animosity against Christian doctrine. Looking upon Christianity as a system of imposture, upon its object of loyalty and devotion as a teacher of falsehood, a blasphemous claimant of Messianic and Divine honors, they were not only indisposed to any reception of its claims, but were ready to use all means to arrest its progress. Saul of Tarsus was the type of a class by no means small or insignificant. This class it was by which he himself was so bitterly opposed during his subsequent career. And in his defenses of himself, as a preacher of Christianity, first to the multitude after his rescue by Lysias, and afterwards before Festus, and again before Agrippa, we have the earliest forms of defensive Christian evidence, the first specimens of Christian Apologetics, as addressed to the removal of Jewish prejudice and misrepresentation. But the Apostle never forgot to address himself to the removal of Jewish prejudice. This must have been especially the case in that last recorded interview of the Apostle with his Jewish countrymen, soon after his arrival at Rome. The lengthened argument, "from morning until evening, out of the law of Moses and the Prophets," failing with some but successful with others, while directed to the main conclusion that JESUS was the CHRIST, was also directed, as it began and went on, to the removal of existing specific prejudices and misconceptions against the sect of the Nazarenes, that is, His disciples and followers "everywhere spoken against." Such existing prejudice and odium against Christianity, "this new sect," is given by the Roman Jews as a reason for their desire to hear more fully about it from the Apostle. In other words, to put the matter in later form of expression, they asked of him an exhibition of the "evidences of Christianity." A request with which he promptly complied,—in that compliance removing the prejudices and securing the conviction of at least a portion of his hearers. "Some believed."

So too, as to the necessity of such defensive and explanatory evidence, as passing outside of the circle of Judaism, Christianity was preached and made its converts among the heathen. It thus came in contact with heathen thought and feeling, not only in the persons of its converts, but of those with whom they were in daily association. As both new and diverse from existing forms of worship, it soon called forth not only attention, but prejudice and opposition. Such prejudice would, of course, be intensified as the character of Christianity became manifest. While, unlike Judaism, a world religion, it was, like it, an exclusive one. Its undertaking was to overthrow idolatry in all its forms, to absorb anything that might be good in them, to throw off what was evil, and eventually to supplant them. In the very terms of its existence and progress, it demanded unconditional surrender,—a surrender of systems as of individuals. At first, however, regarded as a Jewish sect, and therefore a form of religion sanctioned by imperial legislation, a "religio licita," there was no interference with it by the Heathen authorities. Persecuted by Judaism during the first forty years of its existence, it was, by its supposed Jewish character, saved from that of the Heathen magistracy. But when Judaism passed away, in its terrible overthrow, it was found that Christianity was something different. Here was a new religion, with its converts in every city in the Empire, rapidly spreading, antagonistic to existing religions, itself a "religio illicita," having, under imperial sanction, no legal existence, and, therefore, demanding either repression or specific legal toleration and freedom of exercise. This latter it fully obtained, (after a long struggle) during the first quarter of the fourth century. In the mean time, effort was made to repress it. These efforts of legal repression were usually local; the repression of lawful authority to local prejudice and feeling, finding expression in distinct accusations. Sometimes, doubtless, they originated in the personal animosity of particular officials; and in some few cases, by direction or instruction from the imperial centre.

But these efforts in the way of legal repression, as showing prejudice and misconception, called forth very soon its response in the Apologies,—the defensive Christian evidences of the second and third centuries. This, indeed, is the characteristic of the Christian writings of that age. The new religion was on trial. The question at issue was, shall it be extirpated or shall it be tolerated? The argument of the Christian apologists was for the latter, for freedom of religious opinion and belief. Such argument was occupied with prevalent impressions against Christianity, and to show that they were unfounded. It went on to exhibit its real character and teaching, and then, still further, its superiority to existing systems of belief and practice. There were other Christian writings during this period. Even those who are specifically known as writers of Apologies wrote on other subjects, sometimes on practical or controversial questions.

Still, this is peculiarly the characteristic of this period, and it enters even into the writings of those who are not usually classed with the Apologists. Of these latter some are known only by their names, others by fragments of their writings; with others, again, their works have been preserved to our times nearly complete. Those of Quadratus, Aristides, Herminius, and Melito are but fragments. Those of Justin, Tatian, Athenagoras, and Theophilus are still extant. That of Tatian was addressed to the Greeks, that of Theophilus to a private individual, and the other two to the Emperor. The probability is that they all had reference to this last destination. They are defenses rather of Christians as individuals, Christians accused or under suspicion, than of Christianity as a doctrine.

Of course, in such effort, they would deal with the accusations upon which these persecutions proceeded. When a man confessed that he was a Christian and was condemned, it was not merely for practicing an uncensored religion, but for the supposed character of that religion. These accusations may be comprehended under three main charges: first, atheism; secondly, gross immorality; and, thirdly, cannibalism. The first of these accusations seems to have found its origin in the spiritual nature of Christianity itself; for in their places of worship, as in their abodes, there were none of the visible representations of Deity. In this new religion there were none of what seemed the great realities to heathen worshippers. The Christians were never seen to bow before the image of a god. They had no sacrificing priests. They offered no sacrifices, having no temples. The inference to a heathen mind was inevitable that the Christians had no gods, no belief in beings of a superior power, were atheists; and, as such, outside of the circle of human sympathy and of human confidence, the proper objects of universal execration.

This impression was naturally connected with the two others,—indiscriminate licentiousness, and the eating of human flesh. In both of these, as in the charge of atheism, there was something real in which these charges originated. The absence, as we have seen, of the only sort of religion which polytheists could understand or appreciate led to the charge of no religion at all, that is, atheism. So, too, the freedom of Christian association of the sexes, an immediate result of Christian teaching and practice as to the sacredness of marriage, and as to the law of purity in all its bearings; the meeting together of the sexes in Christian worship, as in the reception of the LORD's Supper; the ties of love among believers were interpreted to show the very opposite of what they really meant.

The other of these charges, that of eating human flesh, in all probability originated in the celebration of the LORD's Supper, the symbolical eating by faith of the body and blood of the ascended Master, and expressions in regard to it perverted and misunderstood to mean a literal eating of human flesh and blood. Whatever its origin and however perpetuated, as first making its appearance in heathen opinion, it tended to increase the odium against the new religion. Atheists, grossly licentious, unnatural feeders on human flesh, what else could be done with them than hurry them out of the world as speedily as possible?

To these charges the Apologists address themselves. This they do by positive denial of the supposed opinions upon which those facts were asserted of the facts. They further appealed to maxims and principles (the opposite to everything of this kind in the teaching of the Master); to the lives of Christians as in accordance with this teaching. They demanded of the Emperors that the case of persons accused of any of these crimes should be determined upon its own merit; not that the fact of a man's being a Christian should be accepted prior to all proof, and in absence of all proof, that he was a civil and social outlaw.

But these defenses proceed further. It was scarcely possible for men, under these circumstances, to indicate their characters without a positive defense of their faith, of Christianity itself. This would necessitate comparison with that of their accusers, that from which they themselves had departed.

They had grown up Heathens and became Christians. Their reason was the abominable evils of polytheism, social and moral, and the purity, the holiness of Christianity. This defense of Christianity involved an assault upon Heathenism.

Thus it was during the earlier period of the Apologists. At a later period, as other points of attack were made, the defenses were constructed to meet them. Still further, as this new religion spread, and its facts and doctrines were promulgated, there were positive attacks upon it by the heathen philosophers and literati. To all these forms of obstruction and misconception there was the response of Christian argument, exhibition of its evidences. Among the writings of this class may be mentioned those of the North African school, Tertullian, Minucius Felix, and at a later period Arnobius and Lactantius; of the Alexandrian school, Clement and Origen. The characteristics of these writers and their peculiar modes of argument we have no space for exhibiting. The necessity of works of this character, so far as protests or protectives against legal persecution, ceased to exist with the triumph of Christianity under Constantine. With the great majority, after this change, the successful argument for Christianity was a prosperous Christendom, the Church under the protection of imperial power. With the exceptionally brief retrogression under Julian,—his attack upon Christianity and the reply to it of Cyril; the work of Eusebius in his reply to Hierocles, his Evangelica Preparatio and Evangelica Demonstratio (the first written against the philosophers, the second to heathen readers in general, and the last to Jewish readers and inquirers); the still later writings of Augustine, intended to meet the difficulties and objections still lingering in the heathen mind against the Gospel;—with these exceptions, the intellect and scholarship of Christendom were absorbed in a different undertaking: dogmatics, the settlement and definition among Christians themselves of doctrinal issues and points of internal controversy. So far, too, as regarded the call for works of specific defensive evidences, this continued the case during most of the interval until the Reformation. A series of Jewish writers defending their own system and attacking CHRIST, moving on from the twelfth to the sixteenth century, called forth replies from Christian authors. As to the Mohammedans, it has been said the Apologetics of the crusades dealt with these difficulties. Occasional hints occur in mediæval writers of objections by Jews and Mohammedans to the doctrine of the TRINITY,—also of their attacks upon the worship of saints and images. It is to be said, that in the last, the Jews and Mohammedans were really occupying the Christian position; and the professedly Christian defenders of the faith had gotten back upon the old ground of polytheism.

To one form of Christian evidence, however, it is to be recognized that this mediæval period made a large contribution: that evidence of the truth and Divine origin of Christianity as it is seen in the clear exhibition of its truths, in their systematic connections and relations of interdependence, in the rationality of their existence and applications. Those same skeptical tendencies in Christian thought, represented by such men as Duns Scotus and Abelard; and it thus became necessary for such men as Anselm and Aquinas consecutively to neutralize this by their constructive theology. This was, of course, imperfect, and much of it has had to be, and will have to be, done over again. But it is, after all, the ultimate and satisfactory form in which Christian evidence will receive its final statement; the truth, shining in its own clear light, the lesser as well as the greater truths recognized in their proper position perfecting the illumination.

With the revival of literature in the Western Church and the general awakening of intellectual activity there were germinant elements of skepticism and positive unbelief, and with these the occasion for a manifestation of Christian evidences. Christianity had been so corrupted and caricatured by its accredited representatives, that the world outside—heathen, Jewish, and Mohammedan, as well as the great mass of nominal believers—needed to know its real character. As with the average Frenchman or Spaniard now, the Christianity of the average layman of the first quarter of the sixteenth century was that of the Papal system, with its manifest and manifold abominations. When such men were awakened to intellectual activity in the humanist movement, these abuses and the accepted system of which they formed part became their point of attack. But there were two powerfully restraining influences modifying the power of such attack,—prevention of avowed unbelief, open assault upon Christianity. One of these was the risk and personal danger involved; in other words, the Church process of answering heretics and unbelievers. Mere philosophical and literary skeptics make very poor martyrs. It is pleasanter to doubt or philosophize in private than to burn or hang in public. The machinery of ecclesiastical repression was so effectively worked that nothing short of genuine religious conviction ventured to tamper with it. Then again, a great deal of the literary and philosophical skepticism and rejuvenated Heathenism of this period was in the Church itself or among ecclesiastics of the highest order. There was great necessity for an exhibition of Christianity in its reality and its power; of the evidence within of its Divine origin.

This necessity was met in the movements of the Reformation. In that great movement, and the fundamental issues with which it was occupied, all others were absorbed. The triflers were swept aside. The reactive effect of Protestantism, even upon the old system, was to its awakening and purification, saving it from the cancer of skepticism with which it was threatened. Its result and mode of working resembled much those of Methodism in England during the last century. Men thoroughly and religiously in earnest have no time and less taste for theories of skepticism.

But this spirit of earnestness, which had thus put in abeyance the rising skepticism of the new culture, was itself subject to deteriorating influences. The mere division of outward Christianity, and its interference in men's minds with the idea of its essential unity; the divisions and bitter controversies among Protestants and the religious wars of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries; produced a condition of things in which unbelief could make itself manifest. The forms of this unbelief are more fully developed at a later period. These have been divided into three classes: first, the Deistic, with its two types, the one more spiritualist, represented by Lord Herbert of Cherbury, the other more materialist, represented by Hobbes; secondly, the Pantheistic, represented by Spinoza; and, thirdly, the Skeptical, represented by Bayle. The object of Herbert of Cherbury was to get rid of revelation, by attempting to show its uselessness, and incapability of being proved. The object of Hobbes was to deny and do away with all moral obligations in ethics and politics, in the ordinary sense of those words, and, of course, to sap the foundations of religion. The result, whatever the intent of Spinoza, was to absorb the world in Deity, to destroy alike the personality of Creator and creature, and, of course, with the latter, all personal responsibility. The representative of the last of these divisions, the skeptical, Bayle, was not like these others a system builder to replace or put aside that of the existing faith, but a universal critic, skeptical in his spirit as in the result of investigations. The position of these writers is not, by themselves, closely and consistently defined. They write and express themselves, at times, as approving of the existing system. But it was not very long before their position was recognized.

These, however, were merely precursive to something more clearly and positively defined, the Deistic contest of the next century. "The principal phases of this period of the maturity of Deism, which we shall now successively mention, are four:

"First, what may be called the intellectually rationalistic, that of Toland and Collins. This involved an examination of the first principles of religion, doctrinally, asserting the supremacy of reason, and, of course, its sufficiency to interpret all mysteries. What reason could not thus interpret was not rational, was irrational, and to be rejected.*

* Farrar's History of Free Thought, p. 125.

"Secondly, what may be called the ethical rationalistic, that of Lord Shaftesbury. This involved the examination of religion morally; and it asserted the supremacy of natural morality as a rule of conduct, denying the propriety of motives of reward or punishment.

"Thirdly, as following upon the two former, and for which they had prepared the way, was the more direct attack upon the specific Christian evidences, that by Collins of the prophecies of the Old Testament, and that by Wollaston of the miracles of the New.

"Fourth, a combination of all these, in different proportions, by Tindal, Morgan, and Chubb. This effort with each, while destructive, was also constructive. The destructive part was to show that all of Christianity, plus natural religion and natural morality, was irrational and to be rejected, so far as, in accord with them, it demands acceptance. And they undertook to show, upon these principles, how much of Christianity may be rationally accepted as true."

Of the three other noted English writers of this century, Bolingbroke really added very little to his predecessors; Hume, exercising influence in his day through his argument on miracles, is now more influential through his philosophical speculations; and Gibbon, with his natural explanations of the success of Christianity, and his halting defense of heathenism and its persecutions, has lost his power of mischief. His own testimony to the power of Christianity, and the magnitude of its effects upon the world, is to be found everywhere in his volumes.

But to all of these forms of assault there were numberless replies of great power, some of them even by anticipation, others as the unbelieving scheme was put forth.

Two of the most important during the seventeenth century were the De Veritate Religionis Christianæ of Grotius and the Pensées of Pascal on the Continent, while in England the names of Bacon, Cudworth, Locke, Boyle, Tillotson, Burnet, Leslie, Littleton, Bentley, Clarke, Butler, Warburton, Sherlock, Jennings, Leland, Paley, with many others, met the various issues. Hume's argument against miracles received various replies, the most noted of that century being those of Campbell and Paley, while Gibbon and Paine, coming in rather later, were answered by Bishop Watson. The assault (to use the language of Principal Cairns) "was a failure. The assaults of Deism had been repelled, and the ammunition shot away, and nothing remained but to raise the siege. Churchmen forgot their party differences, and Nonconformists fought by the side of Churchmen against the common enemy. The best works of their antagonists, after the replies to them, look poor and shallow, and hardly anything remains in Christianity to be struck at but the external difficulties of reason and of theology." Connected, however, with these monuments of skeptical and infidel thought in England, and receiving largely their impulses from them, were those of similar character in France and Germany. The character of the French infidelity, taking its tone largely from Voltaire, was more bitter and scoffing than that of the English Deists. At the same time, there was a large infusion (through Rousseau and his imitators) into it of sentimentalism. And with these, through the writings of Diderot, Helvetius, and D'Holbach, were the combinations of Atheistic materialism. Their practical result was the worst excesses of the French Revolution. For, while it may be recognized that the materials had been long in gathering, yet this was the spark to the actual conflagration, and heightened its fury. There were various replies of the Romish clergy. But there was not spiritual life nor intellectual power in the French Church fully to meet these various attacks, and its reconstruction under Napoleon was rather a matter of State policy. Later works from French Protestant and Romish writers of an effective character have appeared. But the spirit of unbelief largely predominates. Renan's legendary theory of the Gospels has perhaps had a wider circulation than any work of a similar character. As a matter of argument, it goes back to the oft-refuted position of Paine and his lame school of English Deists, that of conscious deception. De Pressensé gave an effective reply to it, which has been followed by many others.

In Germany the principles of English Deism passed into what has been called the Rationalistic, or Naturalistic, movement. The peculiarity in this was that its leaders, represented by Paulus and Semler, were clergymen and theological professors, advocates and defenders of supernatural revelation, undertaking to show that there was nothing really supernatural in it.

Coming back to English unbelief and that of this country, we find in the beginning of this century, in England, first the positive effects of a revived Christianity through the movements of Wesley and Whitefield, extending in its influence to the Established Church. Still further, in the revulsion from the infidelity of the French Revolution there was called forth a strong popular sentiment in favor of Christianity. To some degree the same facts had exerted a like influence in this country,—modified, however, by sympathy with France as a people, and especially in view of her assistance rendered during the Revolutionary struggle. There was introduced a great deal of the infidelity of French principles, as that embodied in Paine's "Age of Reason." The religious movements of the first two decades of the century checked a great deal of this, and it was, moreover, met in specific replies and works on Christian evidences. The arguments, as directed to the nature of the objections, were largely historical, reproductions in a more popular form of the materials of such writers as Lardner and Paley. At the same time the internal, moral, and experimental evidences received more specific attention. The work of Hartwell Horne contains a full exhibition of these evidences of this period, say the first forty years of this century. Those of Bishop Williams and of Doctor Chalmers, in Great Britain, and those of Doctor Alexander, Bishop McIlvaine, and President Hopkins, in this country, present them in briefer compass and better adapted to popular use. The great work of Butler, also, was used, with those of the Rationalists, showing the necessity of Christianity.

It remains that we briefly indicate the necessities of Christian evidences at present, and in view of recent tendencies, as of those of the last quarter of a century. There are, first, those claiming to be philosophical, Positivism, Agnosticism, Materialism, including in the latter Material Evolutionism. Secondly, those in the domain of science, antagonizing Science and Theology or depreciating the latter as a ground of rational belief or action. Thirdly, those in the domain of Criticism, the old rationalistic movement largely revived in its spirit and processes, and reducing to its minimum in Scripture the element of the supernatural. And, fourthly, those in the sphere of moral life; the Pantheism which absorbs personal life and personal accountability in a material or ideal universe; the Pessimism which finds this universe with a plan and purpose indeed, but one that is evil. And, last of all, in the sphere of Comparative Religion, the effort of unbelievers (in this) to make Christianity one of the natural religions of the world, a little better in some respects than other theories, not so good, perhaps, in others, but at the best, a religion of the past, to be superseded by a, or the, religion of the future, and that by its future of human development, and so on indefinitely. Against each of these powers of unbelieving thought, the Christian apologist needs to present his defenses and urge his attack. And it is to be said that the ability and scholarship of Christian writers have nobly responded to this demand. "The assault," to use the expression of Professor H. B. Smith, "has been along the whole line." But such assault, at whatever point made, has found defenders inside. And these defenders, repelling the attack, have gone out of their lines for aggressive movement. These different forms of unbelief, in their respective fields of investigation, have been met by the researches and replies of Christian scholarship. Over against the objections and asserted difficulties, for instance, of physical science, made by infidel and atheistic scientists, are the replies of Christian scientists of equal scientific reputations,—such men, for instance, as Whewell, Brewster, Forbes, the Duke of Argyll, Dawson, Dana, Hopkins, and Chadbourne. The efforts, again, of skeptical comparative religionists, have found their answers in the labors and conclusions of Christian scholars and investigators, such men as Hardwicke, Moffett, De Pressensé, Rawlinson. Then, again, in the department of metaphysics and moral science, the assertions of Positivism, Agnosticism, Materialism, Pessimism, are finding their answers with almost every weekly issue of the press,—in the works of such men as Flint, Caird, McCosh, Harris, Fisher, and Pasteur. What, again, claims to be the higher criticism which disposes of Scripture alike in its inspired and its historical claims, has been met by a thorough investigation, in a profoundly reverential spirit and by conclusions of an opposite character,—in the labors of Lightfoot, Dean Smith, Pusey, Westcott, Brett, Delitsch, Green, Fisher, Wright, and Leathes. These are but samples in each department. Connected too with these may be mentioned Christian reviews and journals in which these items receive discussion, and also regular endowment lectures, the Boyle and Bampton and Hulsean and Warburtonian in England, with several of a similar character in this country. Even the coarse reproduction of some infidel materials, in the efforts of Ingersoll and those of his kind, have not passed without replies,—those of Judge Black and Thurlow Weed fully meeting them. Whenever the demand has been made on Christian ability or scholarship, it has been promptly and effectively met. In each form of contest, too, as in the past, the result has been not only a repulse to falsehood, but a clear gain to the truth of religious conviction and assurance. There has never been a time in which Christianity had such a hold upon the intellect and heart of the world. There has never been a time in which it has had as many and able defenders; when so many, even of its enemies, have felt and confessed its power, and are endeavoring, if not to destroy it, to solve the problem of its origin. Finally, two positive results may be mentioned in connection with these assaults and repulses of unbelief and faith in the last quarter of a century. The quickening of interest and the enlargement of the area of investigation and study in national theology; the position and prominence given to the person of CHRIST in specific Christian thought as in Christian evidences. The two grand issues are over these points: Is there a LORD in nature? How has He revealed Himself in CHRIST? As these are rightly answered, all others fall into their proper position. And the drift of human thought as of Christian evidence is to bring man to a practical decision. As the contest works on in these various departments of human thought and investigation, that final point of decision, with its alternative, becomes more clear and manifest,—out and out Christianity or out and out Atheism.

Evil. Evil differs from sin in that sin refers more to the act and its consequences, while evil refers more to the state and its conditions. But the two terms are used so often interchangeably that this distinction is not clearly kept in view. The Evil One made an evil suggestion to Eve, and she sinned and caused Adam to sin, and so brought evil into our life. Yet this distinction is not preserved in the translation of the Bible, —e.g., in Ps. li. 4: "Against Thee only have I sinned, and done this evil in Thy sight."

But the great question that has overshadowed all other questions upon sin and evil is, Why is it permitted and whence is it? There can be no complete reply, since our spiritual nature is not known to us, nor is the future life so known that we can certainly reply to minor objections. Created beings must be so far (as a higher limit) imperfect, and from that limit there is a descending scale into sin. The sinless angels are charged with folly and the heavens are not clean in His sight, perfect and glorious and lovely as they are. The vanity St. Paul urges we are subject to is the defect whereby we are open to sin. But as law for us implies obedience and its opposite, and these two imply a choice of either course, as obedience and disobedience are moral qualities, we have not the absolute reason, but the relative conditions upon which sin could and did enter into the world. Freedom of will, is a proper reply to the question why it is, for it implies the power, not the necessity nor the willing desire to sin, but that power to act which the will holds as of its own essence; a power it exercises for good or for evil whenever motives and persuasions, sufficiently enticing, are presented to it in either direction. The effects of evil in the soul, of course, affect the intellect, and therefore the body; consequently physical evil and pain, with sorrow, suffering, and natural defects, follow. These mould our whole earthly life. It is to be noted that while the guilt of sin is pardoned and a counter-remedy given, the effects of evil in the system, spiritual and natural, are not removed. Our probation is founded upon the principle that we accept the forgiveness, use the remedy offered as faithfully as possible, and endure the consequences of sin patiently, till the law of restitution in CHRIST shall gain its full power. As sin and its evil consequences work their effect slowly, so the undoing of these effects must be slow. The same wisdom which permitted evil must guide the elimination of evil, and as its inscrutable purposes in permitting it overshadow us, so the like mysterious plans of freeing us must be taken and used in faith. It is for this purpose the Church was founded,—the hospital for sin-sick souls wherein CHRIST the physician has left a perfect remedy, were we but to use it as He has directed and would submit to the guidance of those who are empowered to administer it.

But evil, a poison in the spiritual system, is properly foreign to it, and since its effects are so loathsome and hideous, the conscience exclaims against it. This is the key to St. Paul's passionate self-analysis, and with its triumphant hope of victory (Rom. vii.): "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death? I thank God through JESUS CHRIST our LORD. So then with the mind I myself serve the law of God; but with the flesh the law of sin. "There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in CHRIST JESUS, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit."

These facts are, then, clearly within our grasp, and these only. We cannot now know why sin was permitted or whence it came, only we know God cannot be its author. We can know how it has power over us, because of our (a) imperfection, because we are finite, because of our (b) freedom of choice, which is a law of our being and the basis of all probation. We know that (c) all spiritual, intellectual, and physical defects, sins, and suffering flow from it. We know that (d) it is a poison deeply seated, needing the medicine of a Divine healer. We know (e) that its consequences are continuous, recurring, and were it not for the constant presence of God, would be fatal in every respect. We know (f) that while the guilt of evil can be forgiven its temporal consequences are not removed, but that the mode in which these are used or submitted to forms an important part in our training. Further than this, upon the mystery of our future restoration, upon the effect of our individual conduct, upon our future condition, we know nothing. We can trace but cannot fully comprehend the reason why evil in the soul should cause the ruin which befell the material nature around us. There is but one thing open to us for our own good, to feel deeply the evil and to use faithfully the remedy in CHRIST.

Examination for Holy Orders. In the early subapostolic Church this examination must have been rather one in the candidate's moral fitness and general acquaintance with the Scriptures, and varied with the circumstances both of the time and the person. That it was public and well known, according to the Apostolic injunction, "having a good report of them which are without," we have the singular testimony of the Emperor Severus, who ordered that in appointing a new governor inquiry should be made about his character, adding that this was the manner of both Jews and Christians in selecting their priests. There is no minute canonical law such as we have now, at least no mention is made of any, but doubtless the Bishop was the responsible person. The candidates were selected probably by the clergy, and were then presented for acceptance to the Bishop. They were often men of great culture (as Tertullian), and well acquainted with the literature of the day, but the larger number were not so well trained. There are numerous minor canons in the Western Canon Law against too deep a study of the classics, but this was under the influence of Jerome and of Augustine, who in his confessions records his delight in the beauties of Virgil. The examination of a Bishop was rather dependent, as to its extent, upon his fame, and therefore the inquiry into his holding the right faith upon the Creeds would vary very much. With the Middle Ages and the era of Bishops holding political preferment came a general laxness. Yet the learning of the day was almost wholly with the ecclesiastics. Every age, even the darkest, had some bright lights,—men who often were not above the superstitions of their times, but who were nevertheless men of marked ability. Such were Gregory of Tours (573 A.D.), Isidore of Seville (595 A.D.), Cassiodorus (539 A.D.). Later Boniface (730 A.D.), the Apostle of Germany, led in ability, though not in learning. Under Charlemagne many notable scholars were trained, Agobard, Haymo, Rabanus Maurus. Later, Hincmar proved that the line of able and learned Bishops had not died out, and much care in those troublous times to keep up the schools was taken. So too in the East, Photius, Michael Psellus, and others show that diligent care was taken according to their opportunities to see that their priests were trained. Theophylact's Commentary is still valuable. These facts show us that, though we do not know how stringent the examinations were, yet, with whatever ease men were admitted to Holy Orders, their training was not wholly overlooked.

In England the examination for orders is upon the lines of the Divinity studied in the University, though each Bishop has his examining Chaplains. According to the English Canons, the candidate must be a graduate of one of the Universities, or else show his learning by a thesis in Latin upon the XXXIX. Articles, defended by Scripture proof. He must bring certificates of good life and conversation for the "three years next before." The Bishop is himself to examine him in the presence of those ministers who are to assist him in the imposition of hands. Lawful impediments are to be inquired into, Canons 34, 35. Subscription ex animo is to be made, I. To the acknowledgment of the Royal Supremacy in matters Spiritual and Ecclesiastical, as well as Temporal, and the acknowledgment in the same subscription to the denial that any "Foreign Prince, Person, Prelate, State, or Potentate hath, or ought to have, any Jurisdiction, Power, Superiority, Pre-eminence, or Authority, Ecclesiastical or Spiritual," in England and its dependencies. II. To a declaration that "the Book of Common Prayer contains nothing contrary to the Word of God," and that he will use it exclusively. III. To the XXXIX. Articles and their Ratification.

The American Church is equally careful to have her ministers properly trained, and for this purpose there are numerous theological schools in different parts of the United States. The Canon (Title i., Can. iv.) is full and precise in its directions for the examination of the postulant or the candidate.

Each Diocese shall have two or more examining Chaplains, who shall examine the postulant or candidate in his literary qualifications and report to the Bishop. If the candidate is a graduate of a college, this examination is usually omitted. If he be a candidate for Deacon's orders only, he shall be examined thoroughly in the Holy Scriptures and in the Prayer-Book in all its parts and adjuncts and in the Book of Articles; in his reverent and edifying performance of these service of the Church and of his diaconal duties. If the candidate has been an ordained or licensed minister in any other denomination of Christians, then he is to be examined specially upon his soundness upon the points of difference. The Bishop may or may not be present, at his pleasure. The candidate for Priest's orders shall pass through three examinations, which, except for extraordinary reasons, shall not be held on the same day, but on three separate days. Each must be both oral and written, and the special subjects may or may not be given previously to the candidate. At each examination he shall read a sermon upon an assigned text and hand in two others composed on texts of his own choice; and he shall be examined upon the reverent conduct of the services and upon his knowledge of his duties; and if he comes to the Church from any denomination, he shall be examined upon his soundness upon the points of difference. No examinations in a theological seminary shall supersede these examinations, which can by no means be dispensed with. These three are: I. On Holy Scripture, its history, and on the Hebrew and the Greek; though these two may, for sufficient cause, be dispensed with. II. On the evidences of Christianity, Christian Ethics, and Systematic Divinity. III. Church History, Ecclesiastical Polity, and the history and contents of the Book of Common Prayer, and on the Constitution and Canons of the Church.

The Bishop may, as he chooses, preside or not, and he may invite the Presbyter, who shall present the candidate at the ordination, to take part in the examination, but the Bishop must take part in one of these examinations at least, or else examine him beside in a fourth examination. If the candidate be in a vacant Diocese, the Bishop who shall ordain him must hold this fourth examination.

Since a candidate for Deacon's orders may be also a candidate for Priest's orders, the first examination for the Priesthood shall be sufficient for the Diaconate examination, but the examination on the Prayer-Book for the Diaconate must be repeated for the Priesthood at the third examination. Signed certificates are required after each examination for either office, and violation of above provisions for examination shall disqualify the candidate and subject the other party concerned to canonical procedure and censure; and the candidate for Priest's orders must apply for his first and second examinations within three years, and for his third within five years, after his admission, and, unless he can give sufficient reasons for this neglect, if he fail to fulfill these enactments he shall be stricken from the list of candidates after due warning from the Bishop.

The conditions are not at all difficult to fulfill, but they are to be stringently enforced.

Examination, Self. It has been well said that self-examination is forestalling, by devout repentance, the decision of the day of Judgment, when all secrets not blotted out of His Book of Remembrance will be revealed. It is of the greatest importance to the soul, both here in moulding the life, the principles, the conduct, and hereafter as its lessons teach the earnest soul wherein repentance and amendment is necessary, and so it aids to avert the condemnation of the Judgment-day. To be an examination at all it must honestly be carried into the motives, secret or unconscious, until thought upon or avowed; into the thoughts cherished and habitually entertained, to be tested by Christian law and morality; into the words, to be weighed according to the rule both of the Psalmist (Ps. xxxix.) and of CHRIST (Matt. xii. 36); and into the actions, to be tried by the Law of God and by the earnestness with which the soul sought the guidance of the HOLY GHOST. By implication the Ten Commandments, placed at the beginning of the Communion Service, and prefaced by a prayer for purity, are the guides the Church would have her children follow in their hearty self-examination. They should question themselves as to the spiritual as well as temporal obedience they yield to these positive laws. Almost from the earliest writings of the Fathers onward, the Church possesses a vast number of most useful manuals, directions, and counsels upon this duty. Every age has special manuals, which have been prepared by devout men upon self-examination into the current sins and temptations of that time, and many outlines have been put forth which meet the needs of the soul in all ages.

Excommunication. The cutting off from the communion of the Church a faithless, evil member. Suspension from privileges is not excommunication, which deprives a person of all spiritual communion with the faithful and of all the spiritual gifts in the Church of CHRIST. It is the delivering the guilty person unto the power of Satan (1 Tim. i. 20). Excommunication is not intended to be perpetual unless the guilty person continues impenitent and so prevents its removal, and besides, its true purpose is disciplinary, not punitive. Like the consequences of sin, which we may make disciplinary if humbly submitted to in faith, so excommunication may be used. The LORD instructed the Apostles about this matter of discipline (St. Matt. xviii. 15-18), and repeated this, with the direct gift of the proper authority (St. John xx. 23), after His Resurrection. The Apostles used it, as did St. Paul in the matter of the incestuous Corinthian (1 Cor. v. 4) and of Hymenæus and Alexander (1 Tim. i. 20). But as baptism confers the birth into CHRIST's Church, and as excommunication is a dis-inheriting inflicted with greater or less severity, it is not such a final expulsion that it annuls the baptism. There are two kinds of excommunication, the lesser and greater; both are apparently recognized in the Apostolic Canons, which are the earliest form of Church Law extant. The lesser was called Aphoresis, the greater Catharesis. The Bishop and Clergy together were the party sentencing. No other but the Bishop could try a case occurring in his Diocese. But if he neglected it, his Primate could summon both parties before the Provincial Synod, and could suspend the negligent Bishop, who could only be restored to communion by the Synod.

In mediæval times wild and fearful precatons were used in the forms of excommunication. These varied in fullness in different places, and in different times, but were framed upon the curses recorded by Moses in Deuteronomy. The secular arm was called in to uphold the ecclesiastical power, and the sentence was made to involve civil disabilities also.

The forms which accompanied the sentence were made as scenically terrible as possible. The bell was tolled. The Presbyters surrounding their Bishop, as he pronounced out of the Book the sentence, each extinguished a lighted candle he held in his hand. Thence came the saying to excommunicate with Bell, Book, and Candle. The older English Law upon ipso facto excommunications has been much modified since time and the development of society has changed the older condition of things, and it is confined only to definitive sentences and decrees pronounced as spiritual censures for offenses of ecclesiastical cognizance.

The Lesser Excommunication deprived a person of the Sacraments. The Greater Excommunication deprived him of all rights and privileges. Certain disobediences of Canon and Ecclesiastical Law, by their commission (technically "ipso facto") placed the guilty clerk under excommunication. So, too, certain offenses, as robbing churches, placed the laymen under the same ban. According to the gravity of the office, it was either the lesser or the greater ban. Many of the offenses for which it is inflicted could not occur in this country. Deposition, deprivation, and degradation are used to express one and the same severer punishment for an offending clergyman. Suspension is the lesser sentence. With regard to the laity, the Rubric in the front of the Office for the Holy Communion is the only law in general force. The Paragraph 3 of Section ii., Can. xii. of Title ii., provides for a future enactment for trying the laity, but in the meanwhile recognizes the jurisdiction of the Diocesan Conventions.

Exedra. A building, such as a baptistery, which was not attached to the church, and yet was within the grounds attached to the church.

Exegesis. Vide HERMENEUTICS.

Exemption. Many Monasteries and Convents were in their later stage exempted from the rule of the Bishop in whose Diocese they were built. The abuse was protested against by St. Bernard (1163 A.D.), but it went on till a large number of Monasteries and Abbey Churches were under the protection of the Pope or the King, and so were withdrawn from Episcopal visitation. The Abbey of Westminster is a Peculiar, that is, an Exempted Church, amenable not to the Bishop of London, in whose Diocese it is situated, but to the Queen.

Exhortation. A sermon or address, but technically it is the name for the several addresses to the congregation in the Common Prayer-Book. There are traces of such exhortations in the Mozarabic or Spanish Liturgy. Besides the familiar one of the daily service and the four incorporated into the Communion office, there are four apiece in the two Baptismal offices. An exhortation occurs in each of the offices for Confirmation, Marriage, and The Sick. Two are in the Visitation of Prisoners, and a very solemn one in the Ordering of Priests, and one in the Form of Consecration of a Church or Chapel. They are, in fact, short, clear, forcible sermons, which the Church authoritatively provides for the instruction of her children in the offices in which she has placed them. It proves her very great care to have her members well instructed.

Exodus is the continuation of Genesis, with which it is linked most closely; indeed, it may be almost accounted as a part of the same work. The facts narrated have been often called in question, but never with success. The remains of Egyptian customs and the notices of Egyptian history all bear out the minutest accuracy of the work, and would of themselves nearly fix the date of the Exodus. In this book, as well as in Genesis, the two pretended documents, the Elohist and the Jehovist, are asserted to exist, but the same difficulty of proof confutes their existence here as well as in Genesis. An analysis of the book will set before us clearly its purpose. For now it is the history of God's deliverance of the family He had chosen for Himself out of all nations. He had placed them while yet feeble in Egypt, in the most fertile country of the globe, and had given them its best portion,—Goshen,—and there in the two hundred and fifteen years of their sojourn they had increased wondrously, and were an element of danger to the Egyptian polity. Not quite eight generations, allowing a fourfold increase to each generation, which is not too extravagant, would raise the number to upward of two and a half millions out of the fifty-six pairs usually supposed to have gone down into Egypt in Jacob's family. These had been protected by the Pharaohs till about the time of Moses' birth, when the policy of the Egyptian rulers changed. Alarmed at the vast increase, they attempted to check it by destroying the male children. It was at this point that the history opens, or, to speak more accurately, the most remarkable autobiography in literary history. The book may be divided into two parts,—the autobiographical and the ritual. The autobiographical extends from chapter i. to chapter xviii. 27; the ritual from chapter xix. to the end. This part, however, has much historical matter interspersed.

I. The Autobiographical.—The historical circumstances preceding the birth of Moses are recounted in chapter i. The parentage and birth of Moses and his adoption by Pharaoh's daughter are given in chapter ii. to verse 11. Then follow the events of the homicide of the Egyptian who was beating a Hebrew, his flight into Midian, where he became an inmate of the family of Reuel, the priest of Midian, and married his daughter. Chapters iii. and iv. to verse 18, contain the calling of Moses and his mission. Chapter iv. 24, contains an incident full of mystical import. Moses had neglected to circumcise his son, and the LORD met him at the inn and "sought to kill him," when Zipporah circumcised their son, "so He let him go." Moses and Aaron now proceed to execute their commission by delivering the message to Pharaoh (ch. v.) which only resulted in the placing of heavier burdens upon the Israelites. The first threat delivered to Pharaoh (ch. vii.), was accompanied with the sign of Aaron's rod becoming a serpent. The Magicians did the same, not by a miracle, but by a sleight of hand, but Aaron's rod swallowed them up. The first plague of turning the water into blood (ch. vii. 17-22), the second of the frogs (ch. viii. 5-15) were not difficult to imitate; but of the third plague, that of lice (ch. viii. 16-19), they had to confess this is the finger of God, and did not try their enchantments any more. St. Paul (2 Tim. iii. 8) has preserved to us the names of Jannes and Jambres, the leaders of the order of Magicians. From this plague on (ch. viii. 21) there followed in quick succession the plague of flies, the murrain of beasts, the plague of boils and blains, of hail, of locusts, and of darkness, and then Moses was finally driven from Pharaoh's presence. The king was obstinate and impolitic and hardened. It would lead us too far from our subject to point out more than that Pharaoh hardened his own heart, and because he had gone too far God used him for His judgments upon Egypt. Moses now saw Pharaoh's face no more (ch. x. 29), but proclaimed the last plague, the most terrible of all, the death of the first-born. But the passover was instituted, the lamb was chosen and the preparations were made and the blood was sprinkled, that His People might be protected when that last fearsome shock should fall upon Egypt. On the appointed night, when the angel of the LORD went forth, there was a great cry in Egypt, for there was not a house where there was not one dead (ch. xi., xii.). Then followed the expulsion, the flight, the pursuit, and the wonderful deliverance at the Red Sea (ch. xiii., xiv.); and Moses' magnificent song of triumph (ch. xv.); the journey to Sinai and the giving of the Law (ch. xvi.-xx. 21.) We have called this autobiographical simply because it is Moses' record, so simple, direct, modest, of the mighty deeds he was directed to do. Throughout it is Moses who is the actor, for God chose then as later to deliver men by a man.

II. The Ritual.—Though there is some historical material interspersed,—as the sealing of the covenant with the sprinkling of blood, the founding of the molten calf, the second fast of forty days and nights,—still by far the larger part of the matter of this section is occupied with the details of ritual,—the making an altar. The offering for the tabernacle, the form and size of the tabernacle, the appointment of Aaron and his sons, the sacrifices and their ceremonies, the details of the altar of incense, of the holy oil of the ark, and the mercy-seat overshadowed by the Cherubim, the brazen altar and the brazen laver,—all these, with many minute directions, form the principal part of this portion of the book. Only one legislative section is given here. But throughout the whole book is most consistent, and is full of instruction to him who will read it aright. Like Genesis, it has a miraculous element running through it, but not always recognized. The Deluge would have been attributed to natural causes. Pharaoh doubtless thought that Moses was simply a mightier magician than those he had about him. Men were not then any more than now willing to admit the power of God behind them, using, guiding, overruling them and their wishes and plans. And when they would have submitted if they had consented to it, they were smitten for their obstinacy and hardness. Not only Pharaoh, but the Israelites themselves were afterwards guilty of this blindness, which was far more culpable in them, and would have been fatal but for Moses' powerful intercession. True, God chose to use human means or natural instruments, but the results were not the less mighty and of Divine power. The book of Exodus is a work that, humanly speaking, could only have been written by the actor himself in the mighty deeds which God had commissioned him to do. To destroy the authenticity of its contents and the fact that Moses was really its author, would be to overthrow the Christian religion. Again, it is well worthy of remark that we have here the weaving of religion into the national life. In heathen thought any form of religion sat easily upon them, and it did not cling so closely but that it could be and was materially modified. But in the history of Israel, it is not a nation unless it is a religious nation. This is the cause of its existence. It is to be a royal priesthood. In its after-history it prospered as it carried out the law; it declined and perished as it violated this law. And here in Exodus we have recorded for us the Covenant God made with the people, and the giving of that typical ritual which made them not only His in a peculiar sense, but also the prophecy of the people of CHRIST and of His spiritual kingdom.

Exorcism, Exorcists. There was in the Apostolic Church, following our LORD's first conference of spiritual powers upon both the Twelve and upon the Seventy, an order of Exorcists who had power to cast out unclean spirits. The Apostles themselves exercised it, and St. Philip, the deacon, cast out unclean spirits (Acts viii. 7; xvi. 18). It was a power which was used by some of the Jews themselves, as our LORD's argument against them (Matt. xii. 27) shows. This office was necessarily temporary, since as the spiritual conditions of the world changed after the Resurrection, the needs for such officers in the Church would disappear gradually. (For the subject of Demoniacs see that article.) The Exorcists and Exorcism are first mentioned by Justin Martyr and in the Apostolic Constitutions; the Apostolic Constitutions saying that they were not ordained, as their power was a free gift by the grace of God through CHRIST, and that whoever had this gift would be made manifest by exercising it. But any one having this power was not thereby debarred from receiving Holy Orders.

That the power was a continuation of the gift given by our LORD to His Apostles, and was one of the weapons for their aggressive warfare, must be acknowledged by every Christian. How long it was retained we do not know. It could not have been an authority used at the mere will of the exorcist, since that was contrary to the economy under which the LORD's power was exhibited. It is probable that the order survived its actual need, and we know that it was organized into one of the minor orders, with a solemn setting apart of the person by giving him a written book of forms, with the sentence, "Take and commit to memory and receive power to lay hands on energumens, whether baptized or catechumens." His work was therefore confined to those over whom the Church had some authority. The forms of exorcism were at first a mere command, as in our LORD's own act and in the act of St. Paul (Acts xvi. 18). But from a hint our LORD gives ("This kind can come forth by nothing but prayer and fasting"), it is more than probable that they to whom this wonderful power was given had to keep themselves in a state of spiritual preparation for their conflict. Indeed, this is the best interpretation to be put upon Tertullian's apparent implication that all Christians possessed this power. But from the realizing sense of these spiritual battles, they then felt that their prayers did have power. As time went on and all work fell into grooves, there were ritual forms; and as the Church brought the possessed into the public services and had public prayers for them, those who had charge of them would naturally have formulas ready for use. Such forms are still extant.* But the principle that each person was possessed by an evil spirit was acted on in the form of exorcism (by breathing on the hair and by the sign of the Cross) used over each postulant for admission to the rank of catechumens. It was also connected with the rites immediately preliminary to the administration of baptism. And such a prayer of exorcism was retained in the English office books till the second Prayer-Book of Edward VI. (1552 A.D.).

Expectation Week. The name given to the ten days from the Ascension-day to Whit-Sunday,—in memory of the waiting of the Apostles till the gift should be given them of the HOLY GHOST.

Expiation. The purgation from sin, whether performed by the sinner or by some one for him. So our LORD offered an expiation for our sins. Its meaning is not so extensive as that of ATONEMENT, but Expiation, together with Propitiation, cover the same ground. Sacrifice included both meanings, and this term expresses all of our LORD's atoning acts.

Extravagants. Extravagantes, a collection of Papal Decretals and decisions which Pope John XXII. (1315 A.D.) edited under the title of Extravagantes seu Constitutiones Viginti, to which were added five books more of Extravagantes Communes, edited by several Popes after Pope Sixtus IV. (1478 A.D.).

Ezekiel, whose name means "whom God will strengthen; or, the strength of God," was the great prophet of the Babylonish Captivity. He was a priest, and therefore of the family of Aaron, in the tribe of Levi; his father's name being Buzi, of whom nothing else is known; though it may be inferred that he was careful and conscientious in educating his son. It is probable too that he belonged to the higher class (2 Kings xxiv. 14). Of the birthplace of Ezekiel nothing is known (most likely it was not far from Jerusalem); but we are told by the prophet himself that he dwelt among the captives on the river Chebar (at Tel-Abib?), where he lived with his wife in a house of his own. He was carried into captivity 597 B.C., eleven years before the destruction of Jerusalem, yet a young man (a boy according to Josephus); and as the call to the prophetic office came to him 595 B.C., and, as some infer (from Ezek. i. 1), in the thirtieth year of his age, he must have been born about 625 B.C. Tradition relates many things concerning Ezekiel, to which, however, not much authority can be attached. He is reputed to have performed various miracles; and while some have tried to identify him with Zoroaster, others have thought him to be the same with a poet of Jewish tragedy, one Ezekiel who lived about 40 B.C. Perhaps the most probable of such traditions is that Ezekiel is the same with Nazaratius, the Assyrian instructor of Pythagoras. As already said, Ezekiel dwelt among the Jewish captives at Tel-Abib, on the Chebar; a stream once confidently identified with the Khabour, a tributary of the Euphrates, but now thought by many to be the great canal of Nebuchadnezzar; and there, in the thirtieth year, the call to prophesy came to him (Ezek. i. 1). It is not easy to determine what date is intended by the thirtieth year; but of all suggestions and opinions the most reasonable appears that which makes it the thirtieth year of Nabopolassar, whose reign began 625 B.C.; and this would place the beginning of Ezekiel's prophecy in 595 B.C.; so agreeing with the fifth year of Jehoiachin's captivity, according to the second note of time given by the prophet (Ezek. i. 2). From this time onward the word of the LORD came often to Ezekiel to warn and rebuke, to counsel and encourage the captive Israelites, and to foretell the future of the nations. No prophet is more varied in the style of his writings; visions and symbolic actions, parables, proverbs, and poems, allegories and direct prophecies abound; and in them all are displayed much varied knowledge and learning, great vigor of style and eloquence. Of Ezekiel, Bishop Lowth says, he "is much inferior to Jeremiah in elegance; in sublimity he is not even excelled by Isaiah; but his sublimity is of a totally different kind. He is deep, vehement, tragical; the only sensation he affects to excite is the terrible; his sentiments are elevated, fervid, full of fire, indignant; his imagery is crowded, magnificent, terrific, sometimes almost to disgust; his language is solemn, pompous, austere, rough, and at times unpolished; he employs frequent repetitions, not for the sake of grace or elegance, but from the vehemence of passion and indignation. . . . In many respects he is perhaps excelled by the other prophets; but in that species of composition to which he seems by nature adapted, the forcible, the impetuous, the great and solemn, not one of the sacred writers is superior to him." Critics have made two chief divisions of the prophecy of Ezekiel, the first consisting of the prophecies given before the destruction of the Temple in Jerusalem (ch. i.-xxiv.), the second of those spoken after that event (ch. xxv.-xlvi.). These divisions are again arranged in various sections as distinguished by their dates or superscriptions. The following synopsis is that of Hävernicks: "I. Ezekiel's call, i.-iii. 15. II. The general carrying out of the commission, iii. 16-17. III. The rejection of the people, because of their idolatrous worship, viii.-xi. IV. The sins of the age rebuked in detail, xii.-xix. V. The nature of the judgment, and the guilt which caused it, xx.-xxiii. VI. The meaning of the now commencing punishment, xxiv. VII. God's judgment denounced on seven heathen nations (Ammon xxv. 1-7; Moab 8-14; the Philistines 15-17; Tyre xxvi.-xxviii. 19; Sidon, 20-24; Egypt, xxix.-xxxii.). VIII. Prophecies, after the destruction of Jerusalem, concerning the future condition of Israel, xxxiii.-xxxix. IX. The glorious consummation, xl.-xlviii." (Smith's Dict. of the Bible.) A chronological order is followed throughout, though it is interrupted in several places, especially in the prophecies against the heathen nations; and a general unity of subject is obvious in the whole book, which is thought to have been studiously arranged by Ezekiel himself. Owing to a passage of Josephus, who speaks of two books of Ezekiel, it has been thought that there was a second volume of prophecies, of which no trace has been found for ages; but it seems more probable that there is some error about the passage of Josephus, or better still, that the single book of Ezekiel may have been at one time divided into two, perhaps at chapter xl. Though there are no direct quotations of Ezekiel in the New Testament, no one can read this prophet and the book of the Revelation without being impressed by the parallels and allusions contained in the latter; and it is not in language only that Ezekiel and St. John are to be associated together, for while the prophet, "writing before the old dispensation had passed away, is guided to represent the perfection of worship under the form of a renewed and more complete ritual, the Christian seer, writing under the new dispensation, represents to us the true character of the worship of God, foretold by Our Lord Himself, 'not in Jerusalem, nor in this mountain, but everywhere, in spirit and in truth,' by the striking announcement, 'I saw no temple therein; for the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the temple thereof' (Rev. xxi. 22)." (Bible Commentary, Introd. to Ezek.). Ezekiel is said to have been murdered by some Jewish prince, whom he had convicted of idolatry, and to have been buried in the tomb of Shem and Arphaxad on the banks of the Euphrates, where a town built by Jehoiachin was pointed out for many centuries as the resting-place of the prophet.

Ezra. One of the most useful of the men God raised up to restore the nation to rebuild the Temple and prepare the way for CHRIST. The period of his activity begins about fifty years after the decree of Cyrus, which (Ezra i.-vi.) had been suspended by the political opposition of the Samaritans, and renewed by Darius, and now with the influence he had given him in the Persian court he is permitted to go to Jerusalem with the second band of exiles, with full power from the king, Artaxerxes. As a descendant of Aaron he had kept a full register of the priestly descents, a most necessary record for the legal discharge of the Temple worship. When he reached Jerusalem with his company (ch. viii.) he was stricken with intense sorrow at the dissoluteness of the Jews of the first company, who had intermarried with the people around them, and his first care was to separate them from these foreign wives (chs. ix., x.). In this he succeeded, but not entirely (Neh. xiii. 28). It was left to Nehemiah to record how he restored the law (Neh. viii.). His influence was very great. The Jews have many tales of the grace that was in him. It is most probably to his recension and additions that we owe the present condition of the Hebrew Canon, with, of course, the exception of Malachi, the last of the prophets. The tale that he restored the whole of the Canon of the Old Testament is, of course, an idle one, but shows in what reverence he was held, and may have had its source in the fact that he wrote the book of the Chronicles, which, in its genealogies, ascends to Adam. Undoubtedly his influence in the restoration of the Temple, in the reviving the national life, in the work of instructing the people in the law, and his influence in the Persian court is not readily to be estimated. It is said, too, that he was president of the first Sanhedrim, which arranged the Canon. The tradition that he died at an advanced age is probably well founded. Altogether, without the brilliant genius of Daniel or the executive ability of Nehemiah, his learning, devoutness, noble descent, and his great capacity made him a most worthy instrument in the restoration.

Ezra, Book of. The work of the man of God to whom it has always been ascribed. Ezra, however, put together much material to which he had access, and which gave a connected outline of the events from the decree of Cyrus to his own visit to Jerusalem, from 536 B.C. to 456 B.C. The first part of the book is made up of the copy of the text of the decree to rebuild Jerusalem and to lay the foundation of the Temple, and a list of those who formed the earliest company of the Return under Zerubbabel and Joshua, with their first efforts to restore the Mosaic ritual (ch. i.-iii. 8). The list of those who went back first is repeated in Nehemiah, as he found it in Jerusalem when he made his visit, but it very properly belongs here. Ezra placed next the account of the laying of the foundations of the Temple, which was probably written by some eye-witness. It is conjectured that it was Haggai. In the narrative Ezra inserts the correspondence from the archives upon the interruption of the work of rebuilding and its resumption (ch. iii. 9; vi. 12). From thence to the end is the account of Ezra's own share in the effort to restore the observance of the moral and religious precepts of the law. He was a man of vast personal influence, for "he had prepared his heart to seek the law of the LORD and to do it, and to teach in Israel His statutes and judgments." Artaxerxes, the son of the famous Xerxes, in 457 B.C., sent him, with ample powers, to regulate the executive and administrative department of the restored people. He carried with him a second company, who carried the offering of the king for the worship at Jerusalem. The great reform which he records as his own effort, was to break up the marriages which the Jews had already made with the people of the country about them. It was a transgression of the law, a source of danger to the weak colony, and destructive of any effort to rouse and intensify that exclusive national jealousy which, however wrong now, was then the strongest means of preserving the nation from being absorbed into the surrounding population. His delicate task he effected with great skill. It would seem that this was all he could do independently. When, thirteen years later, Nehemiah came to finish the work, Ezra was an important aider, but what he did in the interval we are not informed. The book ends abruptly with the list of those who had put away their stranger wives. (Vide Smith's Bible Dictionary, Speaker's Commentary.)

F.

Faculties. In its technical sense a faculty means a special body of men who teach certain sciences, as a college faculty, which is really a body of teachers formed by the combined faculties of the separate departments,—e.g., the faculties of law or of philosophy. But it also came to mean a transference of the power of canonical or ecclesiastical jurisdiction. In this sense it passed into use as a commission to perform acts, not involving spiritual power, for the Bishop by a Presbyter. It was the office of a Commissary in fact. But then it passed into a dispensation for a Bishop to perform acts for his Primate. Then the Papacy gave the faculty to the Nuncio, and as this produced trouble with the Bishops, the Bishops themselves took faculties from the Pope,—i.e., powers defined and determined by these faculties for the administration of their Dioceses. This last form arose after the Council of Trent, since the Nuncios were multiplied in order to give greater enforcement to the Council's decrees, and to foster the efforts to recover lost ground in Germany. The faculties were usually given for only five years. This consequence has followed: the Council practically determined that the Bishop of Rome was the sole Bishop, and that all others received their mission from him. Then these faculties are really the mission each Bishop receives from him, and when they expire they must be renewed, or his rights over his Diocese are forfeited. This is also the purpose of the promise in the oath the Bishop under the Roman obedience takes, that he will visit the See of Peter every five years unless canonically excused or hindered (for nearer Sees three or four years is the time). It is one of the most serious perversions and extensions of a power which was but a simple right with really definite limits belonging to every Bishop. It destroys all true conception of the solidarity of the Episcopate, all constitutional rights, and overthrows the authority of the Church by giving all ultimate disciplinary power to one man. The truer canonical exercise of this power of granting faculties is yet used in England, where a faculty must be obtained to do anything or to have any alteration effected without the limits of the Canons, but not contrary to them. There is a special Court of Faculties, under a Master of Faculties. It can give license to marry without the previous proclamation of banns. It can license any change in the ornamentation of a church, as a faculty for placing a reredos in a certain position. It can grant a dispensation permitting a Deacon to be ordained under age, or a benefice to be succeeded to by a clergyman's son.

Faith denotes, both in Scripture and in common usage, several distinct, though inter-related things. In its broadest use it means that belief, more or less lofty, in God, His justice, love, and mercy, which leads to the adherence to principles and to actions which avow it. It may be merely an intellectual, or it may be an intensely practical, faith. It may mean a trust in, and devotion to, the person of CHRIST our LORD. It may mean the Church as the teaching body, or again, the body of Doctrines, or also the Creed, as the sum of the Faith. Each of these senses is used more or less freely in Holy Scripture, and they all pass into daily use. But we are not careful to use them accurately, the rather since they are derived the one from the other. To point out briefly each of these senses and to show that they are severally necessary to a full knowledge and use of what our Heavenly FATHER has done for us through the grace of our LORD JESUS CHRIST, and by the sanctification of the HOLY GHOST, we must dwell first on Faith in its widest sense.

I. GOD does not require of us any act which is not within our capacity, nor any belief that is not reasonable, or any principle which does not lift up and ennoble our natures. Our ability or capacity may be lessened, or weakened, or blurred, or even blotted out either by inheritance (Rom. v. 13), or by defect or default in ourselves; it is our failure and loss individually, not that of the race, and above all God has foreseen it and provided for it. It is His right to demand of us belief and performance of acts upon this belief, which is above our sinful present level, but to which we can rise, while He is ready to give, yea, has prepared help and means. To require Faith in Him, then, is nothing but His right; to yield it is our true natural power with which we were endowed. A lower, defective form of this Faith we give each other in the belief, credit, and trust which is the bond of all society. On it all science, all government, all commerce, all covenants of daily intercourse are based. Without it, the fairest share of all our work, and certainly all our happiness, would vanish. We trust each other rightly by our nature, despite so many disappointments. Through this capacity religion is founded. God bids us believe upon sufficient evidence which He supplies, yet such as calls for trust and sacrifice on our part. By the very structure of our moral being we must believe, and upon the evidence He has given in other lives, He requires us to frame our life. And this course of conduct is not concerning the things of time, but, accepting and using this present probation, it looks forward to a future reward. Abraham believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness. An intellectual act, passing through and lifting up the moral powers, it becomes a spiritual act. It elevates, ennoble every capacity of our nature, and must show itself in overt acts that bind body and soul to obedience to God. "Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh." It is a primal gift of God, as every ability is, but when we are co-workers with Him an increased ability is given us. Our response obtains the gift of greater strength through often increased tests of this Faith, and the trust of our love and faith obtains the blessing of being allowed to worship Him, serve Him in daily act, and kindles a burning desire to prove at all cost our Faith by a still deeper devotion. An increasing power of insight into God's dealing with us is also a gift as a part of Faith, which in turn adds still to our Faith and brings forth greater fruit. In this He shows the firmness of His promise, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee."

II. This Faith in God must be through a Faith in His SON JESUS CHRIST. For the Faith that our Heavenly FATHER requires is taught us by His SON, and this SON requires Faith in Himself. "Ye believe in God; believe also in Me." No man cometh to the FATHER but by Him. Through Him we both have access by one Spirit to the FATHER. In Him we are builded together for an habitation of God through the Spirit. Would we come to God,—He is the Way; would we receive the Truth,—He is the Truth; would we live forever,—He is the Life. "Whosoever believeth in Him shall never die." Since God was in CHRIST, reconciling the world by Him, there can be no other way. He stands forth before us and is our bondsman. The covenants of life are in Him. Life and all everlasting gifts pass through Him. He stands for us and pleads our cause. He hides our life in Himself. He is our peace. We cannot come to God therefore but by Him. Faith in God must be equally Faith in CHRIST as a Person having eternal and co-equal power with His FATHER our God. And claims our Faith. It is this man whom the Apostolic Christianity preaches as the one who, having made an atonement as victim, and by His Resurrection received consecration to plead as High-Priest and kingly authority, He is set forth as the interceding and offering Person upon whom our hopes must rest, and through whom alone the FATHER will receive us. It is reasonable, for the exceeding love of the Son, so wondrously shown forth. The passionate words of St. Paul are but sober fact: "If any man love not the Lord JESUS CHRIST let him be anathema." Faith in Him is a deeper act yet, and the New Testament supposes this Faith to proceed to Baptism and Confirmation and Holy Communion. For He demands of those who love Him (and to love demands Faith, and Faith involves something of love) to keep His commandments. Therefore the members of the Church are called the Believers and the Faithful. And a moment's thought proves that mere Faith without such bands as these is but a feeble grasp, easily lost, and is purposeless, a slight mental act and struggle, without the slightest adequate result.

III. Thence the Church is sometimes said to be the Faith, the Household of Faith, since within it we are fellow-citizens with the saints, and are of the Household of God, and have obtained the like precious Faith with the Apostles. For the spiritual Faith leads to using the Sacraments under which CHRIST gives Himself, and these Sacraments make us one with CHRIST. Therefore we recognize that this Faith leads to touch Him, and that touch is in the unity of the Church. So that, as we are taught that there is one LORD, one Faith, one Baptism, so there is but one hope of our calling, which can be found only in that Church which He bought with His blood, loved, sanctified, and adorned for Himself. The whole Epistle to the Ephesians is but an exposition of the Church as the result of Faith, the means of Faith, the strengthener of Faith, and therefore of the unity of the Church as a living body capable of giving those gifts which such an organization has intrusted to it by its Founder to dispense, in the order which He has directed and under the conditions He requires. And as a result, since we may not fully know how His gifts bear upon our eternal life, nor why He has chosen them and none others, it is also an act of Faith to receive them and use them, since we know in whom we have trusted, and that what we are receiving will have a power upon our future eternal glory. It follows, then, that this belief in GOD through CHRIST, and received in the Church with a full honest love, gives us another meaning to the word Faith, for

IV. The Faith refers also to the deposit of doctrine, full and entire, which is given to the Church, and which each faithful member of CHRIST is bound to receive. Analyzing the contents of this deposit of doctrine, we find it based upon the Faith in the TRINITY, which is involved in the words with which we are baptized: In the name of the FATHER, and of the SON, and of the HOLY GHOST. Upon this outline is framed the Creed, which is evidently an expansion of the baptismal formula. The revelations which illustrate and set forth this are summed up in the Creed. In its widest sense the deposit of the Faith is in the Holy Scripture, but its elements are stated in compressed form in the Creeds. The Faith means a belief in GOD as the Framer of the seen and unseen works of nature, of power, and glory. In the eternal nature, and in the several parts of His acts for our redemption. In the work of the HOLY GHOST, in and by the visible office of the Church for our salvation. So by a comparison of the several sermons preached by St. Peter (e.g., Acts iii. and v. and x.) with St. Paul's sermon (Acts xiii.) and the sermon in Heb. vi., we would see how largely the Creed reproduces them, and would be convinced that it was the form of sound words which St. Paul ordered St. Timothy to hold fast (cf. Rev. ii. 24, 25), or that it was the proportion of the Faith according to which the prophet was to prophesy (Rom. xii. 6). It was the Faith which St. Timothy was to hold, of which some made shipwreck, which heresies overthrow, which the Apostle had kept in fighting the good fight (vide Ep. to Tim.). Faith then, in a word, is applied to the whole range of beliefs and of applications of that belief, sanctified and purified by being from GOD the Friend and offered to GOD the FATHER, and bound up in GOD the SON, and sanctified by the HOLY GHOST. And the Faith in its several parts and in its unity is required of us rightly, because GOD is our GOD, and fairly, because we have the ability by nature, by His gift, by our use of it to yield it to Him.

Faithful. The Faithful, the very ancient name for the communicants of the Church. Every person baptized was immediately confirmed and was a communicant at once. He then was called one of the Faithful. It meant this in the New Testament, in Ephesians i. 1, "To the saints which are in Ephesus, and to the faithful in CHRIST JESUS." 2 Cor. vi. 15, "What part hath a believer with an unbeliever?" So too 1 Tim. iv. 3, 10, 12; v. 16. Where the Revised translation makes a phrase out of an adjective used as a noun, e.g., iv. 12, "be thou an ensample to them that believe in word, in manner of life, in love, in faith, in purity," the Authorized Version has "to the believers." It is literally "to the faithful." We have given so different a meaning to the word "believer" that it has lost its synonymous technical signification of "communicant" rightly belonging to it in many places in the New Testament. It was so used in the Liturgies and in Clemens' Rom. Epistles (A.D. 97) and in Ignatius' Epistles (A.D. 107), and thence in the Apostolic Canons, after which time it is not necessary to quote examples.

Faldistory was a low armless folding-chair in which a Bishop sat at the altar after his enthronization or on other solemn occasions. It was a portable chair, and probably would be the proper description of what we now call the Bishop's chair. But since the Bishop's chair strictly can be only in his Cathedral Church, it seems that the present chair, though something more, is really the old faldistory. The name is found in the Capitulary in the inventory of the Monastery and Church at Staffeisee (812 A.D.). The faldistory is probably the Bishop's chair ordered in the Rubrics of the Ordinal.

Faldstool. A Litany stool placed in the Choir from which the Litany is recited. It should be a low desk, merely high enough to kneel at. It was placed in the midst of the Choir, facing eastward. It was retained at Canterbury, York, Lincoln, and Exeter Cathedrals, and is used in St. Paul's. It is becoming much more common, and is frequently found in many Parish Churches.

Fall. There is no real difficulty in receiving the narrative in Genesis iii. as literally true. The condition of all nature and its relations to man were materially different then from what they became through the Fall. Therefore, admitting that sin did come into the world by the disobedience, there can be no disproof alleged of the truth of the details recorded of the act of the sin drawn from our present fallen state, wherein the relation of man to the lower creation is in a disrupted antagonizing condition from that one act. Then there was no fear, there was thorough subjection of all creatures to Adam, and there well could be an intercourse between man and the creation below him which has been practically lost; though even now some wonderful examples occur of man's intercourse with animals. There is, therefore, no reason to be drawn from the history that leads us to reject its literal truth. The three main results of the conscious willful disobedience are, (1) The change of man's relation to God. (2) The loss of his original holiness and of the special gifts it contained. (3) The impulse downward in all his desires and passions, and therefore a greater alienation from God.

Familiars. Officers of the Inquisition, who arrested obnoxious or suspected persons. These Familiars were often of excellent families, who from special privileges given them, both by the order and by the king, were induced to lend themselves to its iniquitous work. The Order of Inquisition lent its Familiars its protection under all circumstances, for as often as a legal process for any offense was issued against any one of the members, the process was transferred in some way to the Inquisition, who could thereupon stop proceedings.

Fanaticism. A mistaken and senseless misuse of enthusiasm and zeal, chiefly in a religious cause. It is a violation of all the laws of Christian charity, and the fanatic is guilty of a great sin.

Fanon. A term which has several meanings. I. A head-dress worn by the Pope when he celebrated mass pontifically. It was a veil of four colors, like the Mosaic ephod, put upon the head after the Pope was vested with the alb. It was tied round the neck, forming a kind of hood, and the tiara was put on above it. When the Pope performs the ceremony of washing the feet, on Maunday-Thursday, he is to wear the fanon without the mitre. II. The napkin or handkerchief which the priest used to wipe away the perspiration from his face during service. III. In later times, the white linen cloth in which the laity made their oblations of bread and wine at the altar. IV. A still later use of the word is that of Church-banners used in processions. (Smith's Dictionary of Christian Antiquities.)

Farse. A stuffing out (farcio); a practice, before the Reformation, of adding, as each verse was recited, in Latin, an interpretation in the common tongue for the benefit of the people. This was not a common practice, yet some singular examples of it may be seen in Neal's "Essays in Liturgiology."

Fasting. To fast for a longer or shorter time or over a stated period has been from earliest ages a means of showing grief, of proving sorrow, of gaining self-mastery, of bearing a spiritual discipline and practice.

It was not enjoined by the Law, as extensively as it was afterwards carried out by the people. There was only one fast, that of the Day of Atonement, appointed by the Law, but during, and after, the Captivity, four fasts were kept, the fast of the fourth, fifth, seventh, and tenth months. In the details of Jewish history we find fasts proclaimed for the people or ordered for some sudden occasion. Fasting was acknowledged by God Himself. It delayed Ahab's punishment; it prevented the immediate destruction of Nineveh. Our Lord assumed the use of fasts as of ordinary spiritual use in the Sermon on the Mount. He set us the great example in His own practice. He said that some spirits were only quelled by fasting and prayer. When St. Peter was sent to baptize Cornelius it was when he was fasting, and Cornelius received the grace of baptism because of his fasts, alms, and prayers. When Barnabas and Saul were sent forth, it was with fasting as well as prayer. St. Paul was constant in it as a means of spiritual discipline. Fasting is, then, a weapon in our spiritual warfare and an exercise in our spiritual training, one which should be laid aside for no light reason. But one or two principles must be kept in mind: (a) Fasting, unless with a distinct spiritual purpose or from a habitual use of it as in obedience to the Church's rule, is not worth anything. (b) Fasting without prayer is shorn of its power, and if alms are neglected also, it is of but little advantage, but with prayer and alms it is mighty in the inner soul life.

It would seem that in our heedlessness we overlook the fact that fasting is something more than a sorrow, or than a half restitution, but it should be used only for more than that. To too many this use of fasting is a necessary practice, but it is seldom done, whereas it should be used as a prayerful self-discipline by which we may draw nearer to God; so the Church intends it shall be, when she orders that Friday shall always be accounted a Fast, with the single exception when Christmas-day falls upon it; and the forty days of Lent, the Fast of the Ember seasons, and on the Rogation days, are all intended for that use. Indeed, she has ordered an hundred and four fasting days in the year, and the number is still further increased if Advent be accounted as a lesser Lent. It is necessary, then, to give more heed to what she teaches us upon this duty, which was needful even for the sinless human nature of our Lord that He might learn obedience (Heb. v. 7, 10; cf. St. Mark ix. 28, 29), and may not with safety be neglected by us. Our Church has laid down no positive rule as to the extent of our fasting, leaving it to each one to exercise it according to his ability and to his opportunity. Certain classes are exempt,—convalescents, children of tender years, and women about to become mothers or with young infants. Those on whose bodily strength depends the maintenance of a family should carefully regulate their fasting. Those who are aged should be careful. It is not intended that fasting should injure the health and usefulness of the person. But this should by no means be made a cloak for a general excuse. Few there are but could fast oftener and more to their own and others' profit than now do so. Fasting may be a total abstinence from food for a certain time, or it may be a partial abstinence for a longer period, or it may take the form of a giving up for a given time all pleasant food and all ordinary and extraordinary social pleasures. The Church expects an abstinence in greater or less strictness from us on her appointed days other than two, on which she looks for a total abstinence from each of her children, Ash-Wednesday and Good-Friday. Whatever rules we may lay down for ourselves for the other days in Lent, we should on these two days—the one the Church's call to her children to sorrow and self-examination, the other the solemn commemoration of the sacrifice made for all sin—fast with absolute strictness. A reason for the difficulty in carrying out a purpose to fast which some find as a hindrance, is that they plunge into a season of fasting without any previous training. The Lenten fast is to many not as spiritually profitable as it should be, because they have not practiced the lesser abstinence of the weekly Friday fast; a loss to them in their weekly devotional life and a hindrance to them in their larger efforts to gain it.

Fasts, Table of. A table of Fasts in the tables prefixed to the Book of Common Prayer, is part of the tables and rules for the movable and unmovable Feasts, together with the days of Fasting and Abstinence through the whole year. The Fasts which are absolutely strict are the two, Ash-Wednesday and Good-Friday. Of these, Ash-Wednesday is as ordered by the Church, and is only by her express authority made a strict fast, while Good-Friday has yet higher force as universal observance is added to the command of the Church. Indeed, Christmas-day, Good-Friday, and Easter-day—the Birth, Sacrifice, and Resurrection of our dear LORD—compel from the devout Christian an observance which he cannot conscientiously premit.

"Other days of Fasting on which the Church requires such a measure of Abstinence, as is more especially suited to extraordinary Acts and Exercises of Devotion:

"1. The Forty days of Lent.

"2. The Ember-days at the four seasons, being the Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday after the first Sunday in Lent, the Fast of Pentecost, September 14, and December 13.

"3. The three Rogation days, being the Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday before Holy Thursday, or the Ascension of our LORD.

"4. All the Fridays in the year except Christmas-day."

These several fasting days are noted in their proper places in the Cyclopædia, but it is proper to note one or two things in the table. The Church requires, and as good children we should use, such measure of abstinence, not of full fasts, but of self-denial that helps to self-control, that will regulate the pleasures of the palate and be ready to forego pleasant meats, that the mind may be less under the power of self-indulgence. It is not required of us to fast, but to abstain, and, too, no rigid rule is fixed. We should abstain from everything to which we are too much attached; whatever pleasant meats delight us lay these aside. There are ninety-seven such days of abstinence. And if they were devoutly observed, as we are in common duty bound and as our love to the Church should urge us, the devoutness of our spiritual life would be much heightened. What we should abstain from must be left to the circumstances and condition of each person.

Fatalism. "What has been decreed cannot be revoked" is the fundamental idea of the Fatalist. It was the necessity of the Greek, the Fate of the Latin, and is the Fatalism of the Christian who perverts the true doctrine of Predestination. Fatalism is the practical creed of those who overlook the fact that predestination is not taught of individuals but of the Church, in the Bible. GOD raised up certain men, both for honor and, as they chose, for dishonor (e.g., Balaam, who was a prophet and sank to a petty demagogue under Balak's temptation), but this is not the basis of Predestination. But when the stern, narrow logic of later ideas of Predestination is applied to life and to individuals, Fatalism is the unavoidable conclusion. Mohammed brought this forward and made it the Creed of Islam. "Ye cannot will except the LORD willeth" (Korân, Sura 81). It led to wild fanaticism on the field of battle, it leads now to political supineness, and will be one of the final elements in working the destruction of Islamism. But the Spinozism which fashions too much the current of predestination thought, is itself a fatalistic system. Education and the freedom of thought, and the power to reason and also to use the insight of relativity, will be the best corrective to its influence, apart from the deeper devout study of the Scriptures. Fatalism was made indirectly a part of Luther's theology (De Servo Arbitrio), though he afterwards changed it very much. Zwingli also held it, by teaching that the elect were so by the determinate decree of GOD, the correlative of which proposition must follow.

Father. The distinguishing note of the Christian dispensation is the doctrine of the Fatherhood of GOD, through the revelation of His only-begotten SON JESUS CHRIST our LORD. The FATHER is confessed in the Creeds. "I believe in ONE GOD, the FATHER Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, and of all things visible and invisible," is the Confession of the Nicene Creed. "I believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth," is the Confession of the Apostles' Creed. In the records of the earlier dispensation, in which the revelation was mainly of the Unity of the Godhead, this is not so distinctly traced; but, nevertheless, it is taught, and still oftener implied. The FATHER is Himself the source and self-existent Essence of the Divine Nature, and is properly a Father in that He hath an only-begotten Son, the eternal WORD (Ps. ii. 7; Heb. i. 5). Therefore, in the highest, most proper sense, HE is the FATHER of the WORD, and holds and displays in the Divine perfectness all the relations and attributes which belong to the FATHER towards His Son (St. John v. 19, 20, and vs. 17). He grants to His Son all the privileges, and demands for Him all the honors which belong to Him as His Son (St. John v. 21-23). He gives of His own to His Son (St. John xvi. 15). In the Unity of the Divine Essence the Son is all that the FATHER is, in Majesty, Glory, Power, Eternity, and Incomprehensibility, save in that which belongeth to GOD as the FATHER (St. John x. 30; xvii. 5, 21, 22). But, as He is FATHER of the eternal nature, so that Son is no less His Son when by the HOLY GHOST He took upon Himself flesh, and was born of the Virgin Mary, and became man. "For GOD so loved the world that He gave His only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life" (St. John iii. 16). This only-begotten Son, born of the Virgin, and called then the Son of GOD (St. Luke i. 35) was testified to by the Voice from heaven, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased" (St. Matt. iii. 17). By the eternal Son of GOD, who in His human nature, being the Son of Adam, was as we the Son of GOD, we become immortal sons of GOD in partaking His nature, putting Him on us as becoming man. He became the Son of GOD, as we are, by creation. He was glorified openly by His FATHER. He was confessed by the Devils (St. Mark iii. 11). He gave to them that received Him power to become the sons of GOD, even to them that believe on His name, which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of GOD. Through His revelation and gift we have GOD to our Father in the highest sense, for He is not ashamed to call us brethren. But in the Christian Church this is only attainable. "For as many as are led by the Spirit of GOD, they are the sons of GOD; . . . ye have received the Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry ABBA, FATHER" (Rom. viii. 14, 15; cf. Gal. iv. 5, and St. Mark xiv. 36). So the LORD's Prayer, "Our FATHER," etc., sets forth the crowning act of our right as sons of GOD; and the first imploration of the Litany but repeats it. Yet this Son of GOD was born a Jew, according to the flesh, and in this dispensation the FATHER's love is shown, for the Psalmist cried, "Like as a father pitieth his children, even so the LORD pitieth them that fear Him." They that remember the LORD shall be spared, "as a man spareth his own son that serveth him" (Mal. iii. 7). In the first chapter of Proverbs the Fatherhood of GOD is brought out, for the Father and the Mother are GOD and the Church. Moses exclaimed in his song, "Is not He thy Father that hath bought thee?" GOD sent His message by Moses to Pharaoh concerning the people in their bondage. Israel is my son, my first-born. Wider cry yet cometh from the Gentiles through the Prophet Isaiah: "Doubtless Thou art our Father, though Abraham be ignorant of us, and Israel acknowledge us not: Thou, O LORD, art our Father, our Redeemer; from everlasting is Thy name" (Is. lxiii. 16). And these who so stretch out their beseeching hands to GOD are the sons of Adam, who is the son of GOD. Therefore, in the Creeds, in the LORD's Prayer, in every address to Him as the FATHER, we approach Him by the right of creation in Adam, of revelation in the Jew, of sonship through His Son, who standeth evermore at the right hand of the FATHER, to receive our prayers and to give us access, as He has said, "No man cometh unto the Father but by Me."

Fathers, The. The crudest notions are entertained by the antagonists of Episcopalians respecting their estimation of the Christian Fathers. They look upon us as regarding the Fathers like a secondary sort of Evangelists or Apostles; as though their assertions ranked next to Scriptural ones, if not quite equal to them. They fancy we treat them as St. John would fain have treated the Angel in the Apocalypse, and give them reverential homage if not downright worship.

It is really hard to impress upon them the simple but essential distinction that the Fathers, like many other authors, sustain a twofold character,—that of divines and that of witnesses. As divines, they may have peculiar and personal opinions. St. Augustine, for example, is supposed by multitudes to have been what would now be called a Calvinist, because he talked so freely of predestination; albeit, his idea of predestination was a predestination to grace in this life, and not a predestination to glory or perdition in the next. St. Jerome was monkish, and Tertullian what we might call somewhat of a Quaker. But, as divines, we receive any peculiarity in their opinions as we receive the opinions of divines now living, for what they are worth, and not as authoritative or directive because of the men who entertained them.

It is as witnesses to Christian history, and especially as witnesses to a general or Catholic interpretation of Scripture, that we chiefly value them. They lived near the times when the Christian Scriptures were written; and of course could tell us how primitive Christians had received their signification, as handed down by the Apostles and their contemporaries. This sort of interpretation in relation to ancient documents, and documents whose signification has been a matter of serious dispute, is of the very highest authority, common sense and common law teach us this; for we find one of the established maxims of courts to be, "Contemporanea expositio est optima et fortissima in lege,"—"A contemporaneous exposition is the best and strongest in law." (Wharton's Legal Maxims, p. 57.) This is the exposition which a judge upon the bench esteems above any mere opinion, or grammatical criticism, of the present day. A man's genuine meaning, in anything he says or writes, is what he intends by that which he says or writes. The dictionary and grammar may make a man's apparent intention, in his last will and testament, quite unlike his real and actual intention. And therefore a surrogate, or judge of probate, cares much less for the dictionary and grammar than for the genuine intention of the testator, if he can reach it without them. And the same rule should govern if the question respected the signification of a Constitution, a Statute, a Treaty, or a Contract. We want the aim, the design, the inward resolve of the authors of a Constitution, a Statute, a Treaty, or a Contract as a key, and the best of keys, to their actual and permanent signification.

Now it is under the influence of such sentiments that we go to the Fathers for the proper construction of the Scriptures and primitive Christian History. They are the persons to tell us what was the contemporaneous exposition of the Bible, what construction the Primitive Church put upon the Bible, because they are the best witnesses in the case we can possibly obtain. They were nearest the minds of the Apostles among all in the old Christian world. They were conspicuous and trustworthy persons. As witnesses, they could hardly be mistaken concerning the books which the Primitive Church gathered into a volume, which it called the Bible. They could also tell what sort of a Church had come down from Apostolic times, what rites it cherished, what officers governed it, and how it perpetuated its own existence.

Where else could we go (if we neglected or discarded such witnesses) when the drift of the Bible about such matters is called in question? The Bible does not attest its own Canon, or the construction of its disputed passages. It is a Latin Church book, or a Greek Church book; an Episcopal book, or a Presbyterian book; a Baptist book, or a Congregationalist book; a Methodist book, or a Quaker book; a Unitarian book, or a Free Church book; or, finally, a Rationalistic book; as denominations, or schools, or self-satisfied thinkers choose to account it. We must go outside of it for contemporaneous interpretation, or we must dispute and wrangle to the world's last day.

"We hold, and say we prove, from Scripture plain,
That CHRIST is God; the bold Socinian,
From the same Scripture, urges he's but man.
Now what appeal shall end the important suit?
Both parts talk loudly, but the rule is mute."

Even such a mind as Dryden's, layman if he were, could see this issue by an act of intuition, and put it to his fellows in a most characteristic way. (Works, 12mo ed., pp. 146, 147.)

True, he put it in the shape of poetry. But Dryden is said to have reasoned better in poetry than in prose; and certainly there is unmistakable and fruitful logic in his quoted lines.

The Church of Rome once saw, and insisted triumphantly, that the Scriptures must be interpreted according to the unanimous sense of the Fathers. Well, this test was applied to one of her most favorite authorities,—the text in Matthew, so often appealed to as establishing the Pope's supremacy. The unanimous consent of the Fathers, however, did not sustain her. Cardinal Newman saw this at a glance, and so he broached his theory of Development, which finds the germs of Romanism in the Bible, but not its full-blown dogmas.

But suppose the question to have been, Did the Primitive Church acknowledge a Trinity in the Godhead, or an Episcopacy in Church Government?—and we can find even a Gibbon acknowledging that such things were notorious down to the sixteenth century. And this leads us to say that the general, the all but unanimous, testimony of history respecting chief matters, fundamental matters, is singularly uniform. The Church Catholic, to this very day, believes in such points with all but consolidated unanimity. And if the Church Catholic would take the two points instanced and make them a basis of a Concordat, she would be a consolidated unity still, and the Communion of Saints exist no longer as a mere article of a creed. They are sufficient for the basis of a Concordat which would render all Christendom essentially and harmoniously one. And this is not spoken without book. When the American Episcopal Church first sent a Bishop to the East, he was charged by our Presiding Bishop to offer Christian communion, the fellowship of Christianity, to all who would receive it on the basis of the Nicene Creed for doctrine, and Apostolic Episcopacy for discipline, leaving form of worship and liturgies out of the question, as matters which might be conformed to national customs and educated tastes. The offer was listened to, and proved enough for Greek Christians and Oriental Christians generally.

But Rome, on the one hand, and anti-Episcopalians on the other, will not accept such a basis for a Concordat. By no means. There must be a Pope on this side, or ministerial parity on the other side, or the hand of brotherhood cannot cross the chasm and give the clasp of consanguinity. Who, then, are the hinderers, who the schism-makers, if the Church of CHRIST is still divided, and not likely to be one for centuries?

Doubtless we Episcopalians are considered a very exclusive and a very uncharitable people; but we have asked of our tallest Churchmen again and again, and of the most intelligent among them, too, if the Nicene Creed for doctrine, and Apostolic Episcopacy for discipline, would not be enough to start from, for a Concordat, with any body of Christians under heaven. And the invariable and cheerful answer has been that it would be. And is not this enough to show that, while we continually deprecate "false doctrine, heresy, and schism" in our Litany, our prayers are as continually answered, and that we are as free from "all uncharitableness" as any body of Christians beneath the sun,—as near a primitive standard as any other Christian body,—and that the Bible, interpreted according to the unanimous consent of the Fathers, is our true profession and our filial inheritance?

Feast. It is a principle in natural religion to seek by some joyous observance to express our religious feelings of happiness or thankfulness. This natural readiness, shown in innumerable heathen festivals and holidays, was used by Divine Providence for the teaching of His religion and for training mankind in His Life. He used it for the Israelites, beginning with the Passover. "And this day shall be unto you for a memorial; and ye shall keep it a feast to the LORD throughout your generations: ye shall keep it a feast by an ordinance forever" (Ex. xii. 14). And so of the other Feasts, of Pentecost, of Tabernacles, of Trumpets, the weekly sabbath, the seventh year, the year of Jubilee. Thrice a year each male was to appear before the LORD. It is not the place here to do more than note the binding unifying effect of such feasts as these. Since, then, the demands of natural devoutness and God's command conjoin to make Feasts a necessity, the Church has followed this principle; in fact, the Passover has become our Easter, Pentecost is Whit-Sunday, and by the guidance of the Spirit the Sabbath of the Jew has been transferred to the LORD's day,—Sunday. These are Feasts commemorating redemptive acts by, and enabling gifts from, our LORD; the round is completed by the joyful celebration of Christmas-day. The Christian year falls into two distinct parts, (I.) the Sundays from Advent to Whit-Sunday, in which the Life, Work, Passion, Crucifixion, Death, and Resurrection, Ascension of CHRIST, and His sending to us the all-containing gift of the HOLY GHOST are commemorated; and (II.) the Sundays extending from Trinity-Sunday on till Advent is reached again. All Sundays are minor Feasts of the Resurrection, but with this they as well as certain week-days have an added teaching and memorial joyfulness. Christmas-day and Epiphany generally, and Ascension-day always, fall upon a week-day, but all other Feasts founded on His work fall on Sunday. Feasts are divided into movable and immovable. Those are movable which depend upon Easter, which Feast depends upon the full moon on or after the 21st of March, giving a latitude of a month (from March 22 to April 25). Upon Easter depend the number of Sundays after the Epiphany, the date of the Ascension-day, Whit-Sunday, and Trinity-Sunday, as these fall at fixed spaces before or after Easter. Those which are immovable are the Feasts which fall on days of the month. Thus Christmas-day is always the 25th of December, and may fall on any day of the week, and Epiphany is the 6th of January, and also may fall on any day of the week.

The Act of Edward VI. (5 and 6, c. 3, s. 1) so clearly sets forth these reasons, is the foundation of our Table of Feasts, and shows Cranmer's hand so plainly, that the first section is here given:

"For as much as men at all times be not so mindful to laud and praise GOD, so ready to resort and hear GOD's holy word, and to come to the Holy Communion and other laudable rites which are to be observed in every Christian congregation as their bounden duty doth require; therefore, to call men to remembrance of their duty, and to help their infirmity, it hath been wholesomely provided, that there should be some certain times and days appointed wherein Christians should cease from all other kinds of labors, and should apply themselves only and wholly unto the aforesaid holy works properly pertaining unto true religion; the which times and days specially appointed for the same are called holidays, not for the matter or nature either of the time or day, nor for any of the saints' sake whose memories are had on those days (for so all days and times considered are GOD's creatures and all of like holiness), but for the nature and condition of those godly and holy works wherein only GOD is to be honored and the congregation to be edified, whereunto such times and days are sanctified and hallowed, that is to say, separated from all profane uses, and dedicated and appointed not unto saint and creature, but only unto GOD and His true worship; neither is it to be thought that there is any certain times or definite number of days prescribed in Holy Scripture, but that the appointment both of the time and also of the number of days is left by the authority of GOD's word to the liberty of CHRIST's Church, to be determined and assigned orderly in every country by the discretion of the rulers and ministers thereof as they shall judge most expedient, to the true setting forth of GOD's glory and the edification of their people; it is, therefore, enacted that all the days hereinafter mentioned shall be kept and commanded to be kept holidays and none other; that is to say, all Sundays in the year, the days of the Feast of the Circumcision of our LORD JESUS CHRIST, of the Epiphany, of the Purification of the Blessed Virgin, of St. Matthias the Apostle, of the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin, of St. Mark the Evangelist, of St. Philip and Jacob the Apostles, of the Ascension of our LORD JESUS CHRIST, of the nativity of St. John the Baptist, of St. Peter the Apostle, of St. James the Apostle, of St. Bartholomew the Apostle, of St. Matthew the Apostle, of St. Michael the Archangel, of St. Luke the Evangelist, of St. Simon and Jude the Apostles, of All-Saints', of St. Andrew the Apostle, of St. Thomas the Apostle, of the Nativity of our LORD, of St. Stephen the Martyr, of St. John the Evangelist, of the Holy Innocents, Monday and Tuesday in Easter-week, and Monday and Tuesday in Whitsun-week; and that none other day shall be kept and commanded to be kept holy, or to abstain from lawful bodily labor." It will be observed that the Feast of the conversion of St. Paul and the Feast of St. Barnabas were omitted in the act, but their names are inserted properly in the Table of Feasts.

We have here the rules clearly laid down upon which the Churches of England and of these United States have acted in these matters, and from which their practice has never swerved. The office for Thanksgiving-day is a movable one, being the only link which connects the Church's offices with the authority of the State in the appointment of national holidays.

To close with Hooker's noble words: "Well to celebrate these religious and sacred days is to spend the flower of our time happily. They are the splendor and outward dignity of our Religion; forcible witnesses of ancient truth, provocations to the exercise of all piety, shadows of our endless felicity in Heaven, on earth everlasting records and memorials; wherein they which cannot be drawn to hearken unto that we teach may, only by looking upon that we do, in a manner read whatsoever we believe." (Hooker, Eccl. Pol., v., sect. 71, ad fin.)

Festival. The main difference between the words Feast and Festival seems to be that Feast is more often applied to the sacred Feasts which commemorate our LORD's life, while the Festival is applied to the days commemorative of God's Saints. And here we may remark that wherever in the calendar there is a Feast of our LORD's life falling on a week-day there should be a celebration of the Holy Communion. The Epistle and Gospel are ordered in all cases for both classes of Feast-days as well as for Sundays for such a celebration. This is their purpose. But at the least, the Feasts not only of Christmas and Ascension, but also of the Circumcision and the Epiphany, should be so kept. It is a growing custom to commemorate the Saints' days by that celebration which the Church intends should be had, by providing the Liturgic Scriptures of the Epistle and Gospel, for it is the sign of our unity in the Body of CHRIST which is His Church, and we profess the Faith once given to the saints as unchanged and unchangeable.

It may be asked, Why not commemorate the Saints of the Old Testament as well as those of the New? Hooker's reply is complete when he remarks that "we are content to imagine, it may be perhaps true, that the least in the Kingdom of CHRIST is greater than the greatest of all the Prophets of God that have gone before." (Eccl. Pol., v., sect. 71.) We thank God for their examples, and beseech Him to walk in their holy footsteps, and we desire to be made partakers of that blessedness He has given them, and we acknowledge thereby the deep bond of a common brotherhood in CHRIST our LORD, and note wherein we too can tread in those holy ways which He has prepared for us to walk in.

Filioque. In the controversies which raged in Spain between the Orthodox and the Arians (580 A.D.) the procession of the HOLY GHOST from the SON as well as from the FATHER was a powerful argument against the heretics. The third Council of Toledo (589 A.D.) directed that in the Creed, the clause upon the procession of the HOLY GHOST should read, Qui, ex Patre, Filioque, procedit. It was accepted in the Spanish and Gallican Churches. It was noticed as an interpolation by the Greek ambassadors at the Council of Gentilly (767 A.D.). Popes Adrian I. (790 A.D.) and Leo III. (806 A.D.) declined to sanction it, though it was persistently used in Gaul. But Nicolas I. (866 A.D.) found it convenient to use it in his controversy with Photius, the intruding Patriarch of Constantinople. Photius expressed the general denunciation of the East against it, and it continued to be the subject of sharp contentions between the Greek and the Latin Churches till the final rent (1054 A.D.). A conference upon it was held at Nice (1234 A.D.) and a Council at Nymphaea without fruit. So, too, it was discussed at Lyons (1274 A.D.). A reluctant assent to it was wrung from the Greek envoys at Florence (1439 A.D.), which was immediately repudiated by the Oriental Churches. The only discussion of any value since, was at Bonn (1874 A.D.), where its insertion was declared to be illegal, and an effort for its removal was urged. Repeated efforts both in the English Convocations and in our General Convention have been made to have it removed. But it was felt that the reception was so general in the West that it would be well, in view of the apparent course of events, to have it done by a larger portion and more representative of the Western Church than by merely the Anglican Communion acting alone, however needful the removal of the offending clause may be. The objection of the Eastern theologians is that it may be made to teach a dual source of procession, for the FATHER as self-existing is the sole source of the procession of the SPIRIT, the mission to us being through the SON. The interpolation was also bitterly condemned as wholly extra vires, as incurring the anathema of the Council of Chalcedon against all tampering with the Creed, and as necessarily forcing a schism in the body of CHRIST. This is a continued protest, and will so remain till the Filioque is cast out. It must be added that these objections do not lie against the imploration in the Litany. There the words are liturgically used, to Him who proceedeth by His mission from the SON to teach us how to pray aright.

Finance, Church. First, the Basis. The ministrations of public worship and of Christian charity cannot be sustained without a large outlay of money. But in our LORD's teaching the Kingdom of God is that thing which a man is "first" to "seek." For one's self, therefore, and for one's family, when one is making up the table of the very necessities of life, nothing can take higher rank on that list of things indispensable than the ministrations of religion. Nothing can more reasonably expect for itself adequate provision. This is the mere prudence of a wise man in taking care for himself and for his own household.

But the Church is the Representative of that CHRIST who came to this world upon a Foreign Mission, and who both took to Himself a human nature and went about doing good, healing men's bodies, enlightening men's minds, lifting burdens from human souls. The precept is, "Let this mind be in you which was also in CHRIST JESUS." The Church that is His must be a missionary Church. Hospitals, likewise Asylums, Homes for the Aged and for the Orphans, Training Schools of Nurses, and seminaries of good learning spring up wherever this Church has gone.

Reason commends the stern words written in Scripture of him "that doeth the work of the LORD negligently." Here, if anywhere, low maxims and loose practices must be shunned. Titles to Church property and insurance of buildings require honest, that is, scrupulous attention. It ought to be clearly understood that rashly to incur debt in the building of churches is just as reprehensible as to do it in other relations. To leave the rector's salary unpaid a week after it falls due is the same thing as to let a note lie dishonored at the bank. Those clergymen, held in esteem of their people, who have distinctly declared at the first that they should instantly resign the charge if ever the salary was one hour behind in the payment, have done good service in toning up the lazy flocks. And, in all the undertakings of Christian beneficence, the business parts require the same sound principles, wise methods, and careful attention for which men look in secular affairs.

Second. The methods of securing moneys and of disbursing them, and the tenure of Church property.

The Diocese, the real churchly unit as distinguished from the parish, both carries on works within itself and aids works without itself; within the Diocese, the local (parochial) and the more general.

Provision for parochial needs in self-sustaining parishes and the management of their finances the Diocese now leaves almost wholly with the parish. Through the parish the Church fixes the rector's salary and provides for its payment. In this way all parochial needs are met, with few canonical regulations or restrictions, provided the canonical requirements regarding offerings for specified Diocesan objects without the parish be not set aside.

Parochial Needs, the rector's salary, the parish's portion of the Bishop's salary, and other current local expenses are met in various methods. The chief source of revenue are Pew-rentals, Subscriptions, Pledged Weekly Offerings, Unpledged Weekly Offerings, and Endowment Funds.

From Rental of Pews very many large and important parishes derive their income. Among these must be counted many that are most liberal in contributions to Missions and to all works of love. Taking men with their inherited views and habits, in the average strong city parish probably so large and so steady an income for parochial uses as comes through the Pew-rental will not at first be yielded in any other way. It is also true that the system of renting pews for revenue is often so charitably adjusted to individual cases, and is so guarded otherwise, as to be free from the worst evils that accompany it when it is severely carried through. But to large numbers of Churchmen it seems a grave evil that privileges in God's House should be sold for money, an evil that would become a wrong if perpetrated after it can reasonably be brought to an end. So profound has this feeling become with the more vivid apprehension of what is meant by our LORD's Incarnation, that other methods have been sought out for the maintenance of the LORD's House more in harmony with primitive practice, and involving no special privileges accorded to wealth in sacred things.

Probably in every Diocese churches will now be found in which no pews are rented. In several more than half the congregation do not resort to Pew-rentals. A few Bishops no longer deem it right to consecrate to Almighty God a House afterwards to be sold in parcels, and never do it. "Tolerate no restriction at the door, by pride or tax, which can bar out any child of the FATHER," are the earnest words of the House of Bishops in their Pastoral Letter of 1883 A.D. Wherever Pew-rentals are not had, the aim is to bring the parishioners to contribute each according to his ability to meet the parochial expenses, for these plainly must be met in some way.

Pledged Weekly Offerings have frequently been introduced. If their introduction have been intelligently followed and preceded, not by mendicant appeals, but with rich, generous instruction out of CHRIST's Gospel, and if the pledges and their fulfillment have been so attended to that every family is reached, and that it is known to the proper person whether the pledge received at the year's beginning is weekly made good, the results have almost invariably been satisfactory. In a large class of parishes, especially in manufacturing towns, but elsewhere as well, this "Envelope Plan" (as it is named) of pledged weekly offerings, has succeeded in a marked degree.

The Weekly Offering Unpledged is in other instances the reliance. This is in several respects the best of all. But for its permanent success the congregation must be of some intelligence and substantial character, and self-respecting. It must be composed of persons who have the mental and the moral power to sit down and quietly decide what they ought to do, and then to hold themselves steadily, year after year, to the doing of it. To the writer of this paragraph a self-supporting parish is known which with neither pledge nor account kept with individuals, in the Sunday offering has nigh a score of years contributed for parochial uses hundreds of dollars annually more than the vestry formerly secured by Pew-rentals. Nor were contributions to objects without the parish suffered to fall off, as they do and will fall off if care be not taken and if some preventive system be not adopted where the offering replaces the Pew-rental. But by and with the change missionary contributions can even be increased, save among folk of the narrowest vision, if the clergyman himself be a man wise, vigilant, and of large heart.

By this method the parish cannot know at the year's beginning precisely upon what income they can rely. To set over against this inconvenience is the pecuniary advantage which the Plan of Offerings, whether pledged or unpledged, every Sunday possesses, that a considerable sum is sure to be received from strangers who happen to be in church, and from other persons who would not "hire a pew." And they whose wages are paid weekly, and many others, find it less difficult to bring weekly their money, some part of which would otherwise, perhaps, have been needlessly spent, than to go on to the quarter's end and then to find a large sum due at one time. And St. Paul's "order" to the Churches in Galatia and in Corinth, on "the first day of the week" carefully to "lay by," as God had prospered them, is helpful likewise in these days.

Upon Subscriptions a few parishes largely in rural, agricultural regions principally depend. The Subscription is made yearly to a collector, and the sums are commonly paid to him quarterly. In some places, particularly among farmers whose money comes in at one season of the year, or at two or three seasons, the times of full payment are apt to be determined partly by this fact. In an increasing number of parishes that rely on Subscriptions, the money subscribed is, the first Sunday in each Quarter, placed by the individual contributor in the alms-basin in church, with the person's name. This is done both for spiritual reasons and to save much of the labor of "collecting."

Parochial Endowments, also, have been made in some parishes, by which part of the yearly wants are supplied. The general opinion in the Church is, that if there be considerable Funds belonging to a parish, the parishioners are likely to do less than their own duty in giving, and that in such parishes they have actually done less. For rector's salary and the ordinary expenditures vigorous, healthy, substantial parishes usually deem it best to rely on themselves to furnish, year by year, what is requisite. But even these parishes could often enlarge themselves, and add much to their usefulness, if they were enabled to improve their services and to multiply their ministrations of worship, charity, or instruction.

One sees at this time an evident tendency to encourage the new energies by endowing those particular things in the parish in which the individual benefactor feels the deepest interest. Funds are now established more and more in parishes of all kinds, to secure a large and well-taught choir, to meet the cost of more frequent Services on week-days, for the better Christian instruction of the children, for parochial Homes and Hospitals, and for the poor of the parish. Repair Funds, Rectory Funds, Chapel Funds, and the like are slowly multiplying on every hand, greatly to the glory of God. Gifts for special purposes, parochial like these, are thankfully welcomed. For its more ordinary expenses the strong parish does best with few funds or with none.

Three classes of parishes are recognized as forming exceptions, and as calling very urgently for Endowments to furnish a part of that which the ordinary expenses require. First is the parish in sparsely-populated regions, the decaying hill parish it may be. From many a place like this, to which it can hardly be expected that missionary aid will cheerfully go forever, the light of God's Church would have gone out were it not for the permanent Funds which thoughtful piety has supplied.

These Funds are established by a devout parishioner at his departure from this life or before, or by some generous man or woman reared in that parish, or by the son or daughter of one whose native parish it was. With the assistance thus lovingly given for all time, and perhaps, in addition, by the combining of two such cures, the ministrations of our holy religion go on. The dead are buried with words of hope, and the young grow up in God's fear. And from just these Christian rural homes hundreds of young men go forth to stand among the country's most distinguished men, and to be the Church's stanchest sons. The strength and value of the men who have grown up in these rural hill towns is probably out of all proportion to their numbers. So far as one can see, the parishes in townships which have a stationary or a diminishing population will not be continued in existence, and remote rural homes will not be kept Christian without the aid of Parochial Endowments.

The larger manufacturing towns, in the second place, not seldom present congregations of working people in numbers that require the expenditure which pertains to a large church. Yet not one person of any wealth at all may be found; and the congregations are ever changing, with discouraging rapidity. These people are second to none in liberality. Yet it is fast coming to be evident that in such congregations a portion of the yearly needs ought to be assured by Endowments, and Endowments to this end are (alas! too slowly) multiplying.

The third class needing and gradually receiving large permanent Funds for the general ordinary uses of the parish comprises but few, but these have peculiar importance, and ought to be recognized as presenting very exceptional claims. They are the parishes by the side of large Colleges and Universities in villages in which the Church people are neither many nor rich. Perceiving that these people, with the help of the small contributions of students, cannot hope to maintain Divine service respectably as it ought there to be maintained, it is obvious that Endowments are the one thing upon which the Church in these College towns that are small towns must, under God, depend.

This is equally true of villages that are the seat of powerful Academies and other important Schools. Endowments for this blessed work have been built up and are now building, and must go on in building, through gifts of those students who chance to be at once wealthy and thoughtful, and of their friends, through gifts of prosperous persons once students in these institutions, and gifts of any others whose discernment is sufficient to show them how wide-reaching and far-reaching are all strong influences about these centres of learning.

To these three sets of parishes which, it is agreed, ought to look much to Endowments, and which ought to rely greatly thereon, it may be fit to add that some observing men are watching to see in the more populous cities a few large churches, free churches, centrally placed and well appointed in all things, and amply endowed. But of results actually reached in this direction, next to nothing can be recorded.

Parochial moneys are expended by the Vestry (the Rector, Wardens, and Vestrymen in many places the legal title is). The single exception is the Communion Alms.

These are wholly at the Rector's discretion. For greater delicacy in dealing with the poor, it is customary for a Rector to submit his account to only one person, usually a Warden. Even this he does only for his own protection.

The title to the church edifice and to the parsonage in most Dioceses is vested in the corporation of the parish. Need has lately been felt of some better guarantee than is thus furnished of the permanent keeping to its original intent of the parish property, that the pious purposes of the donors may not be frustrated. And the Dioceses are rapidly coming to have each a Central Corporation (e.g., the "Trustees of the Protestant Episcopal Church in New Hampshire"). This Corporation is empowered to hold Funds for any religious or charitable object designated by the donor, and in accordance therewith to disburse the income. It also holds in trust for that congregation the title-deeds of the church or parsonage belonging to any parish that may request these trustees to do it. The parishes not quite certain of the future availing themselves of this stronger security are already many. The movement sprang mainly from the laity. It is warmly favored by the Bishops and the other clergy as prudent for a large proportion of the parishes, which being Religious Societies have a corporate existence, and which ask no missionary aid.

In Missions within a Diocese, that which was only useful in the case of a parish becomes more nearly a necessity. Parishes are not now organized at so early a stage of the mission's existence as once they were. Land commonly must be purchased, and the church erected perhaps, before there is in fact a legally constituted society (parish) to hold the Title. The deed, therefore, is very likely to run to these trustees of the Diocese, in trust for this congregation. Rarely is it found that when organized into a parish the congregation desires to withdraw the trust. This Diocesan Corporation is composed of laymen chosen by the Convention, with sometimes a Presbyter or two, and has the Bishop for President.

A Corporator-sole consisting of the Bishop, a device which has been urged by a few writers, to hold and administer the permanent Funds, seems to accord well neither with American usages and ideas nor with the spiritual functions of the Bishop, and it meets with scant favor.

Missions within a Diocese secure that part of the missionary's salary and of the amount for other current expenses which they by agreement undertake to furnish by the methods in vogue in parishes. But Pew-rentals in missions are wellnigh unknown, and Sales and special exertions to add to the income are in missions of more frequent occurrence. This last fact calls for a few words touching the Church's attitude towards what are called "Church Fairs."

An honest Sale, at their real value, of articles that are the handiwork of good people, the expression of their skill and the gift of love, and that are unduly urged upon no one, is wholly free from objection in principle, and is in every view to be commended. Without this zeal, akin to what was manifested at the making of the Tabernacle in Israel, many a mission would have fared hardly or come to naught. Of Suppers and merry-making Entertainments, innocent and altogether proper at a Parish Festival, the Church generally does not very heartily approve as a means of "raising money." Still less are these well received if repeated year after year, and taken up as a permanent part of parochial or missionary usage.

Church lotteries, rafflings, and this whole brood of unholy doings the Church abhors; and they are coming to be not so much as named among us. There are Dioceses in which a mission that should persist in resorting to these sinful, vulgar practices would speedily find its stipend from the Diocesan Board discontinued. For while the Church desires to build churches, she desires to build only Christian churches; and she knows that it is futile for men to fear the LORD and serve their own gods.

The pecuniary assistance given by a Diocese to its missions comes usually through a Diocesan Board of Missions, and it is distributed as to the amounts by the Board. This Board consists of the Bishop and a number of Presbyters, and an equal number of laymen, elected annually by the Convention. The treasury of the Diocesan Board of Missions is, in a few Dioceses, partially endowed, but it trusts oftener to contributions from all the congregations, made quarterly or at times fixed by Canon. These are sometimes unpledged offerings, presented to God in church at the stated days. Sometimes the contributions are individually pledged beforehand, and are gathered each quarter by persons appointed for the business.

Besides parishes and missions, each Diocese has certain more general works and institutions. The Fund for the Support of the Episcopate is designed, in some Dioceses, to furnish the entire salary of the Bishop; in others the Fund yields a part of the salary, and the rest is made up by assessments on the several parishes, laid yearly by the Convention. This Fund, which comes through personal gifts, through offerings in churches, and through bequests, is usually held and invested by the Trustees of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the particular Diocese, if they be a legal corporation.

Diocesan Church Hospitals, Homes for the Aged, and Homes for Orphans, maintained by contributions of individuals and of congregations throughout the Diocese, rest for much of their efficiency on permanent funds which piety bestows in CHRIST's name. These institutions are usually corporations, holding their own property and administering their own finances. So, also, are colleges and seminaries, and Diocesan schools for girls and for boys.

Of Institutions of Christian learning endowments are the principal support, and ought to be, and with precisely the same fitness in the incorporated school as in the college or university. For the Church school, if it demanded from each pupil the full cost of residence and of tuition, a thing which the college never thinks of demanding, could be the school of only the very rich, and the Church would not lay hold of the people. But the school cannot, like a Home for the Destitute, be always suing for alms and seeking offerings in churches. If churches, schools, and colleges are to be of the best, and within the people's reach, there has been found in this age but one provision possible. That provision is endowments, varied and abundant endowments. Experience has already made manifest the wisdom of those men who have laid foundations of endowments, and of those who have built thereupon.

Outside of the Diocese, General Missions among Indians and colored people, and in the new settlements of the West, and in foreign lands, are conducted, as to their finances, by a General Board of Managers elected by the General Convention. The office of the Treasurer of this General Board is in New York City, and the legal title of the Corporation is the "Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church."

All parishes in all Dioceses are expected to send regular contributions, received through stated offerings in church, or systematically collected upon pledged subscriptions, to the General Missionary Treasury. Small confidence is felt in endowments for this purpose, and hope is set chiefly on fresh and constant streams of supply. By the Managers a sum is yearly voted to each Missionary Diocese and Jurisdiction, and of the amount the Bishop of the jurisdiction is notified. The Bishop then designates to the Managers the mission stations to be helped, and gives the names of the missionaries and the portion of the entire allowance for his jurisdiction to be devoted to each missionary. The Board, no weighty reason appearing to the contrary, then assigns the several stipends for the year in accordance with the Bishop's nomination.

A few remarks may be added here.

The TITHES is not accepted for the foundation of our financial system. Many sober members of the Church believe the principle of one-Tenth of our income strictly belonging to God, and to be employed lawfully only for religious uses, to be permanently binding, and to be a part of our holy religion. This belief is sufficiently prevalent to increase very materially the aggregate of contributions. In the more common view the Tithe, literally applied, would lay unreasonable exactions upon laboring folk, and, if not carefully distinguished from voluntary offerings, would release the rich from obligations, upon their payment of a sum unfairly small. The teachings in the Church most frequently point to the Tithe as an intimation from our heavenly FATHER of what is, with prosperous children of His, accounted right, as the lowest, for them to set aside to the ministries of religion; and that, our spiritual blessings being so much richer than were those of the Jews, the argument is, a fortiori,—the Tenth at the least from all those whose daily business God has blessed.

They who have most carefully observed the financial side of things in the Church will say, that if the Church in the country despises missions to the heathen in foreign lands, the Diocese will speedily care not for works outside herself, and the parish will neglect the general interests of the Diocese, and the individual parishioner will concern himself little with the parish, and will lock up his heart and will lock up his treasures. But invariably those parishes and those Dioceses whose hearts are enlarged and opened to a practical sympathy with all earnest works everywhere, take best care of their own parish and of their own Diocese. They who most gladly contribute to missions and general charities of the Church are the very parishes and Dioceses that in the long course of years best help themselves. Love flows out and contributions flow in. A narrow spirit in things pertaining to CHRIST, the Gift and the Giver, is the poorest possible financial equipment. There is wealth enough, if hearts be opened, minds informed, and habits systematized.

Do Churchmen give to the General Treasuries, or to specific works and places? To both. Interest in particular places, works, and persons springs from our best nature, and is Divine. An intelligent guiding principle also which leads the Christian man steadily to sustain the general missions and works, though he knows personally little of each, to sustain them through the General Treasury for CHRIST's love, with no designating of particular objects, this, too, is most Christian, and is withal necessary if we are to have any systematic work. These two things, piety and pity, are not to be brought in contrast. If the Special has in administration at any time been set above the General want, or if the General have ever been hostile to Specials, the entire work has suffered. The Church's policy is to encourage gifts to all worthy objects, and in all right ways. In the end and upon the whole this policy has vindicated itself.

Help towards self-help the Church aims to give, that the mission may be stimulated, not fed in idleness.

Church institutions of charity and of reverent learning receive a large part of these endowments, by which they are enabled to bless mankind and to glorify God, through bequests. The clergy, while most grateful for wise and frequent legacies to the setting forward of GOD's kingdom among men, abstain from much meddling with individuals. They trust rather to sound principles taught in church and to clear information kept before the people touching worthy objects and pressing wants. The Church always discourages bequests to the best of objects if made without due regard to all rights of family and to the needs of near kindred.

In general, the Church, in her Financial System, recognizes that varied interests and various methods are legitimate. She would have contributions cheerful, intelligent, and therefore systematic, a grateful response to the Divine goodness to us, and a conscientious representation in amount of a man's personal ability; not a tax, but a privilege; not a piece of worldly business only, but a reverent transaction with the ALMIGHTY GIVER; not less a luxury than a necessity. Direct methods the instinct of the Church strongly prefers. She knows that financial evils will be cured when her sons and daughters, taught of the HOLY GHOST, shall have come to such ripeness of knowledge as to perceive that the "Kingdom of God" is really the "first" thing, and to such ripeness of love as shall make real to each the sacred word, "It is more blessed to give than to receive." Just three things are needed: Love, knowledge, system. Let these three things abound, and the spiritual motive-power will rapidly fill itself to the full, and the machinery will more smoothly move. General treasuries will be richly stored, and special needs quickly supplied. And the Church's God and God's Church will be held in honor.

RT. REV. W. WOODRUFF NILES, D.D., Bishop of New Hampshire.

First Fruits. The first fruits offered to God (Ex. xxii. 29; xliii. 19, etc.) and given to the Priests suggested to the Papacy the claim of the first year's income of every Benefice, Bishopric, and Primacy, from the Clerk, Bishop, or Primate-elect, before he could be confirmed in his Benefice or See. The claim for first fruits was made in John's reign, but it was reduced to a form, and a valuation of all livings and Bishoprics was made in 1292 A.D., which lasted till Henry VIII. ordered a new one to be made. Henry VIII. diverted these first fruits into the State treasury, but Queen Anne (1712 A.D.) restored them to the Church, but not to releasing the Sees. They were given by charter to form the fund for the augmentation of small livings.

Flagon. The vessel or cruet containing the wine to be used at the Consecration in the Holy Communion. After pouring out some into the cup, as it may be convenient to consecrate more than the cup can hold, the Celebrant is ordered at the proper moment to "lay his hand upon every vessel in which there is any wine to be consecrated." The Flagon, therefore, may be used for containing wine in the act of consecration, after the cup has been consecrated.

Fleentes. The first order of those who were under the Church's strict discipline. These fleentes were placed either in the Porch or in the Vestibule (Narthex). Here they besought the prayers of the Faithful as they entered the church. Tertullian (De Pudicit; c. 4) urges repentance of monstrous lusts not merely on the threshold but in the church itself.

Florida, Diocese of. The Diocese of Florida was organized in St. John's Church, Tallahassee, on the 8th day of February, 1838 A.D. The first Anglican missionaries within the limits of the State were sent out from England. "The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts," on the 5th of May, 1764 A.D., commissioned and sent out, licensed by the Bishop of London, as Missionary to St. Augustine, the Rev. John Forbes; and on the same date the Rev. Samuel Hart, as Missionary to Mobile, West Florida. The Rev. John Fraser was licensed March 23, 1769 A.D., the Rev. John Leadbetter, November 8, 1773 A.D., both for St. Augustine, and the Rev. John Kennedy, for St. Mark's, December 24, 1776 A.D. Following Mr. Hart, in West Florida, were the Rev. William Gordon, licensed August 8, 1767 A.D.; the Rev. Nathaniel Colton, March 2, 1768 A.D.; and the Rev. George Chapman, licensed for Pensacola, May 3, 1773 A.D. Of these, the Rev. Mr. Forbes is spoken of as residing at St. Augustine in 1771 A.D., filling the places of "Parson, Judge of Admiralty, and Counsellor," and Mr. Fraser as "Parson at Mosquito."

When the province was ceded to Spain by Great Britain, in 1783 A.D., there was an immediate cessation of all Protestant worship. The English church was torn down and its material used in the erection of a Roman Catholic church. A German church at a place called Tolmato shared the same fate. But there still remained individuals and families who adhered to the Liturgy of the English Church, and it is stated on good authority that in one instance the "Morning Prayer" of the Church was maintained in one family regularly for forty-five years.

In July, 1821 A.D., the province was ceded to the United States. In October of the same year the Rev. Andrew Fowler, of South Carolina, under appointment as a Missionary from that Diocese, entered on his duties at St. Augustine, and was succeeded in May, 1823 A.D., by the Rev. M. J. Mott.

"The Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society" of the Church in the United States soon after its organization took an earnest interest in this field, and in 1827 A.D. sent out the Rev. Rolf Williston to Tallahassee. He organized this year the Parish of Christ Church, Pensacola, and the year following St. John's, Tallahassee. In 1830 A.D., under the ministry of the Rev. Alphonse Henderson, Trinity Church, St. Augustine, built of stone, and the oldest church edifice now standing in the Diocese, was erected, and in 1833 A.D. was consecrated by the Rt. Rev. Nathaniel Bowen, D.D., Bishop of South Carolina, to which Diocese Florida gratefully acknowledges her obligation for nursing care in her early days. For some years the Bishop of South Carolina, and afterwards Bishop Stephen Elliott, of Georgia, held jurisdiction in Florida.

October 15, 1851 A.D., the Rev. Francis Huger Rutledge, D.D., was consecrated the first Bishop of the Diocese. At the time of his election he was Rector of Trinity Church, St. Augustine. He died November 6, 1866 A.D. The Rt. Rev. John Freeman Young, S.T.D., was consecrated as the second Bishop of the Diocese, in Trinity Church, New York, on the 25th day of July, 1867 A.D. At the time of his election he was an assistant minister of Trinity Church.

The statistics of the Diocese as reported in 1883 A.D. are as follows:

Clergy, 81; parishes and missions, 42; families, 1076; baptisms, 295; confirmed, 108; communicants, 1642; contributions, $36,212.03. All the churches and chapels in the Diocese are free, and depend on the Offertory for revenue. Its educational institutions are The Bradford Institute, for girls, at Jacksonville; Christ Church School, Pensacola; St. James Academy, Lake City; and St. Mark's School, Palatka.

REV. A. B. WELLER, D.D.

Flowers. The Primitive Christians did not make use of flowers, since the Heathen used them in their sacrifices and at their feasts, when heathen rites often polluted the garlands (Clem. Alex., Pæd. ii. c. 8). But when heathenism was on the wane the natural love for flowers and their fitness for adorning the church was admitted and their use gradually permitted (St. Jerome to Nepotian). "These things were trifling in themselves; but a pious mind devoted to CHRIST is intent upon small things, and neglects nothing that pertains even to the meanest office of the Church." The custom, though objected to by some, is one against which no valid objection can be made, and which has become wellnigh universal. The rule should be to employ none but natural flowers in the ornamentation.

Fond du Lac, The Diocese of. At the Annual Convention of the Diocese of Wisconsin, in 1866 A.D., immediately after the election of the Rev. William Edmond Armitage as Assistant Bishop, on motion of Winfield Smith, Esq., the following resolution was adopted:

"Resolved, That this Convention is unanimously in favor of the division of this Diocese, and that, therefore, the Bishop of the Diocese be respectfully requested to give his consent to the division of the same, and to place his consent upon the records of this Convention."

The Bishop promptly gave his assent, as follows:

"In accordance with the unanimous request of the Convention of this Diocese, and with my own convictions, repeatedly expressed, I, Jackson Kemper, D.D., by the grace of God Bishop of the Diocese of Wisconsin, do hereby declare and place on record my assent and consent to the division of this Diocese, and the erection of a new Episcopal See therein, now, or as soon as practicable hereafter.

(Signed) "JACKSON KEMPER.

"June 14, 1866, A.D."

No further steps seem to have been taken until 1872 A.D., when Bishop Armitage, in his address to the Annual Convention, used the following words:

"I earnestly invoke the aid of the whole Diocese in bringing about this necessary division. We shall never do thorough work in Wisconsin until we have at least four Dioceses within our bounds, and I see not why we may not set off one Convocation after another at successive General Conventions, beginning with the North-eastern in 1874."

Bishop Armitage did not live to see his desire gratified. The General Convention of 1874 A.D., however, consented to, and ratified the formation of, a new Diocese in Wisconsin, to consist of nineteen counties, to wit: Marathon, Oconto, Shawano, Door, Kewaunee, Brown, Outagamie, Waupaca, Portage, Wood, Adams, Waushara, Winnebago, Calumet, Manitowoc, Sheboygan, Fond du Lac, Green Lake, and Marquette, and also such portion of Dodge County as may be necessary to include in the limits of the new Diocese the village of Wampum, such division to take effect on the first day of December, 1874 A.D. The provision made for the support of a Bishop was the sum of fifteen thousand dollars (of which ten thousand dollars were in promissory notes and five thousand dollars in cash securities), the interest of which, and an annual assessment of one thousand dollars and an Episcopal residence, were considered a sufficient compliance with the requirement of Article 5 of the Constitution.

The Primary Council of the new Diocese was convened at St. Paul's Church, Fond du Lac, January 7, 1875 A.D. The Right Reverend E. R. Weller, S.T.D., Bishop of the Diocese of Wisconsin, presided. The Rev. Martin V. Averill was elected Secretary, and Mr. James B. Perry was elected Treasurer. Sixteen clergymen and the representatives of fourteen parishes were present. Fond du Lac was chosen as the name of the Diocese. A Constitution of seventeen articles was adopted. The Bishop of the Diocese of Wisconsin announced that he had chosen the Diocese of Wisconsin as his See. He was requested by the Council to take Episcopal charge of the new Diocese until the election and consecration of its Bishop. The Council then proceeded to the election of a Bishop. On the thirteenth ballot the Rev. Leighton Coleman, of Toledo, Ohio, was elected Bishop. The whole number of clergymen belonging to the Diocese at the time of its organization was nineteen; of communicants, there were reported twelve hundred and eighty-four. The first Annual Council of the Diocese was held June 8, 1875 A.D., at St. Paul's Church, Fond du Lac. Bishop Weller presided. Seventeen clergymen and the representatives of twelve parishes were present. A body of Canons was adopted. The Rev. Leighton Coleman having declined to serve as Bishop, the Council proceeded to a new election. On the third ballot the Rev. Jacob S. Shipman, of Lexington, Kentucky, was chosen. The Rev. Mr. Shipman having declined the Episcopate, a Special Council was assembled at Christ's Church, Green Bay, Wednesday, September 15, 1875 A.D. The Rev. William Dafter presided. On the third ballot for Bishop the choice fell on the Rev. John Henry Hobart Brown, S.T.D., rector of St. John's Church, Cohoes, Diocese of Albany. Dr. Brown accepted the election, and was duly consecrated at St. John's Church, Cohoes, Wednesday, December 15, 1875 A.D., by the Right Reverend Horatio Potter, D.D., LL.D., Bishop of New York, the Right Reverend William Crosswell Doane, S.T.D., Bishop of Albany, the Right Reverend Benjamin H. Paddock, D.D., Bishop of Massachusetts, assisted by the Bishops of Vermont, New Hampshire, Wisconsin, and New Jersey.

In 1880 A.D. the limits of the Diocese of Fond du Lac were enlarged so as to include portions of the counties of Bayfield, Ashland, and Chippewa, and the whole of Taylor and Clark. The present area of the Diocese is about that of one-half of the State, 27,000 square miles. Its population in 1880 A.D. was 442,221. The summary of Diocesan statistics in 1884 is, clergymen, 28; families, 1382; individuals, 6306; communicants, 2390; parishes, 20; organized missions, 30. The Diocese has many advantages of soil and climate, and at some future time will be populous. Its mineral deposits are undoubtedly large, but as yet little developed. The northern portion of the Diocese is heavily wooded. The climate is salubrious, but somewhat cold in winter. The soil generally is good, and in the southern part of the Diocese very productive. The population is formed of an unusual variety of nationalities.

The American settlers are mostly from the New England and Middle States. Germans are next in number. Then follow Norwegians, Swedes, Danes, Poles, Belgians, Bohemians, Hollanders, Welsh, English, French, Canadians, Scotch, Irish, Finns, and Icelanders. There are several reservations of Indians, chiefly of Chippewas, Menominees, and Oneidas. The Winnebagoes have a little land of their own, but some of these and of the Pottawatomes wander about the country in bands and companies. A few of the Stockbridges and Brothertown Indians survive. A portion of the Oneida tribe is settled in Brown County. At Hobart Church, Oneida, about nine hundred of them are baptized, and are under the pastoral charge of the Rev. E. A. Goodnough. About three hundred are communicants. In view of the missionary character of the work the erection of this Diocese was a bold movement, reflecting much credit on the faith and courage of the clergy and people that sustained it. The financial disasters of the country and the restlessness of the early settlers have retarded the progress of the Diocese. Yet there is steady and healthful growth at present and a bright promise for the future.

RT. REV. J. H. H. BROWN, D.D., Bishop of Fond du Lac.

Font. The vessel containing the water wherewith the Sacrament of Baptism is administered. It was, as we have seen (vide BAPTISTERY), placed in earlier churches in a separate building, but it was later transferred into the church. The Western Church used usually a stone Font, but it might be of any convenient material, and it was to be used for the baptism alone. The Font in the Eastern Church is movable, of wood or metal, and is seldom or never possessed of any beauty. The shape of it in the West was generally octagonal, though a fanciful mysticism occasionally gave it the form of a sepulchre or of a cross. The Font in the Baptistery was surrounded with a low wall, entered by steps, usually seven, three without, three within, excluding the top step. It was placed in the English Church near the west door or the southwestern porch,—a reminiscence of the Eastern practice of the Baptistery. In the act of Baptism the water is not to be placed in the Font before the Priest comes with the child or person to be baptized to the Font. (Vide rubric to Office of Public Baptism.) The invocation over the water is one of the most ancient rites in this most ancient office. St. Basil (De Sp. Sanc., c. 27) says that it is one of the Liturgical traditions handed down to us before the Liturgies were committed to writing. But the first direct mention of the benediction of the water is in Tertullian (De Bap., c. 4). Compare the earliest form (of 800 A.D.) with our own prayer, "Look down from heaven and sanctify this water, and grant grace and power that he who is baptized according to the command of Thy CHRIST may with Him be crucified and die and be buried and rise again to the adoption which is in Him, by dying unto sin but living unto righteousness." (Ap. Const., vii. 43.)

The early English use (and so in the first Prayer-Book) was to put water into the Font once a month, and blessing that, to have it ready for the baptisms; but this was changed and the prayer placed where it now stands in the second Prayer-Book of Edward

VI., 1552 A.D. The benediction of the water is not held to be essential, but it is a very old and solemn setting apart of the outward and visible sign of that Sacrament which regenerates us.

Formatæ Literæ. There were several kinds of Formatæ Literæ, or Commendatory Letters. The word formatæ has an obscure origin, but probably means sealed letters. Such we know to have been used in the Apostolic times (Acts xvii. 27; 2 Cor. iii. 1). They were both a necessity to the Christian traveler, that he might receive hospitality and relief from the brethren whom he might meet, and a protection and assurance to those who should give him the entertainment due to a brother. It was, too, a bond between the different Churches. It was an unanswerable argument against the Donatists, that their letters were not received outside their own Churches, and therefore that they were a sect. Later these letters, without which a person could not be received, formed a check upon the desire to rove from Diocese to Diocese, and were something like Letters Commendatory. It was under penalty of excommunication that any one received a stranger coming without such a letter, and even then he was subjected to scrutiny. For the abuse had grown up in the letters of confessors and in the letters of peace of not inserting the name of the bearer, so that the letter could be used by any one who held it at the time. This was repressed by refusing such letters any credit, and no cleric was allowed to officiate in a strange city without letters from his Bishop. Later on these letters took special forms. A special mode of signing such letters as were sent by Bishops was agreed upon,—letters asking material aid, letters recommending to communion, and letters dimissory, transferring the bearer to the jurisdiction of another Bishop.

We have retained two forms of these letters. The Canon (Tit. ii., c. 12, § 2) requires that every layman removing from one parish to another should carry with him a letter certifying that he is a Communicant in good standing, and the rector of the parish to which he removes "shall not be required to receive him as a Communicant until such letter be produced." The second form of letter is the Letter Dimissory of the clergyman removing from one Diocese to another. In order to gain canonical residence within the second Diocese he must present to the Ecclesiastical Authority a testimonial from the Ecclesiastical Authority of the Diocese he has left, which shall set forth his true standing and character. The testimonial may be in the following words: "I hereby certify that A. B., who has signified to me his desire to be transferred to the Ecclesiastical Authority of —, is a Presbyter (or Deacon) of — in regular standing, and has not, so far as I know or believe, been justly liable to evil report for error in religion or viciousness of life for three years last past." The person presenting is not transferred till it has been accepted by the Ecclesiastical Authority of the Diocese to which he removes. He is allowed six months in which to present this letter. If it is not presented in three months, it may be considered void by the Authority that gave it; if not in six months, it shall be considered void. He must be received, unless there are such rumors against him as would justify an investigation in the Diocese he has left, in which case the Ecclesiastical Authority is not permitted to receive him.

Forms. Forms are necessary, in all important matters at least. Forms are constantly used in all legal instruments, and in very many other matters of business, as much for guidance as for the correct execution of the matter in hand. These forms, so necessary elsewhere, are most necessary in Public Worship, since as the Congregation worship as well as the clergyman, there must be a form to guide them in their common acts, and as these acts of Worship are of the most important man can engage in, forms also furnish the correct conduct and wording of these acts. Indeed, there is no worship at all without some forms, whether bare and insufficient, or full and sufficing. This must be admitted. Then that there must be matter in these forms is shown by our LORD giving us a Prayer with the injunction, "After this manner, therefore, pray ye." The fullness and propriety of the forms used is another part of the subject of forms. Not only outlines of action or successions of procedure in the worship, but the words of the prayers were given in certain cases by GOD Himself (Deut. xxvi. 5-10; xxi. 7, 8; Ps. xc.; Joel ii. 17; Hosea xiv. 2, 3). With such a warranty for our action, the example of our LORD and the use of the Apostles (Acts iv. 24-30, "with one accord") they lifted up their voice to GOD, which could not be unless it were a well-known prayer), the Church everywhere has ever used forms of prayer. Till the Reformation there was no body of Christians that was without a Liturgy. Such a thing was not dreamt of as possible; indeed, one of the perplexities of those who traveled out of their own country was in the variety of the Liturgical forms they met with, and the customs which were practiced abroad. It was in part the result of the ancient authority each Bishop held to alter the Liturgical forms in his own Diocese, which authority, however, was afterwards exercised by the Primate of the Archprovince that greater unity of Liturgical forms might be obtained. In this matter of forms there should be a proper flexible mean kept between laxness and straitness.

Then the Church in each country has the right to arrange its forms of worship on the general outline of the ancient Liturgical forms, but adapting them to the needs of the people with whom she has to deal. It is wisdom in adaptation, and judgment in using our privileges, and a true valuation of the rich heritage of the forms and sanctified prayers of the Ancient Churches, that will solve the problems of fitting and using our Book of Common Prayer for the need of the Church in this country. Forms of Prayer have been added from time to time, and special prayers are issued by our Bishops whenever there is need, as in the case of war, or of an epidemic, or of a national fast-day.

Formularies. These may be of Worship, as the Book of Common Prayer, or of Faith, as the Creeds, and later, the documents like the Confession of Augsburg, containing formal statements on controverted points of the Faith. A Formulary of worship, as has been shown, has always been found in the possession of every Church, and incorporated in its structure there was always the recitation of the Creed (generally the Nicene). The Formularies of the Creed have been touched upon in the article upon the Creed, but it may be well to add a word upon the formation of the Creed. The Apostles' Creed most probably was a commonly received form, built upon the Baptismal Formula, "In the name of the FATHER, of the SON, and of the HOLY GHOST." Of the FATHER, we believe that He is GOD, Almighty, maker of heaven and earth, a clause which sums up the main articles upon the First Person of the Trinity. Of the SON, we believe that He is the only SON of GOD, and our LORD, and then we recite the outline of His human life, and confess His future coming. Of the HOLY GHOST, we believe that His work abiding in us is the Holy Catholic Church, the Communion of Saints, the forgiveness of sins, the resurrection of the body, and the life everlasting, the sum of what Holy Scripture teaches of His work, and yet bearing internal evidence that it was also a doctrine in the Church concurrent with the Scriptures. This Creed was taught orally to the catechumens at first in substance, not in words, and finally, just before their baptism was intrusted to them in its compact, concise wording. That this formulary should have varied slightly in the different parts of the Church, extending from India to the Atlantic, is not to be wondered at; the wonder is that there were not greater variations even within the just limits of the one Faith; but as a matter of fact, the variations were not material in any respect except that the Article "He descended into hell" was a later addition (about 400 A.D.). The Nicene Creed was set forth by the Fathers at the Council of Nicæa in 325 A.D. It was the result of the comparison of the forms of the Creed held throughout the Church, and had clauses added to meet the Arian heresy. It was structurally the same as the Apostles' Creed, and, as has been well said, it is the Creed upon which all of Christendom will unite. The formula called the Athanasian Creed is properly a doctrinal hymn, and is called in the English Prayer-Book the Psalm Quicunque vult, from the first words, "Whosoever will be saved." It is not formed upon the same lines precisely as the two Creeds proper, but is rather a full theological statement by assertion and negation of the Doctrine of the TRINITY. It is warmly objected to for the so-called anathemas it contains, but it may be replied with complete force that these damnable clauses are from the Scriptures, and that, besides, not to believe on the Persons of the Holy Trinity is to believe on some other than God. "To believe of CHRIST wrongly is to substitute a figment more or less nearly approaching Him, and therefore to believe wrongly is to fail of salvation. Therefore it is no want of Christian Charity to say, whosoever will be saved before all things it is necessary that he hold the Catholic Faith, which Faith, except every one do keep whole and undefiled, without doubt he shall perish everlastingly. . . . This is the Catholic Faith, which except a man believe faithfully he cannot be saved." These are no stronger than what our LORD said, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned" (St. Mark xvi. 16).

Fraction, of the bread in celebrating the Holy Communion. The rubric orders that the Priest shall take Paten into his hands, and at the words "He brake it, and gave it to His disciples, saying, Take, eat," and as he continues, "this is My Body which is given for you," he is to lay his hands upon all the bread. It is this solemn imitation of our LORD's act that constitutes the consecration of the bread to be for us (to use Justin Martyr's words) no longer common bread but heavenly bread. This "breaking of bread" is the title given to the Eucharist in several places in the New Testament (Acts ii. 42; xx. 7; 1 Cor. x. 16). A second fraction is made usually, when the ordinary wheaten bread is used, when the faithful are communicated.

Frankfort. A Council was held at Frankfort, 794 A.D., under the presidency of the Emperor Charlemagne, being in fact both a Diet of the Empire and an Ecclesiastical Synod. The most important points touched upon by the assembly as a Church Council were the doctrine of Adoptionism and the Worship of Images. The first of these is treated in the first Canon; and the Bishops Felix, of Urgel, in Catalonia, and Elipand, of Toledo, defenders of the heresy, were condemned.

The second Canon discusses the Worship of Images. The Church in the East had for many years been disturbed by the violence of two parties, one in favor of images, the other, the Iconoclasts, bitterly opposed to their use in any way. The Iconoclasts had prevailed for some time, and even in 754 A.D. had procured the condemnation of images by a Synod of Bishops. But when Leo IV. died, after a brief reign, his widow Irene, who ruled as guardian for her son Constantine VI., reversed the policy of the government and the decision of the Synod. Accordingly, a Council was assembled at Nicaea (reckoned the Seventh General Council), in which it was determined that images, or at least paintings or mosaics, "are to be set up for kissing and honorable reverence, but not for that real service which belongs to the Divine Nature alone." The acts of this Council were sanctioned by Pope Adrian, who sent a copy of them to Charlemagne; Charlemagne, however, so far from receiving them without hesitation, employed Alcuin to controvert them; and further gathered as many as three hundred Bishops, with two Legates from Rome, at Frankfort, where the Eastern Synod was condemned, and "both adoration and service of all kinds to images" was refused. But Adrian, notwithstanding this serious difference of opinion, still remained on friendly terms with Charlemagne.

Free-Will. There are ever apparently opposing principles in this visible nature, in our human nature, in the Divine nature. In nature we accept and act upon them because we cannot avoid them, but can combine and use them, or else restrain and avert their consequences. In the Divine nature we see mercy and justice apparently, it may be rashly alleged, in opposition, but reverence and the acknowledgment of an eternal wisdom keep us from misconstruing either, or pushing our conceptions of the one to the denial of the other. But in dealing with our own capacities and God-given qualities we argue very frequently without due consideration. What are the limits of necessity, and within what limits does freedom of will act? If these can be practically determined we can let subtle disquisitions pass. Necessity is, first, in the finite bounds of our mortal nature as living only in time, bound to earth, able to employ only natural material instruments, though enjoying the widest range of thought; and again, in the sphere of thought, the limitation of being able to properly conceive of and systematize those facts, spiritual, logical, and material, which pertain to our human nature, for we cannot conceive of any consistent theory upon the nature of angels, and we know only so much of God's nature as is revealed to us by Him through His Son. The sin-taint is another mysterious limitation we inherit, and we have a further limit in having to use agents, and to combine special means in accordance with known laws in the short space of each one's mortal life. The resulting forces and influences are complex and varying, being hindered, set free, or enforced by varying combinations not in human power to control, but only to guide and use. But within these limitations we have a freedom of will which makes us each a responsible agent. To be in His image we must have something sin-stained, yet something of His will in whose image we are.

It is this responsibility of being permitted to act for ourselves, to choose what we shall do, how we shall use the life, the capacities, the time, the education, the position, the religion He covers us with, the enjoyments as well as the ills, the stern duties as well as the softer pleasures; it is how we shall choose to use these and their like that makes us accountable beings to God, to our fellow-men, to our own conscience here in life, and at the bar of judgment hereafter, for we are all subject to God's Law, order, and harmony; and liberty and free-will are not anarchy and disobedience, though sin has so injured them that many men so miscall and therefore misuse them. Bishop Butler acutely remarks that though men may theoretically assert a preordained necessity, yet practically they must act as though such necessity did not exist. And it must be so, or all Law would cease, for no one could be justly held accountable if he were not free. Choice in human agents implies a moral obligation. So no action, in itself indifferent, but may be made the means of a good or bad result. Through our sin-taint all our acts are stained with this evil, despite a longing to do better. In this we feel our short-coming and our feebleness. The freedom of the will may, does in many, become the means of the worst slavery, a lawless willfulness. To free us from this, first by example, and then by His direct help, and by taking us into Himself, our LORD came upon earth, made His atonement, effected His resurrection, founded His Church, gave His sacraments. His free human will was subordinated to His Divine will, and made perfectly consonant with it. At all times and in all points CHRIST, the LORD of nature, submitted to the limitations of our nature and the action of those laws which constrain us, and through this obedience made Himself acquainted with our griefs and bore our infirmities. And at every point He taught that he was submitting His will to His FATHER's will. "In the volume of the book it is written of me I delight to do Thy will, O my God; yea, Thy Law is within my heart" (Ps. xl. 7, 8). It was of His own free-will He suffered, was crucified, dead, and buried. Of His own free-will He took up our human life, His human life, again and made it immortal. He calls for a willing, a free obedience, full of love and loyalty to Him, for He can make us free indeed, as redeeming us from the bondage to sin. A consecrated freedom of will, then, in CHRIST is the true liberty wherewith CHRIST has made us free. And this freedom of the will is joyous and full of life, taking the ills that befall as disciplinary and rising above them, using the things of this world and not abusing them, living in the gifts of CHRIST's Church, the means of grace, the sacraments, and the inner meditation and conscious, conscientious effort to subdue the carnal will and to bring it into a loving subjection to the will of CHRIST. GOD the FATHER created us in His own image by His will, and we must by this have been at first created as free within our finite sphere as He in His boundless power. GOD the SON has redeemed us from the slavery of sin, and has made us free in Himself, with restored rights and privileges. GOD the HOLY GHOST is that Spirit of the LORD, that Spirit of Liberty, overshadowing, pleading with, and leading us, given to us at our Confirmation to abide with us, sanctifying us with the perfect law of liberty. So St. Paul, in the very Epistle quoted often to destroy the Christian liberty, urges as his conclusion from his argument, "I beseech you, therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service" (Rom. xii. 1, 2). Our truest exercise of free-will is in using, in this life, the fullness of our Christian rights for our eternal life hereafter. (Brown on XXXIX. Articles, Art. X.)

Friday. Good-Friday, the day upon which the Atonement for the sins of the whole world was made, has left its impress upon each Friday of the year as the Resurrection has carried the Law of worship on the Sabbath to the first day of the week, and has made every Sunday a commemoration of its glorious victory. Friday has from time immemorial been a weekly fast-day for this reason. But Good-Friday has been the central fast-day of the Christian year. It was strictly observed. Lent had its beginning from the fast of forty hours, which began on Good-Friday and lasted till midnight of Easter-even. The kiss of peace was not given; the Holy Communion was not celebrated, the penitents were reconciled. At one time there was no sermon on that day, but a Council of Toledo (633 A. D.) ordered that there should be a sermon on the Passion on that day. The later ceremonials, added during the mediæval times, were sometimes very significant and solemn. Our own Office for Good-Friday, throwing aside the "Office of the Presanctified" elements of the Holy Communion, has, by assigning an Epistle and Gospel for the day, given us the right to have a celebration on that day.

Funerals. (Vide BURIAL.) In all the details connected with a funeral, simplicity and reverent decency should be considered, and all display of any kind suppressed. The Jewish law of utter simplicity is an excellent one to follow. Still more so should be the feeling impressed upon all who assist in showing the last respect due to the mortal remains of the hope of a future resurrection, the certainty of the promise. The early Christians bore their dead to the grave with glad hymns and with everything that could mark their faith in CHRIST. This principle should rule in all the arrangements which the rank and position of the departed demand should be made, and it must be the rule for all the preparations at the church.

Galatians. Of all St. Paul's Epistles, except those to the Corinthians, this Epistle is the most vivid, direct, and personal. From it we learn much of the earlier movements of St. Paul after his conversion and before he appears as a participant in the active missionary work of the Church. But beside this it has a great doctrinal value, and is in its contents connected with the Epistle to the Romans, though this last is addressed to readers of a widely different character. The Galatians, a mixed population of the old Phrygian people, dominated by a Celtic conquering tribe, and this further mingled with the settlers from Rome, and Greece, and Judea, who settled there for purposes of trade or other business, were eager, rash, fickle, and easily persuaded. This will explain the astonished exclamations of the Apostle: "O foolish Galatians, who hath bewitched you?" (ch. iii.). "I marvel that ye are so soon removed from Him that called you into the grace of CHRIST unto another Gospel" (i. 6). Their fickleness brought the gain to the Church of this Epistle, which stands forth of untold value in New Testament history, and in the development of the revelation and doctrine of the great Apostle. The chapters we must remember are late and arbitrary divisions, more for convenience than anything else, so that the argument really passes on beyond our present grouping, and arranges itself somewhat differently from what we would suppose it, were we to cling to the chapters only. The Epistle naturally subdivides itself into four great groups.

I. The salutation. The Apostle declares his independent appointment by our LORD to establish his authority and the authenticity of the Gospel he preached. After expressing his surprise that they should change from what he taught, he goes into personal details, extending to the end of the second chapter, in which he proves his independent call, the fullness of the report of the Faith from CHRIST Himself, and the acknowledgment of it by the other Apostles, the chiefest of whom he withstood and rebuked openly upon the very false doctrinal grounds which had now misled the Galatians.

II. But these Galatians were deceived by some who claimed to preach the Gospel (but it was only a perversion), and who persuaded them that they must be circumcised and keep Moses' Law. This was contrary to his preaching. They were not Jews, they were not bound by the Law. They were heirs of Abraham, but not under the covenant of circumcision, but were justified through the like faith he had before he received this covenant, by the promise of the Gospel; they inherited as heirs through the faith of Abraham, yet uncircumcised, under the promise of the CHRIST to come. Their heirship is through the baptism into atonement of CHRIST, and they have by it the freedom of the Gospel (ch. ii. and iii.).

III. But this heirship leads him to speak of the difference of the two covenants, and the bondage of the one contrasted with the life of the second under which they inherit. They inherit by the righteousness, that is, by the Faith of CHRIST. They are not bound by Judaic days, and times, and seasons. This freedom of CHRIST gives them no right to do evil, to live after the flesh in its lusts, but calls them to the love, joy, and glorious sanctifying works of the Spirit. If we live in the Spirit—by it we cry Abba, Father—let us walk in the Spirit (ch. iv. and v.).

IV. The last part is taken up with advice so thoroughly earnest and full of the Apostle's energy, that the Epistle appears to end abruptly. He reverts to his warning against false teachers, and claims for himself the highest authority: "From henceforth let no man trouble me, for I bear in my body the marks of the LORD JESUS."

Its date may be placed as between 57 and 58 A.D. It is doctrinally valuable for the exposition it gives of the Justification by Faith (ch. ii. 16, and iii.). Historically it is valuable because of the incidental proof it gives of the equality of the Apostles and the disproof it furnishes of the Peterian claims of the Roman See (ch. ii. 11-21). It is one of the most ardent personal and expository of the Pauline Epistles, exhibiting the large heart of the great Apostle.

Gehenna. Literally, the valley of Hinnom, south of Jerusalem. The valley where all filth and carrion of every kind was cast; polluted at first by fires to Moloch, and then by the carcasses cast there; and in it were continual fires kept up. It became the type of the place of everlasting punishment among the Jews before our LORD's coming, and so was fitly used by Him and by St. James, iii. 6, as the name of that dread place. The term Hell, equivalent to Gehenna, is used in Matt. v. 29, 30; x. 28; xxiii. 15, 33; Mark ix. 43, 46; Luke xii. 6; and Hell-fire or fire of Gehenna in Matt. v. 22; xviii. 9; Mark ix. 47; and Jas. iii. 6. It is a narrow and trifling mode of escaping the full sense of Our LORD's words now to give the term Gehenna the local meaning it may have had before the Jews themselves had used it as a figure of the dread place of unending woe, for no Jew in Jerusalem could then have so understood it, when our LORD called the future abode of the wicked Gehenna.

General Convention. The name of the representative body having supreme legislative jurisdiction in the system of federated Dioceses, known as the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America, and in the dependencies thereof.

In giving an account of the General Convention it is proposed to speak,—

I. Of its origin and nature.

II. Of its form and method of operation as prescribed by the written Constitution adopted by the several Dioceses.

III. Of the nature and limitations of its constitutional powers.

IV. Of changes in its form, jurisdiction, and constituency resulting from its own action.

I. Origin and Nature.—At the close of the Revolutionary war in this country the Church existed in each State as an independent body. This body was actually connected with the original Church of CHRIST by virtue of the participation of its members in the faith and sacraments of His appointment and their relation to the Ministry of His commission, but it was in each case imperfect. It lacked the crown and completion essential to the perfection of every particular Church, and to be supplied by Episcopal authority. Prior to the Revolution the Church, in each colony, had been under the jurisdiction of the English Episcopate. During the Revolution that jurisdiction was incapable of being exercised, and was in abeyance. After the Revolution it was still incapable of being exercised, and all claim to it was abandoned. Practically the Church in each State was in the position of a Diocese temporarily deprived of its Diocesan. The Church in any State was free to seek its own completion in the Episcopate, and to continue its existence with or without combination with the Church in other States. Supposing that the Church in each State had obtained a Bishop of its own, there would have been among them all unity and cohesion resulting from their common dependence upon Episcopal government. Had they chosen to pursue this course their right to do so would have been unquestionable. And their right to proceed to the formation of a common organization and to the adoption of certain principles to which they mutually bound themselves—provided that they did not thereby cut themselves off from that dependence upon Episcopal jurisdiction which was essential to the continuance of their legitimate connection with the Church of CHRIST—must be allowed to be equally unquestionable.

In point of fact the right to move in both these directions not only existed, but was recognized and exercised. The course pursued by the Church in the several States, although not the same in each, was in all such as to establish the conclusion that each one was, and regarded itself as, an independent body so far as the others were concerned. In Connecticut the Church sought first to complete itself by procuring a Bishop. In some of the other States the Church sought first to procure a common organization and union, and afterwards to procure Bishops for the several members of that union. But that union was not effected by those who sought it without the consent of the representatives of the Church in each State represented; nor was the consent of those representatives given without the express permission of their constituency; nor, again, was either the Constitution which was adopted by that consent, or the authority of the General Convention which was established by that Constitution, regarded as binding upon the Church in such States as were not represented, or had not consented although they were represented.

The two great movements for the organization of the Church in this country, which resulted in the establishment of the body which we are now considering, may be called the Episcopal and the Conventional. The success of both stamped upon our Ecclesiastical system the complex character which is original with and peculiar to itself. The combination of Episcopal government, recognized as deriving its authority from the Divine source of CHRIST's commission to His Apostles and their successors, with the government of delegates, deriving their authority from the commission of the people, or of the body of the Church, composed of the laity and of the subordinate orders of the clergy, was the result of these two movements which in the course of Divine Providence began to take form about the same time. To the Church in Connecticut must be attributed the honor of the Episcopal—to the Church in Pennsylvania that of the Conventional—movement. The movement in Connecticut antedates that in Pennsylvania by a month or more, if we look to the formal beginnings; but the Connecticut movement leads to the possession of a complete Church organization in that State some four years before the Pennsylvania movement attains the accomplishment of its purpose by the complete organization of a Convention duly authorized to act for the Churches which in that and other States had joined in it.

The election of a Bishop took place in Connecticut on the 25th of March, 1783 A.D.; the consecration of that Bishop on the 14th of November, 1784 A.D., and his reception by the Diocese, on his return from the place where he had been consecrated, on the 3d of August, 1785 A.D. It is important to bear in mind these dates in comparison with those which now follow.

The first step towards the formation of an Ecclesiastical Union in the different States was taken at a meeting in May, 1784 A.D., at Philadelphia, of several members of the Church in that city, which appointed "a Standing Committee of the Episcopal Church in this State," and authorized that Committee to "correspond and confer with representatives from the Episcopal Church in the other States, or any of them, and assist in framing an Ecclesiastical government." (Bishop White's Memoirs, p. 72.)

At this meeting, which, of course, was purely voluntary, certain propositions were agreed upon which were to be regarded in the proposed correspondence and conference as fundamental principles. In this statement of fundamental principles appears the germ afterwards developed into the General Convention,—a representative body of clergy and laity which should have the sole power to make Canons and laws. The Bishops were anticipated as a future accession to the orders of the ministry then in the country, but they were, like the rest of the clergy, to be under law, and law was to be enacted only by the representative body of clergy and laity jointly. The whole scheme is unformed, but the idea of a representative body of Clergy and laity with supreme powers of legislation is plainly apparent.

In the same month of May, 1784 A.D., a meeting of clergymen in New Brunswick, N. J., discussed the project of Ecclesiastical union, but adjourned after receiving information from one of their number of the action already taken in the Church in Connecticut. Another meeting of clergy from several States assembled at the call of the Standing Committee above mentioned, in New York, in October, 1784 A.D. This meeting was, like the others, purely voluntary, there having been, as Bishop White observes, "no authorities from the Churches in the several States even in the appointments of the members, which were made from the congregations to which they respectively belonged, except of Mr. Parker, from Massachusetts, of Mr. Marshall, from Connecticut, and of those who attended from Pennsylvania. Even from these States there was no further authority than to deliberate and propose; accordingly the acts of the body were in the form of recommendation and proposal." (Bishop White's Memoirs, pp. 80, 81.)

At this meeting it was proposed that there should be a General Convention of the Episcopal Church in the United States of America, to which the Episcopal Church in each State was to send deputies, although associated congregations in two or more States might send deputies jointly, and that this General Convention should be composed of clergy and laity, deliberating in one body, but voting separately, the concurrence of both being necessary to give validity to every measure. The first meeting of this Convention, it was further proposed, should be at Philadelphia, the Tuesday before the next feast of St. Michael, "to which it is hoped and earnestly desired that the Episcopal Churches in the United States will send their clerical and lay deputies, duly instructed and authorized to proceed in the necessary business herein proposed for their deliberation."

On the 27th of September, 1785 A.D., according to this recommendation, assembled in Philadelphia a Convention of clerical and lay deputies from seven of the thirteen States, viz., from New York to Virginia, inclusive, with the addition of South Carolina. (Bishop White's Memoirs, p. 22.) At this Convention there was adopted a General Ecclesiastical Constitution, which may be considered as the first draft of that which was finally established in 1789 A.D. At the next Convention of delegates from the same seven States, held at Philadelphia, in June, 1786 A.D., this draft was revised, and the following resolution was adopted: "Resolved, That it be recommended to the Conventions of this Church in the several States represented in this Convention that they authorize and empower their deputies to the next General Convention, after we shall have obtained a Bishop or Bishops in our Church, to confirm and ratify a general Constitution respecting both the doctrine and discipline of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America." This Convention adjourned, subject to the call of its Committee of Correspondence (awaiting a communication from the English Bishops), pursuant to which call it met again at Wilmington, Delaware, October 20, 1786 A.D. This Convention at Wilmington, on a question put, made the following significant decision, viz.: that it had "no authority to admit as members persons deriving their appointment not from a State Convention, but from a particular parish or parishes only." (Bioren's General Convention Journal, p. 39.)

In view of the foregoing, it appears that the General Convention, as projected, was to be a representative body of clergy and laity, including Bishops among the former, constituted of delegates not from parishes as congregations, but from Conventions of Churches in the several States, and having legislative jurisdiction over the members of the Churches which should duly authorize deputies to ratify the general Constitution. It further appears that up to and including the year 1786 A.D. there was in existence no General Convention, properly so called, understanding by that term a body representing and authorized to give law to the Church in all the States. The want of an entire representation, the absence of any claim on the part of such Churches as were represented over those which were not represented, the limited power of the delegates, which prevented their action from being of any authority over the Churches from which they came,—these facts, taken in connection with the fact that the only representation required or recognized was the representation not of congregations but of State Conventions, establish with certainty the position that the Churches in the States were the independent factors of the union which was ultimately established, and as representative of which the General Convention came into existence. And the evidence shows that prior to 1789 A.D. there was no common authority recognized by these Churches. Agreeable to this is the remark of Bishop White, "that the few general principles recommended by the meeting of 1784 A.D., and adopted by that of 1785 A.D., became a bond of union, and the only one acted under until the year 1789 A.D. For as to the General Constitution framed at the period now before us (1785 A.D.), it stood on recommendation only, and was of no use except in helping to convince those who were attached to that mode of transacting business that it was very idle to bring gentlemen together from different States for the purpose of such inconclusive proceedings." (Memoirs, p. 96.)

On the 28th of July, 1789 A.D., however, representatives from the seven States which had sent delegates in 1786 A.D. were assembled at Philadelphia. The deputies at this Convention were at the beginning of the session called upon to declare their powers relative to the object of the resolution which had been adopted in 1786 A.D., recommending the Conventions of the Church in the several States represented to authorize and empower their deputies to confirm and ratify a general Constitution respecting both doctrine and discipline; and in response to this call "gave information that they came fully authorized to ratify a Book of Common Prayer, etc., for the use of the Church." (Bioren, 48.)

The Constitution which had been proposed in 1786 A.D. was at this session considered and adopted as amended, and by virtue of such adoption became binding upon the Churches in the seven States whose representatives had been empowered to that end. The concluding act of this session was the appointment of a committee for the purpose, among other things, of forwarding its minutes and proceedings "to the Eastern and other Churches not included in this Union, to notify to them the time and place to which this Convention shall adjourn, and request their attendance at the same for the good purposes of union and general government." (Bioren, 64.)

At the adjourned meeting of this Convention held in Philadelphia, September 29, 1789 A.D., the Constitution adopted at the last session having been amended in respect to the distribution of powers to be exercised by the General Convention, was adopted as amended, not only by the deputies of the seven States previously represented, but also by the representatives of the Churches in Connecticut, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire, who were present and duly authorized for such adoption. Thus the Churches of ten of the States, by virtue of the voluntary assent of each, declared by representatives duly authorized for the purpose, established the General Convention and placed themselves under its government, vesting it with certain powers, and confirming those powers by the charter of a written Constitution. This Constitution, and by consequence the jurisdiction of the General Convention, then extended to those Churches only which had up to that time acceded to that instrument. But provision was made for the extension of the jurisdiction of the General Convention by the constitutional declaration that a Protestant Episcopal Church in any of the United States not now represented might at any time thereafter be admitted on acceding to the Constitution. In pursuance of which the Church in every State of the Civil Union afterwards became (at greater or less intervals respectively) a member of the Ecclesiastical Union; sending its representatives to the General Convention, and conforming to the laws of its enactment; the extension of the jurisdiction of that body thus keeping even pace with the expansion of its constituency.

Thus the idea conceived, and in substance formulated, so far back as 1784 A.D. was through progressive steps extending over a period of five years, at last brought into effect. The supreme legislative authority over the members of such Churches in the States as consented to the General Constitution was vested in a representative body of clergy and laity, and provision was made for the extension of that authority throughout the Civil Union as soon as the Churches in all the States should be willing to submit themselves to it.

And it is desirable here to note that the Church in each State subsequently acceding to the Constitution bore the same relation to the Ecclesiastical Union, and to the General Convention, as if it had been one of the original seven or ten; and that the Church in each State being the equivalent of the Diocese (i.e., the field or jurisdiction of the single Bishop), the Ecclesiastical Union is a union of Dioceses; and that each Diocese, though it be (as in some cases it has since been) only a part of the Church within a State, holds, the Constitution having been acceded to, the same relation to the Ecclesiastical Union and the General Convention as if it were one of such original members.

That the Ecclesiastical body in each State was independent on all the others was the result of the independent position of the States themselves. That these States were, in Confederate Union, working out under difficulties the problem of their ultimate nationality, made it altogether natural that the Churches should be drawn together in the effort to unite themselves under a common Ecclesiastical government. That the Churches should move slowly and with difficulty was not surprising in view of the varying views of its members in different places, some thinking that the original Constitution of the Church already provided sufficiently for the working together of neighboring Churches under a common Episcopate, and some thinking that Episcopal government was only another name for foreign interference and perhaps domestic tyranny, and that a system of popular representation was essential to the preservation of popular liberties. And beside these differences there was the difference which was obvious in the political contests of the day; some standing for the principle of the self-government of the States as the preservative against the dangers of centralization of power, and some dwelling more upon the idea of the substantial unity of the whole country, resulting from the unity of its inhabitants as being in the main of one blood and one inheritance of civil freedom. There was, moreover, during the first part of the incubation of this scheme of Ecclesiastical Union a very serious uncertainty as to two points: 1st, whether the application to the English Bishops for consecration was to succeed; and, 2d, whether the Civil Union was to continue to be a mere confederacy or was to be established on the basis of a real Nationality. Neither of these doubts was set at rest until after the Convention of 1786 A.D. But with the consecration of Bishops for New York and Pennsylvania in 1787 A.D., and the adoption of the Constitution of the United States in the same year, the promoters of the Ecclesiastical Union found themselves on firmer ground, and neither the accomplishment of that Union nor the form in which it shaped itself were uninfluenced by these events. In the two years which followed the minds of men were prepared to receive with greater unanimity the ideas that the working system of Church government should be co-extensive with the operation of the civil system, and that legislative authority in the Church should not be exercised apart from the official sanction of the Episcopal order. Neither of these ideas then had its full effect, but they were both then put in the way of attaining that universal recognition which they have since received.

II. Constitutional Form and Method of Operation.—The General Convention, as may be inferred from what has been said, has passed through several phases.

In what may be regarded as the incipient stages of its growth it appears as an assembly of clergymen and laymen coming from the Church in several States, deliberating together, and voting by States; each State having one vote. This form continues from 1785 A.D. to 1789 A.D. It next appears as an assembly of the same sort, deliberating in the same way, but voting by clergy and laity, each State having in fact two votes, but the preponderance being given to a majority of the States represented in one order concurring with a majority of the States represented in the other order. This form and method are incorporated into the Constitution of August, 1789 A.D., which also provides for a change contingent upon the acquisition of three or more Bishops in the number of the States represented. The contemplated change was the deliberation of the General Convention in two separate Houses, the one composed, as before, of clergy and laity, and voting as before; the other composed of Bishops only, which latter was to be a House of Revision, having power to revise and reject acts proposed by the clergy and laity, who had, however, the power to overrule the rejection by a three-fifths vote of their House.

The next phase is that of a body composed of a House of Bishops and a House of Clerical and Lay Deputies, each having power to originate and propose acts, and the concurrence of both being requisite to constitute the act of the body, but with the provision that the negative of the House of Bishops might be overruled by the vote of four-fifths of the Lower House. This form and method appear in the Constitution of October, 1789 A.D., and continue until 1808 A.D., when by an amendment of the Constitution the power of the Lower House to overrule the negative of the Upper House disappears and both Houses are recognized as co-ordinate branches of one Supreme Legislature, the concurrence of both being necessary to constitute the act of the body, and each having an absolute negative on the acts of the other; the House of Bishops being, however, required to signify their approbation or disapprobation of the acts of the Lower House (the latter with their reasons in writing) within three days.

It appears, then, that by the Constitution the General Convention is a body composed of a House of Bishops and a House of Clerical and Lay Deputies, and that the concurrence of both these is necessary to constitute an act of the body. The method of operation contemplated by the Constitution is that an act proposed in either House, and adopted by it, is to be submitted to the other for its concurrence. If the desired concurrence be yielded, the act is no longer the act of either House, but of the whole body, and without such concurrence no act can become a law. An act adopted by the Lower House and not adopted or rejected by the Upper House it is true becomes law, but that is not because the power of enacting laws belongs, under any circumstances, to the Lower House alone, but because the Upper House, not having signified its disapprobation, as it had power to do, is to be presumed to have approved the proposed measure.

It is observable that the Constitution in prescribing the form and method of the two Houses, is much more explicit in reference to the House of Deputies than in reference to the House of Bishops. This is to be explained by the fact that the House of Deputies was in fact organized before the House of Bishops, and was in a position in the adoption of the Constitution to describe precisely the form and method which it was intended to have, whereas the House of Bishops was yet, in fact, to be established after its legal existence had been recognized.

The clerical and lay delegates from the States had begun to regard themselves as a General Convention, while they were still a voluntary body, before it was decided whether the application to England for Bishops was to be granted. And when the application was granted, and there were Bishops among the number of those States which were represented, then the representatives proceeded to provide a place for the Bishops as a separate House, by way of addition to the proposed Constitution. The Constitution as proposed in 1786 A.D. provided that in every State where there should be a Bishop duly consecrated and settled, who should have acceded to the Constitution, he should be considered as a member of the Convention ex officio, and that a Bishop should always preside if any of the Episcopal order were present. This was before there was a Bishop in the number of the States then represented in the Union. Bishop Seabury had been consecrated in 1784 A.D., but Connecticut was not a member of the Union. In 1789 A.D., however, Bishop White and Bishop Provost had been consecrated for Pennsylvania and New York, and as there was the anticipation of including Bishop Seabury in the Union, or of having another Bishop consecrated for one of the States actually represented, or of both, it was thought desirable to provide for the session of these, and other Bishops that might be obtained, as a separate House; but the provision was made, as before said, by way of addition or amendment to the place already incorporated into the Constitution.

In truth, the constitutional provisions for the session of General Convention in two Houses were every appearance of having been an after-thought; and while explicit directions are given in regard to the Convention which are obviously applicable only to the House of Deputies, the House of Bishops appears to have been recognized, and its organization and arrangement to have been left, with whatever motive, to itself. The extent of this provision as to this House is that the Bishops of this Church, where there shall be three or more in the number of those States which shall have adopted the Constitution, shall form a separate House, that they shall have a right to originate and propose acts, and shall have a negative upon the acts of the House of Deputies as above said. What shall constitute a quorum, for instance, is not specified, and other omissions might be noted.

In directions apparently applicable to the Lower House, however, the provision is that the Church in a majority of the Dioceses which shall have adopted the Constitution shall be represented before the Convention shall proceed to business; that the Church in each Diocese shall be entitled to a representation both of clergy and laity, and that such representation shall consist of not more than four clergymen and four laymen (communicants) residing in, and chosen in the manner prescribed by, the Convention of the Diocese which they respectively represent; and that in all cases, when required by the clerical or lay representation from any Diocese, the vote shall be of a certain kind.

It is important to observe that the method of voting peculiar to the House of Deputies and provided for in Art. ii. of the Constitution is not made obligatory in all cases, but only when required by a clerical or a lay representation from any Diocese. If no such requirement be made, the vote of the House may be taken by acclamation or by division, or even by individual ayes and nays, as usual in other deliberative bodies. But if any clerical or any lay deputation, from any Diocese, require the vote to be taken in the constitutional method, the vote must be so taken; and it is presumable that where the Canons provide that a measure must be adopted by a constitutional majority this method of voting must be pursued by this House.

This method is properly called voting by Dioceses and Orders. It is not a vote by Dioceses alone. It is not a vote by Orders alone. It is a vote by Dioceses and Orders. The manner of voting prior to the constitutional organization of the General Convention in 1789 A.D. was by States. The proposed Constitution of 1786 A.D. expresses what was the practice of that year and of previous years. The vote of the representatives of the Church was taken by States, the Church in each State having one vote, and the majority of suffrages being conclusive. By the Constitution of 1789 A.D. this method of voting was changed; but it was not changed by substituting the vote of the body of clergy and laity present for the vote of the Dioceses which they represented, but by the giving to the Church in each State or Diocese the privilege of two votes instead of one, and requiring that there should be a majority of two kinds corresponding to these two kinds of votes, clerical and lay. The majority, to be conclusive in legislative acts, is not a majority of States or Dioceses having one vote each, but a majority of all Dioceses represented by clergy, concurring with a majority of all Dioceses represented by laity. If a Diocese is represented only in one Order, of course it has only the vote of that Order; but it has the right to be represented by two Orders if it please, and then to have the two votes. If a Diocese be not represented by either clerical or lay delegates it has no vote; but it has the constitutional right to representation, and is therefore concluded by the acts of the body the same as if it had actually consented to them. But the votes of the representatives present are not, in this manner of voting, to be taken in a body. It is not a numerical majority that is conclusive, nor is it a majority of all the clerical representatives present concurring with a majority of all the lay representatives present, but a majority of all the Dioceses represented by clergy, concurring with a majority of all the Dioceses represented by laity.

And it is to be observed that this constitutional majority, as it is, on the one hand, not a mere numerical majority, so, on the other hand, is not necessarily identical with the consent of the Church in a majority of Dioceses. For, in fact, a concurrent majority of clerical and lay delegates may be so distributed as to carry a measure when there is no majority of Dioceses, considered as such, and voting in each case as a whole. A majority of clerical representatives of Dioceses counting from the north downward (supposing the case for the sake of example), concurring with a majority of lay representatives of Dioceses counted from the south upward, will carry a measure as well as a majority of Dioceses with solid clerical and lay vote counted from the north downward, or vice versa, or distributed anywhere throughout the Union. That the constitutional majority provided for by Art. ii. will generally be equivalent to the expression of the consent of the Church in a majority of Dioceses may be true. Practically there is, perhaps, little probability of the distinction being insisted on. But it is necessary that legal instruments should be understood as providing for possibilities as well as probabilities. And in considering the constitutional prescription for the method of operation of the General Convention in legislative enactments, it is necessary to apprehend exactly what the provision of the Constitution is, and to note that the vote described in Art. ii. is not necessarily identical with the vote of the Church by Dioceses.

III. Nature and Limitations of Constitutional Powers.—It might be supposed that a number of independent bodies coming together for the purpose of establishing a common government, and uniting in the adoption of a written Constitution, by the terms of which a common authority was recognized, would agree upon certain specific objects which they desired to put in charge of that common authority, and would be very precise in the designation both of the powers conferred and the powers reserved to themselves. In matters of civil government this course would undoubtedly be pursued. But perhaps it would be too much to expect such strictness in Ecclesiastical concerns, where, indeed, there may be less need for them on some accounts. Under the circumstances attending the constitutional establishment of the General Convention much, no doubt, would be taken for granted. Some defects of arrangement might be overlooked provided that the substantial purpose of union was attained. The feeling that those who were combining their Ecclesiastical interests were all basing their lives upon professed principles of Christian love which would be a safeguard against jealousies, animosities, and mutual exactions, might justly have weight. And the further feeling that, whatever difficulties might be in the way of formal union, and whatever construction might be put upon formal provisions, the members of the Church in the several States were united already, in the one Church of CHRIST's foundation, might account for some want of system. At all events, it is certain that the study of the Constitution will be very disappointing to one who expects to find in it anything approaching to a general statement of Church principles, or of all principles of government applicable to the union of the Churches. And with regard to the powers of the General Convention, remarkable as the fact is in view of the absolute novelty of such an institution, it must be said that they cannot be referred to any specific enumeration contained in the Constitution. The General Convention exists by virtue of the action of the Church in the Dioceses. The Constitution adopted by this Church is the written evidence of its establishment and its authority; but, being in existence, its authority is not specifically declared as to every particular, but is of that general character which belongs to supreme power. Yet, on the other hand, it is not to be inferred that the exercise of this power is arbitrary, either as to the sphere within which it is to operate, or as to the extent of its operation in that sphere.

Those who constituted the General Convention were competent to define and specify its powers, or to constitute it for a certain class of powers and leave it unlimited in the exercise of them; or to constitute it for a certain class of powers, particularly specifying some, and to impose upon it certain limitations in the exercise of its powers. The last of these three courses is what appears to have been chosen. The Constitution contemplates the General Convention as intrusted with the power of legislation. The acts which are adopted by both its Houses are to have the operation of law. But these are limitations imposed by the Constitution upon the exercise of this power. Apart from these limitations, the General Convention appears to possess power to pass laws on any subject as to which a National Church is free to legislate for its members. It can pass any law which the Dioceses together might pass for themselves, supposing them to be able to act together. They do, indeed, act together in all acts which it performs under the Constitution, and not contrary to the limitations which that instrument imposes. It acts for them; they act through it. When such action takes place, it is of superior obligation to the act of the Church in any Diocese. In respect to matters as to which there has been no such common action, the individual Diocese is free to act for itself in its own concerns. And what one Diocese may do for itself, two or more Dioceses may do for themselves in regard to matters of joint interest; subject always to the paramount authority of the General Convention, acting, as before said, under the Constitution and within constitutional limitations. The ability to pass laws obligatory upon the members of all the Dioceses, and irrespective of the consent of individual Dioceses, resulting from the assent of all the Dioceses to the Constitution, is a check upon the power of individual Dioceses. The safety of the individual Diocese from overbearing action on the part of the General Convention lies in the principles of limitation embodied in the Constitution, and only there.

To the Constitution, therefore, we look not for a complete enumeration of the powers and functions of the General Convention, nor for the precise statement of rights referred to the Dioceses, but rather for the evidence of a grant to the common authority of a supremacy including several specified powers, subject to definite limitations by which its action is controlled.

In considering this branch of the subject it will be most convenient to follow the order of the articles of the Constitution, although it is to be remembered that the present purpose is not analysis and explanation of the Constitution, but the ascertainment of the powers and limitations of power of the General Convention as indicated by that instrument. And it would be well for the reader also to bear in mind that, for the sake of brevity in a paper of this sort, it is necessary that, in most cases, conclusions should be stated rather than the grounds upon which these conclusions are based.

1. Things chiefly to be noted in the first article are (a) the establishment of the General Convention as a continuously existing body required to be in session at specified times of regular recurrence, and also authorized to meet at its own discretion in accordance with laws of its own adoption, its personal membership presumably varying, but the body itself not going out of existence. (See Digest, Tit. iii., Can. i, § 1.)

(b) The representative character of the body, and the constituency which is represented. The necessary representation before the General Convention can proceed to business is required to be that of the Church in a majority of the Dioceses which have acceded to the Constitution. The body then is a representative body, and the constituency is the Church in the Dioceses which have acceded to the Constitution.

(c) The provision that the representation from two Dioceses shall be sufficient to adjourn precludes the necessity of a stated session being omitted for the year appointed on account of the delay of the members in coming together. Without this provision, if there were present anything less than a quorum at the day appointed, there would be a necessity of going without a stated meeting for three years, and possibly of resorting to the inconvenient substitute of a special meeting. The expedient gives a sufficient time (and apparently an indefinite time within three years) for the delegates to assemble.

(d) The provision that in all business of the Convention freedom of debate is to be allowed; a provision too well understood and too constantly complied with to require any particular comment.

2. The provisions of Art. ii. of the Constitution have been already considered so far as they relate to the form and method of operation of the General Convention. What is here to be noted is their bearing upon the powers of that body. This article contains the most general grant of power which the representative body has received. The power, however, is not conveyed by the formal statement that the General Convention is authorized to do certain things, or all things of a certain kind; but it is, with equal effect, conferred in a different way; that is, by the abandonment on the part of the Dioceses of any right of objection to acts of the General Convention consummated in a specified way. The article reserves the right of the Church in each Diocese which shall have assented to the Constitution to be represented both by clergy and laity, and by a certain number; all Dioceses being entitled to equal representation. It provides a peculiar method of voting, which makes it impossible for a measure to pass the House of Deputies without the concurrence of a majority of Dioceses represented by clergy with a majority of Dioceses represented by laity, which, in most cases, though not necessarily, is equivalent to the expression of the will of a majority of Dioceses, and leaves it within the power not only of any Diocese, but of any delegation of any Diocese, to force this method of voting upon the rest; and then it precludes any Diocese from refusing to be bound by a measure so passed, not only when it may have voted against it, but even when it may not, in fact, have been represented. If the Church in a Diocese has not been represented, it shall nevertheless be bound by the acts of the Convention. A fuller and more exclusive grant of power it would be difficult to give. And the only limitation upon it, so far as this article is concerned, is that the acts shall be adopted in the method prescribed, if this method is demanded by any delegation, either clerical or lay.

There are, however, other limitations, which, though not stated in this article, are plainly inferable from other articles and from the nature of the case. For (A) the acts by which the Church in each Diocese is to be bound are the acts of the whole body of the General Convention, which, by Art. iii., involve the consent of the House of Bishops, in which each Diocese is represented by its own Bishop; and (B) the acts by which each Diocese is to be bound are acts of a legislative character. This, indeed, is nowhere expressly stated, but it is matter of necessary inference (a) from the expression of Art. iii., that acts of the Lower House proposed to and not acted on in the specified way by the House of Bishops shall have the operation of law; (b) from the pointed omission in Art. vi. to confer upon the General Convention in matters of trial and discipline any judicial power or anything further than the right to provide the mode of trying Bishops; (c) from the requirement (in Art. ix.) of a substantially different method of consent to the alteration of the Constitution from that required for acts of the General Convention.

3. Another constitutional limitation upon the power of the General Convention appears in the recognition and reservation of the right of every Diocese to the choice of its own Bishop. Article iv. provides that the Bishop or Bishops in every Diocese shall be chosen agreeable to such rules as shall be fixed by the Convention of that Diocese. This puts it beyond the power of the General Convention to impose a Bishop of its choice upon any existing Diocese. What the General Convention may do in the way of Canons prescribing certain qualifications and conditions to be complied with before the person chosen by a Diocese shall be consecrated by the Bishops of the Church is another question. The Bishops of the Church cannot be forced to consecrate the person chosen by a Diocese, and they, acting as a House of the General Convention, and concurring with the House of Deputies, may pass laws requiring a person chosen to possess certain qualifications, or to comply with certain conditions, before they will consecrate him. But that is a different thing from interfering with the choice itself.

4. In the matter of the formation of new Dioceses the Constitution confers upon the General Convention certain powers, to which also limitations are annexed.

The question how the General Convention, being created by the Dioceses, could possess power to form new Dioceses might occur to one who had regard only to the origin of the body. But in view of subsequent history the question implies no contradiction. The Dioceses were originally coterminous with the States. Increase of population made division sometimes desirable. New settlements in the Territories and in new States might not be so permanent as in the older communities. Dioceses might sometimes require readjustment. It was not expedient that such changes should be left entirely with the Dioceses particularly interested; but it was desirable, if not necessary, that there should be some common authority in the matter. By amendment to the Constitution this authority is lodged in General Convention.

It is important to observe the distinction between the admission of Dioceses and the formation of new Dioceses by the readjustment of Dioceses already admitted. Art. v. as it stands relates to two entirely distinct classes of cases. (See this distinction elaborately and conclusively maintained by Rev. J. H. Hopkins, D.D., in American Church Review, April, 1881 A.D., p. 135.)

The first part of it provides for the admission of a Protestant Episcopal Church in any of the United States or any Territory thereof on its accession to the Constitution. The second part (by amendment first introduced in 1833 A.D., but afterwards modified) provides for the formation of new Dioceses by the readjustment of those already admitted. At the time of the first introduction of this amendment the words "in any Territory thereof" were introduced into the first part of the Article. Under this, the Church in any State or Territory has the right to admission to the Union upon accession to the Constitution. That fact being certified to the General Convention, it takes its place as a matter of course so far as the Constitution is concerned. The remainder of the article, however, refers to the other class of cases; cases, viz., of Dioceses reformed from a part of a Diocese already admitted, or from parts of two or more such Dioceses.

In such cases the General Convention has constitutional power to act, and without such action no such readjustment can take place. The consent of the General Convention is necessary in order to such readjustment, and that consent the General Convention is forbidden to give unless certain things appear. No new Diocese can be formed within the limits of any other Diocese, nor by the junction of two or more Dioceses, or parts of Dioceses, without the consent of the Bishop and Convention of each of the Dioceses concerned; nor unless General Convention have satisfactory assurance of a suitable provision for the support of the Episcopate in a contemplated new Diocese; nor unless such new Diocese shall contain six parishes and six Presbyters who have been canonically resident and regularly settled for at least a year and qualified to vote for a Bishop; nor if the formation of a new Diocese on such a basis would reduce any existing Diocese to less than twelve parishes and twelve Presbyters; nor if a city would be by the change made to form more than one Diocese. The action contemplated by the Constitution in the case of such changes is the action of Dioceses; the function of the General Convention is that of ratification, the power of ratification being limited by the above-named conditional requirements.

5. The provisions of Art. vi. are worthy of careful attention. They distinctly confer the power of legislation upon General Convention in respect to matters which involve the exercise of judicial power, and pointedly refrain from conferring the judicial power itself. The power of prescribing the mode of exercising judicial power is a high function of legislation. This power is given to the General Convention in a specified class of cases, and in that only. "The mode of trying Bishops shall be provided by the General Convention." This phrase appears to have been understood to involve a power to prescribe all that relates to the trial of a Bishop, exclusive of the power to conduct the trial itself. Perhaps it does; although so to interpret it is to give rather a wide construction to the word mode. Understanding the legislative power in this class of cases, however, to be conferred upon General Convention, that body has the right, in the exercise of this power, to determine the grounds of trial, or what is or is not an offense for which trial may be had; the manner in which accusation shall be formulated, notified to the accused and judicially examined, and the sentence appropriate to offenses proved to have been committed. The judicial function is the determination of the questions whether certain alleged actions constitute an offense; whether allegations are proved; to what penalties certain actions, being proved, are entitled under the law; and, these questions being determined, the actual pronouncement of the sentence. This latter power is by the Constitution reserved to the Bishops in all cases of ministerial discipline, and the legislative power of the General Convention which enables it to prescribe the composition of a court for the trial of Bishops is subject to the constitutional limitation that such court shall be composed of Bishops only. The same kind of power is denoted by the expression used in this article in describing the function of the Diocesan Conventions in respect to the trial of subordinate clergy: "In every Diocese the mode of trying Presbyters and Deacons may be instituted by the Convention of the Diocese." This is a constitutional guaranty of a reserved Diocesan right that the trial of the clergy of the Diocese, as distinguished from its Bishop, shall be according to the laws of the Diocese. Or, if that phrase be considered objectionable, it is at least a permission embodied in the Constitution that each Diocese shall possess that right; and while that permission stands the Constitution forbids to the General Convention what it allows to the Dioceses. On what ground, therefore, the General Convention can, as it has done by Canon, determine offenses and penalties in the case of Presbyters and Deacons, or provide a Court of Appeal having jurisdiction over these cases originating in the Dioceses, as it has been often urged to do, is not apparent from the Constitution. That instrument empowers and directs the General Convention to provide the mode of trying Bishops. It limits the power of the General Convention by directing that courts for that purpose shall be composed of Bishops only, and by reserving to the Diocesan Conventions the right to institute the mode of trying Presbyters and Deacons, and by reserving to the Bishops the right to pronounce sentence in every case of ministerial discipline.

The prescribing of qualifications to be possessed, and conditions to be complied with by those who are to be ordained, is an essential function of the office to which the power of ordination belongs. It is therefore in its nature a power of the Episcopate, and is not by the Constitution expressly conferred upon the General Convention. In so far, however, as it is a legislative power, it may be understood to be included in the general grant to that body; and in point of fact appears not to have been exercised by the Bishops in our system, except as composing a part of the General Convention and in concurrence with the House of Clerical and Lay Deputies. The same remark may be made in reference to the prescribing of the terms upon which ministers ordained by one Bishop may be permitted to officiate within the jurisdiction of another. It is, like the other, essentially an Episcopal power. And the provisions of Art. vii. being prohibitions of ordination and license, except under certain conditions, might be considered as constitutional limitations in the power of the Episcopate rather than of the General Convention. But inasmuch as the provisions of this article contemplate the passing of Canons as to these matters, and Canons are not in our system enacted by Bishops alone, but by General Convention, they may be properly considered as limitations of the power of the General Convention. In this view the body is by them precluded from enacting any Canon which will legalize the ordination of any person until he shall have been examined by the Bishop and by two Presbyters, and shall have subscribed the specified declaration of belief in the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments as being the Word of God and containing all things necessary to salvation, and of conformity to the doctrines and worship of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States; and from enacting any Canon permitting a person, ordained by a foreign Bishop, to officiate as a minister of this Church without his subscription of the same declaration.

7. The eighth article of the Constitution devolves upon the General Convention the power of establishing, which involves the power of altering, a Book of Common Prayer, Administration of Sacraments, and other Rites and Ceremonies of the Church, Articles of Religion and Ordinal, providing that such formularies when established by the General Convention shall be used in those Dioceses which have adopted the Constitution. This power conferred by the Constitution of 1789 A.D. upon the General Convention is, however, by amendment of 1811 A.D., subjected to the limitation that no alteration or addition shall be made in these formularies unless the same be proposed in one General Convention, and by a resolve thereof made known to the Convention of every Diocese, and adopted at the subsequent General Convention. The terms of this limitation are very explicit. The alteration which is made in any session of the General Convention must be "the same" as was proposed in the last General Convention, and by resolve thereof made known to the Convention of every Diocese. An alteration proposed in one General Convention may, of course, be modified or changed in that General Convention. But when it is finally adopted by that General Convention, and by a resolve thereof made known to the Dioceses, it comes up before the next General Convention, not for amendment or modification, but either for adoption or rejection. If it is amended it becomes a new proposition, and in order to adoption must be, by a new resolve, made known to the Dioceses, and must come before the next General Convention as before, either for adoption or rejection.

This strictness was applicable to the Lectionary, or order of reading Holy Scriptures, as to the rest of the Prayer-Book, until 1877 A.D., when the third clause of Art. viii. was added, whereby the General Convention is permitted to alter the Lectionary at any session ("from time to time" are the words used), but on condition that no act for the purpose shall be valid which is not voted for by a majority of all the Bishops entitled to seats in the House of Bishops, and by a majority of all the Dioceses entitled to representation in the House of Deputies. The manner of voting under this article in the House of Deputies is not specified, but the consent required is the consent of a majority of the Dioceses entitled to representation. That something more is required in this case than the vote described in Art. ii. appears from the facts, (1) that the vote by Dioceses and Orders does not of necessity signify the consent of a majority of the Dioceses, but may only signify the consent of the clergy of one set of Dioceses concurring with the laity of another set of Dioceses; and (2) that the vote described in Art. ii. need only express the concurrent consent of clergy and laity in a majority of a quorum of Dioceses; and, the quorum being the representation of a majority of Dioceses entitled to representation, the majority of the quorum is less than a majority of the Dioceses. The manner of voting under this amendment to Art. viii. not being prescribed, it seems that the vote may be taken in any manner which will express the required consent. But if the ordinary vote by Dioceses and Orders be used, it must be ascertained that the majority of Dioceses be not merely a majority of the quorum, but a majority of the Dioceses entitled to representation, and that the vote of the clergy and laity be a concurrent vote in each of the Dioceses which constitute the majority. If, however, a Diocese voting on such a question be represented only by clergy or only by laity, it is presumed that it will be bound, under the general rule of Art. ii., by the vote of that delegation by which it is represented.

8. The comments made upon this recent amendment to Art. viii. have prepared the way for the better understanding of Art. ix.

This article relates to the amendment of the Constitution itself. It stands precisely as it stood when adopted in 1789 A.D., excepting the substitution of the words "Diocese" and "Diocesan" for "States" and "State." It provides that the Constitution shall be unalterable, unless in General Convention, by the Church, in a majority of the Dioceses which may have adopted the same; and that all alterations shall be first proposed in one General Convention and made known to the several Diocesan Conventions before they shall be finally agreed to or ratified in the ensuing General Convention.

In this process two general principles are to be observed: (1) The alteration must be made in General Convention, and (2) it must be by the action of the Church in a majority of Dioceses. That is to say, (1) it cannot be made by any Diocese for itself, nor by any joint action of the majority in the whole of the Dioceses other than that taken in the General Convention. But (2) the power which acts in the alteration is not the General Convention as such, but the Church in a majority of the Dioceses which have adopted that Constitution. The Church in a majority of Dioceses is to act, but it is to act in the General Convention. The Church in a Diocese can act in General Convention only by its representatives. Hence the alteration of the Constitution can be constitutionally effected only by the consent of the representatives of a majority of the Dioceses in General Convention. And as the act of alteration is to be the act of the Church in a majority of the Dioceses, the vote by which that act is performed must be a vote which will express the consent of the Church in a majority of the Dioceses. If the usual vote taken by Dioceses and Orders does in fact express that consent, of course there can be no objection to it; but, from what has already been said, it will be apparent (1) that such a vote, when it reveals only the consent of a majority of the number of Dioceses which constitute a quorum of the Lower House, cannot be the vote of a majority of the Dioceses which have adopted the Constitution; and (2) that if such a vote reveals only the consent of one set of Dioceses represented by clergy, concurring with the consent of another set of Dioceses represented by laity (unless those Dioceses should be respectively represented by a delegation of only one kind), it cannot be the consent of the Church in a majority of the Dioceses which have adopted the Constitution; and, by consequence, cannot be the consent required by the Constitution.

There is, however, no necessary inclusion of the vote required by Art. ix. within the requirements of Art. ii. The distinction between all questions which can come up for action in the General Convention under a certain fixed Constitution, and a question as to the change of that Constitution itself, is perfectly plain. The Constitution was established by the consent of all the Dioceses, and that consent was given with the stipulation that if the Constitution was changed, it should not be changed without the consent of a majority of them. Nothing less than such consent, ascertain it how we will, can satisfy the stipulation.

And if it be urged that this conclusion would require also the consent of the Bishops of those Dioceses which constitute the majority in the action taken in the Lower House, that does not prove the conclusion to be wrong. When the Constitution, containing this article the same as now, was adopted in October, 1789 A.D., it was signed not only by the representatives of the Dioceses in the Lower House, but also by two out of the three Bishops then in the country. Whence arose the presumption that the Bishops of the Dioceses had no voice as such in the consent of those Dioceses to the alteration of the Constitution? Certainly there is no reason why the Bishops should not have a voice in the action of their Dioceses in General Convention. That such action was not expressly required in concurrence with the action of elected representatives is probably due only to the fact already referred to, that the scheme of the Constitution was completed in the conception of a representative body of clergy and laity, without strict regard to, or full understanding of, the proper functions of Bishops, and that their connection with the system of the General Convention was left in some respects unprovided for.

The prevailing impression that the Episcopal consent, required by Art. iii., was practically the same as the consent of a majority of the Bishops of the Dioceses, and that the vote by Dioceses and Orders was equivalent to the vote of the Dioceses, has led to the treatment of questions on constitutional alterations in the same manner as all other questions. This of course has its conveniences, and produces what perhaps is not far from being equivalent to the consent of the Church in a majority of the Dioceses, but it is open to the serious objection, nevertheless, of not being necessarily equivalent to that consent, and of being, in fact, not the action of the Church in a majority of the Dioceses in General Convention, but the action of the General Convention.

IV. Of Change in Form, Jurisdiction, and Constituency of General Convention, resulting from its own Action.—The view which has been taken of the General Convention would hardly be complete without the notice of certain changes which have taken place in the form and order of its administration of authority, which are not provided for by the Constitution. The changes to which reference is here made cannot be said to be contrary to the Constitution, but they are, in fact, exterior to it, deriving their authority not from it, but from acts of the General Convention, sustained by the public opinion of that body, of which General Convention is the representative.

There can be no just question that in the beginning of its existence the General Convention had jurisdiction over the members of the Church in those States by whose duly authorized representatives the Constitution had been adopted, and over those only; and that in form it was composed of representatives, Episcopal or elective, of Dioceses only, or of Churches in States equivalent to Dioceses. The expansion of its constituency and the extension of its jurisdiction kept even pace with those accessions to the Constitution which were the precedent conditions of admission to the Union. The Churches in the States were the elements of the combination, the units of the federative system. The Church in any State not acceding to the Constitution remained in its independence, without the privileges or the duties of union. The Church in any State acceding, took its stand on equal terms with those that had already acceded. Churches in Eastern States, feeble in numbers, grouped themselves together under the name of the Eastern Diocese, but the individuality of the Church in these States was not obliterated. The Church in two States, or more than two, might, from paucity of Bishops, or inability to support them, for a time come under a common Episcopate; but the idea that these were individual Churches, practically distinct Dioceses, was not ignored, and the Church in such States was related to the Ecclesiastical Union not as a group, but as several distinct bodies, which individually acceded to the Constitution, and which, ultimately, became actually, as they had before been potentially, single Episcopal jurisdictions.

But although the federation of Dioceses was from the beginning an essential characteristic of this system of Ecclesiastical government, yet the Church was something more than a federation. If the Ecclesiastical Union were desirable at all, it was desirable that it should be extended. If the grouping of Dioceses, existing within the limits of the same civil government, was in conformity with sound Church principle, it was in derogation of sound Church principle that any Diocese should, without the gravest reason touching the very life of the Church, hold itself aloof from that union. And, more than this, if there were scattering members of the same Church in outlying districts which were not States, they could not consistently be left uncared for by the Church, any more than the districts themselves could be regarded as beyond the pale of the protection of the civil authority. In short, as the single Diocese was, in the system, contemplated as the Church in the State, so the Ecclesiastical Union was to be co-extensive with the Civil Union; and, though many a year was to pass before the formulation of the canonical maxim (Digest i. 15; vii. 4) that the jurisdiction of this Church extends in right, though not always in form, to all persons belonging to it within the United States, yet, no sooner was the formal organization complete in the majority of the States than the effort began to be made to reach out beyond the limits of those States. In the second regular General Convention (1792 A.D.) it was resolved, that a joint Committee of both Houses be appointed to report a plan for supporting Missionaries to preach the Gospel on the frontiers of the United States. And in 1808 A.D. a committee was appointed to address the Church in certain districts, with a view (1) to urge Churches represented in General Convention to send regularly a deputation; (2) to invite the Church in every State in which it is organized and which has not acceded to the Constitution to accede to the same; (3) to invite the clergy and some of the most respectable lay members of the Church in the States and Territories, in which the Church has not been organized, to organize and accede to the Constitution; and this Committee was authorized, moreover, to consider and determine on the proper mode of sending a Bishop into said States and Territories, and in case of a reasonable prospect of accomplishing this object, to elect a suitable person to each Episcopacy, any three Bishops being authorized to consecrate such person on the proper certificates; provided, that the jurisdiction assigned to him should not interfere with the rights of any State or Diocese which should thereafter adopt the Constitution. (Bioren, p. 252.)

It is, of course, no part of the present purpose to trace the history of the Missionary movement in the Church; but it is necessary to note that the beginnings of that movement, thus early in the working of the Ecclesiastical Union, were based upon principles entirely harmonious with that system, and to call attention to the influence and result of that movement upon the General Convention.

How solicitous the original movers in this direction were, to guide the extension of the Church by missions in conformity with the principles of the system of the Ecclesiastical Union, will appear from Bishop White's account, given to the House of Bishops in 1814 A.D., of his action under a commission of the General Convention of 1811 A.D., "to devise means for supplying the congregations of this Church west of the Alleghany Mountains with the ministrations and worship of the same, and for organizing the Church in the Western States." In consequence of this appointment he, the President, had "begun a correspondence with Bishop Madison; but all further progress was arrested by the decease of the said Right Rev. Brother. This did not hinder the President from submitting to the Convention of this Church in Pennsylvania a proposal, which was complied with, designed so far to meet the desires of some members of this Church in the Western country, as that, in the event of a settlement of a Bishop therein, the congregations in the western counties of the State might be under his superintendence, on such a plan as would not affect the integrity of the Church in the State of Pennsylvania as a component member of the body of this Church throughout our Union, in contrariety to the Constitution." (Bioren, pp. 311, 312.)

The issue of the movement begun on these principles has been not only the growth of the Church, but also its settlement within limits corresponding in the main to the civil divisions of the United States; so that, as the Church in an outlying district was fitted for the position of "a component member of this Church throughout our Union," it became such by acceding to the Constitution according to the provisions of its fifth Article.

But while under this provision of the Constitution the constituency and the jurisdiction of the General Convention might be enlarged by the entrance of new Dioceses into the Ecclesiastical Union, there has been no provision of the Constitution which fixed the status of the Church, organized or not organized, in places where there had been no accession to the Constitution. These places are exterior to the jurisdiction of the General Convention as that jurisdiction is established by the Constitution. That they, or the members of the Church within them, are, in fact, within the jurisdiction of the General Convention, is because the General Convention has by Canon provided for the care and oversight of them, and because they have accepted and assented to the authority thus exercised over them. That this was a natural course of events consequent upon the going out of members of the Church in settled Dioceses, who were, as such, under the authority of the General Convention; and their settling, and seeking to establish the Church, in districts where that authority was unknown, probably no one will dispute. Whether the proper method of extending the authority of General Convention over such districts was not by amendment of the Constitution authorizing the passage of Canons necessary to the end in view is, perhaps, a speculative question, and, certainly, one upon which men may differ. The point of importance is, that, as a matter of fact, there is a whole system of dependencies in the outlying and missionary districts which are and ought to be regarded as parts of the Church under the jurisdiction of the General Convention, but which, really, are a growth or accretion upon the original system.

The dependencies of the Church which has, by accession of its component parts to the Constitution, placed itself under the authority of General Convention, are of three classes, and composed respectively (1) of the members of the Church in outlying districts of the territory of the United States, where such organization of the Church as there may be has never acceded to the Constitution; (2) of members of the Church in foreign countries, who are engaged in the conversion of the heathen, or who have themselves been there converted from heathenism; and (3) of members of this Church residing or sojourning in foreign countries, where there is an organization of some part of the Church of CHRIST, with which this Church has, on account of the divisions of Christendom, no intercommunion.

In these three classes of cases there are large bodies of members of this Church which are not organized into what are technically called Dioceses, but which are under the government of the General Convention, and take their law from its action.

Thus the jurisdiction of the General Convention extends, in fact, not only to the members of the Church in the Dioceses which have acceded to the Constitution, but also to the dependencies of that Church situated in the Territories of the United States and in foreign countries. In the exercise of such jurisdiction the General Convention has, by Canon, organized "The Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society" (Digest, Tit. iii., Can. viii.) has provided for the appointment of Domestic Missionary Bishops (Tit. i., Can. xv., § 7), and of Foreign-Missionary Bishops (ib., § 8), and for the organization and regulation of congregations in foreign countries other than Great Britain and Ireland and the colonies and dependencies thereof, and not within the limits of any Foreign Missionary Bishop of this Church, placing them under the Episcopal government and jurisdiction of the Presiding Bishop in the Church in the United States for the time being. (Tit. iii., Can. iv., § 3, et seq.)

And as, in fact, there has been thus an extension of the jurisdiction of the General Convention, so there has been an increase of its constituency, and to some extent, as in equity there should be, an enlargement of its representation. It is true the members of the Church in these several classes are not, under the terms of the Constitution, entitled to send delegates to General Convention; but then, on the other hand, it is also true that these classes are not in any way recognized in the Constitution. The system which provides for them is an accretion upon the original system provided by the Constitution. The new has grown up alongside of the old, and, by custom and canonical regulation, has been grafted upon it, and become part and parcel of it; and on the general principles of its construction, is equitably entitled to some representation. Two additions have been made to the General Convention which have been representative of these classes,—one, recently, by the admission, under resolution of the House of Deputies, of delegates from the Churches in Territories in the United States, who are permitted to attend and speak in reference to the interests of their constituents, though not to have a vote in the body; the other, by Canon, making the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Bishops members of the House of Bishops, and as such presumptively, as they are actually, entitled not only to a voice in the councils of the Church, but also to a vote. And, unless the idea of representation be dwarfed to the notion of elected deputations, these districts are, by this latter connection, a part of the constituency of that representative body which exercises jurisdiction over them. According to the popular, and perhaps it might be said American, notion of representation, those only are representative who are chosen and sent by those whom they represent. But this certainly is not the measure of the Church idea of representation; for representation in a true sense may exist independently of the choice of the persons represented, if they are legitimately under the care and government of those who act for them. The Bishops in the ancient Councils may justly be said to have represented in those Councils the Churches over which they presided. And these bodies of Churchmen have, in fact, a representation of the same kind in General Convention. The Domestic and Foreign Missionary Bishops sit by virtue of their office in the House of Bishops, and as such are members of the General Convention; and the congregations under what are called foreign chaplains, for whom no Bishop has been especially consecrated, are formally placed under the care of a Bishop who is a member of the General Convention, and as such is able to represent them in that body.

REV. PROF. WILLIAM J. SEABURY, D.D.
Generation, Eternal, of the Word. "The Divinity of JESUS CHRIST." Much will be found bearing upon this subject in other articles, but here it is proper to dwell upon it in its aspect as setting forth the consubstantial nature of the SON with the FATHER. The Word of GOD, begotten of the FATHER, must partake of the nature of His FATHER. He, therefore, must be a SON by an Eternal Generation. For infinity of nature belongs to GOD the FATHER, and must, therefore, be shared by the SON, as He partakes, as SON, of the majesty and eternal glory and omniscience and omnipotence of His FATHER. "In the beginning" the SON already was, but this beginning is for us in time. For us this Eternal Generation is set forth in the magnificent description of Wisdom in the eighth chapter of Proverbs. Its glories are hidden in that vastness of worship and adoration paid to Him of which He emptied Himself when He became man (Phil. ii. 7, where the A. V. renders it made Himself of no reputation). Revelation sets Him forth as the brightness of the FATHER's glory, and the express Image of His Person and the Upholder of all things by the Word of His Power. With these facts of His pre-existent glory we must rest content. No more is revealed to us save that He is the Lamb of GOD, as it had been slain from the foundation of the world. It was this eternal pre-existence of CHRIST which was the central point of the Arian controversy. The Arian claimed that He was the first of all created beings, of the highest rank, but denied that He was truly begotten. In Him the name of GOD might be placed, but the Arian denied that it was inherent. The struggle in the Council of Nice was upon this consubstantial nature of the SON of GOD, which was bound up in the doctrine of His being not only the first, but also the only-begotten SON of GOD in the full sense of the word. His sharing of the nature of the FATHER involving essentially an eternal generation, and so the ancient creed of Nicæa declared this doctrine with great insistence. It ran thus: "We believe in one GOD, the FATHER Almighty, the Maker of all things, visible and invisible, and in one LORD JESUS CHRIST, Begotten of His FATHER the only-begotten, that is of the substance of the FATHER, GOD of GOD, Light of Light, Very GOD of Very GOD. Begotten, not made, being of one substance (omoiousios) with the FATHER, by Whom all things both in heaven and on earth were made; Who for us men and for our salvation came down, and was incarnate, and was made man; suffered, and rose the third day: ascended into the heavens; shall come to judge the quick and the dead.

"And in the HOLY SPIRIT.

"And those who say that there was a time when the SON of GOD was not, and that before He was begotten He was not, and that He was born out of the things which exist not, or assert that He is of another nature or substance, or that He is mutable or subject to change, the Holy Catholic or Apostolic Church holdeth accursed." The repetition in several forms of the assertion of this Eternal Generation is very marked. It was then as now the central Truth in the power of the Incarnation and the Atonement. For under no other conclusion can we possibly believe that Our LORD is Eternal Life. The Word not only was with GOD as the wisdom of GOD, but the Word was GOD, the only-begotten, co-eternal with His FATHER (St. John i. 1-4, 14; 1 John v. 11-13, 20).

Genesis. The first book of the Bible, and the oldest surviving book in the world. Unproven claims have recently been put forth for papyri from Egypt and for some alleged Chinese records, but they have neither been substantiated, nor do their contents, which are merely catalogues, it is said, justify their claims to be considered books in any real sense of the word. The oldest book now in existence is rightly the inspired tome which contains the record of the creation, and much more. It is not merely the narrative of the creation of the world for man and the placing of man in it, but a history upon a divine plan, tracing a divine purpose, recording a divine mercy towards erring man. The contents of the book may be divided into five great parts—the Creation, the Fall, the secular history to the time of Abraham, the choice of the Hebrew family to become the Israelitish nation. It is not the place here to decide upon the congruity of shifting and constantly modified scientific speculations with the revelation of GOD. So far no scientific fact, properly established, has been found to clash in any way with the Mosaic outline of the order of creation. It has been always in accord with whatever science has proven so far, and the more deeply the Mosaic record is studied, the more scientifically accurate the terms used are found to be. But another theory, by a different class of assailants, has been alleged, viz.,—that Moses did not write this book from direct revelation, but had used earlier family chronicles and memoranda; and the documents which he used, it is pretended, can be separated, and that, in fact, some editor (whether Moses or some one later) has fused the whole so that they are interlaced in the very structure of the sentences. This may be so far a fact, that for some things Moses was divinely directed to put on record, with absolute precision, facts which had been distorted by tradition, and remnants of which tradition have survived to our day; but that he used them and other documents as the compilers of the books of Kings and of Chronicles did the state records is refuted by the very fact that they who assert these things cannot agree on the documents. These documents are called the Elohistie and Jehovistic, but the terms Elohim (GOD) and Jehovah (LORD) are so interchangeably used and at times so conjoined as to upset any such parceling out of the text, that is, if any credit is to be given to the book at all. (Vide PENTATEUCH.)

I. The Creation. It is contained in Gen. i., ii. 3.

II. For a distinct purpose,—to set forth the position of man in the created world,—the second chapter relates with greater fullness the preparation made for him, and his charge. It is not a repetition, not a different document, but after the general introduction the record now goes on to the special purpose of this part of the Book,—the place and relation of man under GOD to the visible creation. Lordship is given to him, and a companion created for him (Gen. ii. 4 to end).

III. The Fall, the sentence, the expulsion, and the placing of the sentinel Cherubim are recited in the third chapter.

IV. The secular history to the time of Abraham (ch. iv.-xi. 27). This period is divided into two portions by the great cataclysm of the Deluge (which in the usual grouping, in fact, forms the close of one of the great sections). The first portion (ch. iv.-vi.) contains names and ages of the antediluvian Patriarchs from Adam to Noah, with short incidental notices of one or two of them, and then the account of the building of the Ark and the preparation for the preservation of Noah and his family and of such living things as God had appointed (ch. vii.-viii.). In the ninth chapter the blessing and covenant with all flesh through Noah, and the curse of Ham and the blessing of Shem and Japhet, are recorded. The tenth chapter is probably of the greatest ethnological value. Only to it and no farther back have ethnologists been able to trace the history of nations. The eleventh chapter narrates the confusion of languages at the tower in the land of Shinar, where, with remarkable accuracy, Moses speaks of the confusion as of lip, and therefore of language (vide marginal reading). From this point the history changes, and narrows down from the peopling of the earth to the record of a single family,—that of Shem, whose descendants are briefly named,—till we reach Terah, the father of Abram. So far the slight connecting links of the general history Moses has given have in no way been successfully impugned.

V. The call of Abram and the history of his descendants till they were placed in the land of Egypt, and then increased till the land was ready for them to take possession of. The history has been hitherto rather secular than distinctly religious, though throughout God's dealings with men are narrated to us, especially in the history of Noah. But now Abram is chosen, and responds to the choice by his faith, and by wondrous interpositions he is made the father of a son who was to be the type of the greater joy of the whole world. Isaac's son, Jacob, is chosen, and from him come the twelve patriarchs, the heads of large families who grew into tribes, which Moses was commissioned to mould into a nation.

Under the several names Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Joseph will be found some accounts of each, and of their history as typical of CHRIST. The Book of Genesis closes with the migration of the Israel and his family of seventy souls into Egypt. The Chronology of Genesis is a difficult subject, and of which many schemes have been made. It would seem that a longer time than that usually placed on the margin of our Bibles is necessary, and while not pretending to decide so perplexing a subject, the table subjoined gives the most satisfactory solution to it:

Creation	0
Flood.....	2262
Birth of Peleg.....	401
Departure of Abram from Haran.....	616
From Abram's departure to Jacob's going down to Egypt.....	215
	3494

This is a longer computation than the one usually given. It is that of the Septuagint. (Vide Smith's Dict., Chronology.) But it best accords with what we know of external history and the need of allowing more time for contemporary secular history. (The subject is, however, too intricate to be discussed here, and the student is referred to the larger Commentaries, the Speaker's, Lange, Smith's Dictionary of Chronology, and similar works. Browne's Ordo Saeculorum.)

Georgia, Diocese of. Georgia was the child of philanthropy. It is the only colony planted by disinterested trustees, who received neither fee nor reward for their undertaking. It was the only colony where broad principles of Christian benevolence gathered within its sheltering arms the indigent, the forsaken, the persecuted of various nations and creeds, and gave them a common home and protection. The Church of England entered warmly into the scheme of the twenty-one noblemen and gentlemen who constituted its first Board of Trustees. Nearly a fourth of its trustees were clergymen, and over a hundred ministers received, at their own request, commissions to take up collections in behalf of the colony of Georgia, while the Archbishop of Canterbury, Bishops, Archdeacons, Deans, Chapters, Collegiate and Parochial Clergy contributed to its treasury. General Oglethorpe and Rev. Dr. Herbert sailed with the first emigrants. This clergyman offered his services gratuitously.

The trustees sent a petition to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, stating that they had appropriated a site for a church, and a sufficient glebe for the minister, and asking for the usual allowance for a missionary. The Rev. Samuel Quincy was appointed, and reached there four months after the sailing of the first emigrants. In December, 1735 A.D., John and Charles Wesley and Benjamin Ingham came out, full of zeal for the conversion of the Indians. Through no intentional error of the Wesleys they only remained a short time, and left under charges, of which all we can say is they are very remarkable, considering the views with which they are usually identified.

As John Wesley entered the Downs on his return, he passed the ship in which Whitefield sailed for Georgia. After remaining in Savannah a short time he returned to England to be ordained Priest, and raise money for an orphan asylum. He was received with especial favor by the trustees, who appointed him rector of Christ Church, Savannah, and gave him five hundred acres of land for his orphan asylum. In six months he had raised five thousand dollars, and on the 25th of March the first brick of the asylum was laid at a spot nine miles from Savannah, called Bethesda, where he began his asylum. It was burned by lightning, and the property sold. In the good providence of God the property was again purchased for the purpose, and to-day a flourishing orphan asylum is liberally supported by the people of Savannah.

The Church was maintained in Savannah sometimes by ministers worthy to follow Wesley and Whitefield, and, again, by others of whom the less we say the better.

The church in Savannah was ordered to be built in 1740 A.D., and a few loads of stone were brought and laid down upon the spot. But little or no progress was made towards its completion.

The governor, in 1746 A.D., wrote, "The roof of it is covered with shingles, but the sides and ends remain a skeleton." In 1750 A.D. the church was completed, and is described as large, beautiful, and commodious. It was burnt in 1796 A.D. It was burnt again, and the present church was rebuilt on the same spot.

Fifty years before Robert Raikes originated his scheme of a Sunday-school in England, Mr. Wesley established a Sunday-school in Christ Church.

In 1748 A.D. the inhabitants of Savannah numbered six hundred and thirteen, of whom three hundred and eighty-eight were dissenters. The number of communicants of Christ Church was sixty-three. The only minister of the Church of England in the colony, though its population was over three thousand, was Rev. Bartholomew Zouberbubler, rector of Christ Church, under whose faithful ministry, and principally by his pastoral work, the Church increased in numbers and influence.

The inhabitants of Augusta, in 1750 A.D., memorialized the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel for a missionary, stating that a handsome and convenient church had been built under the guns of the fort. A minister was sent them, who arrived in December, 1750 A.D., but could find neither glebe nor parsonage promised. He labored on alone, amidst constant alarms of Indian incursions, separated one hundred and thirty miles from his nearest clerical neighbor with but little to cheer him, till 1756 A.D.

In 1758 A.D. the Assembly divided Georgia into parishes, and appropriated twenty-five pounds to the clergyman officiating in each parish. Yet clergymen were not to be had.

Of two of the clergymen sent to Augusta, it is stated that one was grossly immoral, drunk, profane. Of the other, that he behaved in an unchristian and ungentlemanly way, and doing all he could to bring discredit on the Church and religion. It is painful to add no cause did more to keep down the Church in colonial times than the unworthy conduct of many sent here as missionaries. There were noble exceptions, but there were many who were the very off-scourings of the Church; men who were a disgrace not to religion only, but to their country. These men, virtually banished from England, pressed hither, drifted from parish to parish, ravening as hungry wolves upon the unprotected sheep, while there was no authority to bring them to discipline, or purge the Church of such unworthy ministers. The wonder is the Church survived such an influx of wickedness in those who were sent as teachers.

In 1767 A.D., Rev. Edward Ellington was appointed to St. Paul's, Augusta, and from the records of his travels and his labors, he seems to have deserved the title given by the historian of the colonial Church, as being "the most distinguished of Georgia Missionaries."

Missionaries were, for a time, located in Burke and Sunbury, Liberty County. Owing to the troubles growing out of the Revolution, but little could be done by the missionaries. One was barred out of his Church, another driven from his parish and forced to support his family by teaching.

The effect of the Revolutionary war upon the Church in Georgia, as well as elsewhere, was very distressing. The clergy had, at their ordination, taken the oath of allegiance to the Crown, and were mobbed and ill-treated because they could not break their ordination vows. The only wonder is the Church survived. (Bishop Stevens's Semi-Centennial Sermon before the Convention of Georgia is authority for the above.)

In 1811 A.D., we learn from the Journal of the General Convention of that year that Rev. Mr. Barton presented a certificate of his appointment to attend the Convention, signed by the Wardens and Vestry of the Episcopal Church in the city of Savannah, State of Georgia, whereupon, "Resolved, That the Protestant Episcopal Church in the State of Georgia not being organized, and not having, in Conventions, acceded to the Constitution of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, Rev. Mr. Barton cannot be admitted a member of this House, but that he be allowed the privilege of an honorary seat."

It was not till 1815 A.D. that a Bishop of the Church visited the State. In the spring of that year Bishop Dehon, of South Carolina, came to Savannah to consecrate the new building and hold the first confirmation, and confirmed sixty persons presented by the rector, Rev. Mr. Cranston.

On the 24th of February, 1823 A.D., three clergymen, Rev. Abiel Carter, rector of Christ Church, Savannah, Rev. Hugh Smith, rector of St. Paul's, Augusta, and Rev. Edward Matthews, rector of Christ Church, St. Simon's Island, and three laymen from Christ Church, Savannah, and three from St. Paul's, Augusta, met in St. Paul's, Augusta, to organize the Diocese of Georgia. They adopted a Constitution and Canons and acceded to the Constitution of the Church in the United States, and requested the Bishop of South Carolina, Rt. Rev. Nathaniel Bowen, to take the oversight of the Diocese. They adopted an address to the people in the State, and elected deputies to the General Convention. Two of these deputies took their seats in the General Convention which met the following May. Thus the Diocese of Georgia became an integral part of the Church in the United States.

Of the strength of the parishes at that time we have no information. From the report to the following Convention, May, 1824 A.D., we learn that there were in Christ Church, Savannah, 26 baptisms, 3 of them colored, 84 confirmations, 80 communicants, and Sunday-school very flourishing. St. Paul's, Augusta, baptisms, 27, of which 3 were colored; confirmations, 18; communicants, 51.

Christ Church, Macon, was admitted at the next Convention, and its rector, Rev. Lot Jones, reported a number of points at which he found encouragement to commence services.

At the fourth Annual Convention Bishop Bowen presided, and made an address, in which he said he would give them a statement of all Episcopal transactions affecting Georgia of which he had knowledge, and which were nowhere recorded. Bishop Smith, of South Carolina, from 1798 A.D. till his death in 1802 A.D. had endeavored by correspondence to cherish and preserve the Church in Georgia in a sound state. Through the Rev. Mr. Strong, of Oglethorpe County, he became acquainted with the merits of James Hamilton Ray as candidate for holy orders. In 1801 A.D., Mr. Ray was ordained Deacon and Priest. He lived an honored minister in Greene County, and died in 1805 A.D., greatly lamented as a faithful and able pastor of a numerous flock.*

No one can fail, in reading the journals of the Convention, to be impressed that the great defect in the organization of the Church was the want of a Bishop. Had the change made in 1835 A.D. been in operation at any period from the time of the Wesleys, who can even conceive of the growth of the Church? But from that time till the close of the Revolution the colonies could not obtain Episcopal Orders. From that time till 1835 A.D. no Bishop could be elected, except there were in the Diocese so many clergymen and so many parishes. Georgia fully recognized the fact, and was constantly laying plans to procure a Bishop. In 1836 A.D. the Diocese asked that the House of Bishops would appoint a Bishop, and named the Rev. Edward Neufville as a suitable person. He at once prepotently declined.

At the following Convention a resolution was adopted, "that as the Diocese would soon be in a condition to elect its own Bishop, no action under it was expected."

At the following Convention a memorial was adopted asking the appointment of a Missionary Bishop, who might take charge of Dioceses without Bishops.

The following year the proposition of the Diocese of Florida, that Florida, Alabama, and Georgia should unite and elect a Bishop was made. This Diocese gladly assented to the plan.

The following year, May, 1840 A.D., the Annual Convention met in Clarksville, and having now reached the point where she was entitled to choose her own Bishop, unanimously elected Rev. Stephen Elliott, Professor of Sacred Literature in the College of South Carolina.

Of the President of that Convention and of the Bishop they elected I can only quote Bishop Stevens. Of the first (Dr. Neufville, he says, "Never have I heard our Liturgy read with more unction and effectiveness than by him, while his reading of the Bible was like an illuminated exposition of it, so exquisite were his modulations, so sweet and musical was his voice, and so just and well rendered his emphasis."

"To him the Church in Georgia owes a great debt. He was President of the Standing Committee for many years before his death, and he it was who brought forward the name of Stephen Elliott as a fit person to be the first Bishop of Georgia, thus modestly waiving his own personal claims of no ordinary character in favor of one whom he believed to be better fitted than himself for the high office." So said Bishop Elliott in the sermon preached at Dr. Neufville's funeral in Christ Church. It is known to persons now living that on the occasion of the first sermon preached by Bishop Elliott, in Savannah, when as yet Bishop Elliott was only a Deacon, Dr. Neufville said at its close, "There is the man for the first Bishop of Georgia," and he never altered that opinion.

Of Bishop Elliott, Bishop Stevens said, "But how shall I speak of the first Bishop of Georgia, Stephen Elliott? His character, like his body, was majestic and symmetrical, with manly strength and glory; it was the noble temple of a noble soul. His mind was of large calibre and cultivated with sedulous care. His eloquence was the outburst of a well-stored, well-trained intellect, pouring itself through lips not wet merely with Castalia's dew, but touched as by angel hands with coals from off the altar."

On the 28th of February, 1841 A.D., the Rt. Rev. Stephen Elliott, D.D., was consecrated the first Bishop of Georgia, in Christ Church, Savannah, by the Rt. Rev. William Meade, D.D., Bishop of Virginia, Rt. Rev. Silliman Ives, D.D., Bishop of North Carolina, and Rt. Rev. Christopher Gadsden, D.D., Bishop of South Carolina.

At the time of the election of Bishop Elliott there were in the Diocese 8 clergymen, 7 parishes, and 323 communicants, of which number 150 were communicants of Christ Church, Savannah.

The immediate effect of the consecration of Bishop Elliott, as we look back upon it, seems wonderful. In two years parishes were relieved from debt, seven new parishes admitted to the Convention, the number of communicants nearly doubled, four Deacons ordained, and a Church school endowed by a gentleman not of our communion. Of the four ordained, two are men of such high character and commanding talents that

* When the writer was candidate for orders the late Rev. Mr. Okeson came across a pamphlet copy of the life and services of this gentleman. It was a wonderful story of a life of labor and self-sacrifice and success. From that day to this the writer has tried in vain to get a copy of the pamphlet.

the Church called them to the office of Bishop in the Church of God.*

To give some idea of the state of things, I will mention that the Bishop arrived in Marietta, and first one and then another called on him, and stated that he was the only Churchman in the place. At the close of the services, the Bishop invited those who were friendly to the organization of an Episcopal Church in the place to remain. The amazement at the discovery of so many Churchmen may be imagined, it cannot be described. A Church was organized, and under the admirable management of Colonel C. F. M. Garnett, Chief Engineer of the State Road, a neat stone church (until recently the only one in the Diocese) was erected, for an amount not exceeding the cost of a wooden church.

All the bright hopes of that day have not been realized, notably in the Church school. But the Church learned to know the self-denying devotion of her Bishop, and if the people had realized the fact, what a blessing it might have been to the Diocese; as it is, every year of the Bishop's life gave new proof of the good it had done.

He lived to bury the four leading clergymen that he found in the Diocese. Each died rector of the parish in which he found him,—Dr. Neufville, of Savannah, Dr. Ford, of Augusta, Mr. Caanes, of Columbus, and Mr. Bragg, of Macon. He has left on record his tribute of love to their memories, and then, on the 21st of December, 1866 A.D., he was snatched away by death.

In 1861 A.D. the number of the clergy was 29; parishes, 23; number of communicants, 2184.

In 1867 A.D.: Clergy, 31; parishes, 28; communicants, 2141.

Let it be borne in mind that between these two dates Georgia had been desolated by war, churches burned or desecrated, congregations scattered, then recall the condition in which Bishop Elliott found the Diocese,—surely it shows how faithfully he had labored.

On the 9th of May following the Convention met in Macon, and elected Rev. John H. Beckwith, D.D., rector of Trinity Church, New Orleans, his successor. On the 2d day of April, 1868 A.D., in St. John's Church, Savannah, he was consecrated.

It now has 1 Bishop, 36 clergymen, 44 parishes, 4768 communicants, and 8 missions.

REV. W. C. WILLIAMS, D.D.

Ghost. The old English word for spirit, retained chiefly now in the title of the third person of the HOLY TRINITY,—the HOLY GHOST; the adverb "ghostly" occurs in the prayer for those to be confirmed,—“the spirit of counsel and ghostly strength.” (Vide HOLY GHOST.)

Girdle. This convenient part of the Eastern dress was also a part of the Jewish priestly dress. The High-Priest was girded with a “curious girdle,” while the Priests wore a simple linen girdle, edged with wool. The Prophets also wore a girdle of leather, as that of Elijah (2 Kings i. 8) and St. John Baptist (Matt. iii. 4), or linen (Jer. xiii. 1). The girdle for the ordinary dress was not in the same style as these, which were badges of office. The girdle was not used distinctively as a badge of office in the Church till somewhat late, and long after monachism became common. Then it was part of the monkish dress. It became a part of the vestments for the minister about the eighth century. It was used by the Bishop as part of his dress about 1202 A.D. In the Eastern Church the girdle is worn by the Priest and Bishop over the sticharion or alb, and the orarium or stole, and confines them both.

Glebe. Land given to the Church for a parson's use and for the use of the Church. According to the old English law every Church of common right is entitled to house and glebe, and the assigning of these at the first was of such absolute necessity that without them no church could be regularly consecrated. (Burn's Eccl. Law, sub voc.) After he is inducted, the freehold of the glebe is in the parson, but with these limitations: (1) He may not alienate nor exchange but upon the conditions set forth in the statutes. (2) He may not commit waste by selling wood. If the glebe has a mine on it, it may be opened, and also a true and full terrier (map) of all the glebe lands in the Diocese must be laid up in the Bishop's registry. When this country was settled, the Church, wherever it was established (as in New York and the Provinces south of it), obtained its glebes, but after the Revolution they were confiscated by the State, as in Virginia, or were lost through the weakness or carelessness of the Church, so that comparatively few parishes now retain their old glebes. But since then, to quite a number of churches have been given glebes and parsonages. It would be well that the Church should see to it in every Diocese that each parish had a parsonage, and, if possible, land attached, as a condition precedent to consecrating the church, and, too, that these glebes and parsonages were properly secured to the Church, and by Canon protected from all wastage or loss. In this matter the laity are as much interested as the clergy, since if properly and generously done it will eventually lighten the burden of support and will secure the comfort of the rector.

Gloria. The first word of two of the ascriptions used in the Prayer-Book, the Gloria Patri and the Gloria in Excelsis.

The Gloria Patri emerges first in the Arian controversy (325-384 A.D.). It was common in the East, but not in the West, and did not at first have the concluding clause, “As it was,” etc. It also varied in the preposition. St. Basil used the form Glory be to the FATHER and to the SON with the HOLY GHOST. It ran also "in the SON" and "by the SON." Basil claims Clement of Rome, Irenaeus, the Dionysii of Rome and of Alexandria, Eusebius of Caesarea, Origen, Africanus, Gregory Thaumaturgus, Firmilian, and Melito as using it in an orthodox sense. This array of names proves its Eastern origin and use. It usually ran "Glory be," but also "Glory and might" was a current form. The West received it slowly. The Council of Vaison (529 A.D.) urges the use of "As it was in the beginning," not only because the Apostolic See used it, but because the East, Africa, and Italy so used it, and, too, to meet Arian blasphemy. Practically, this Gloria was from Apostolic times. St. Polycarp's last words were, "With Whom, to Thee and the HOLY GHOST be glory now and forever. Amen" (169 A.D.). It was a most natural doxology, but its theologic bearing was not dreamt of till Arianism brought it forth to bolster up its specious reasoning, and so brought it into prominence.

* One Bishop Scott, of Oregon, the other Bishop Stevens, of Pennsylvania.

The second part dates, probably, from the middle of the fifth century. When it was used first as the Rubric now permits, after each Psalm, cannot be certainly determined, but it was at least urged upon the Gallican Church as early as 847 A.D., for about that date the false decretals contain a forged letter from Jerome to Pope Damasus, saying that the Gloria Patri in the East was sung at the end of every Psalm. However late this use might be, it soon after became the rule, and so passed into the English Prayer-Book. In the American Prayer-Book the rubric orders it only for the end of the Psalter for the day, but permits it at the end of each Psalm, and of the Venite, the Benedicite, and the other anthems of the Morning and Evening Prayer. Use has probably made it imperative at the end of the anthems. It is an antiphon which marks as it were the teaching, that however Jewish the history of each Psalm may be, yet its contents are spiritually for the whole Church throughout all time.

The Gloria in Excelsis has a similar history. Springing from the angelic hymn (St. Luke ii. 14), it grew into general use, and received additions and variation. In St. James' Liturgy only the angelic versicle is used. In nearly our present form it is found in the Alexandrine Codex of the Scripture after the Psalms, and is entitled the Morning Hymn. The only variation is in the last clause, which runs thus in the Cod. Alex.: "Thou only art holy, Thou only art the LORD JESUS CHRIST, to the glory of GOD the FATHER. Amen." A much more variant form is found at the end of the seventh Book of the Apostolic Constitutions, which may well have been current about the year 300 A.D. This has these words: "We worship Thee through the Great High-Priest, Thee who art one GOD, unbegotten, alone, unapproachable," and also, "O LORD, only-begotten Son JESUS CHRIST and HOLY SPIRIT." It closes as does the Alexandrine Version. It is not necessary here to trace the later Latin Versions. They all vary slightly. The Mozarabic Version omits the second, "Thou that takest away the sins of the world, have mercy upon us." When it was used first in the Eucharistic services it would be difficult to determine precisely, but it was before the fourth Council of Toledo (633 A.D.), which in its twelfth Canon replies to objectors.

The Gloria in Excelsis is not used in the Morning or Evening Prayer, but only in the Eucharistic service. In the American Prayer-Book it is allowed as an alternate for the Gloria Patri.

GOD. The Being and attributes of GOD is a subject that lies at the foundation of all religion, of all effective morality, and of all social order and prosperity among mankind. We may study this Being and His attributes in these displays or modes of manifestation which He has been pleased to make of Himself for our instruction and benefit, 1, in the Revelation in the Holy Scriptures; 2, in the Person of His SON our LORD JESUS CHRIST; and, 3, in Nature. This is the order in which we will pursue these topics, although in many respects the order should be somewhat different. For all persons the works of GOD are manifest in nature (Rom. i. 19, 20), even to those to whom CHRIST has not been preached and to whom no revelation has been given; and to many the Person of CHRIST and the knowledge of GOD in Him is first made known by such human agency as parents and sponsors and the ministry of the Church, and for those who cannot read this is, and must be, their main dependence. But for those who can read, the Bible itself is a source and means of knowledge which nothing else can replace, and whose place nothing else as a substitute can fill.

Turning to the Bible, and taking up its disclosures in the chronological or historical order, we find GOD first presented to us as the "Creator of all things." The narrative represents GOD as existing without beginning of days, and as having created all things out of nothing. The narrative was incidentally intended for a moral and religious rather than for any merely scientific purpose. And yet its coincidence with the results of modern, even the latest scientific, researches into the primitive condition of this material universe and its progressive development or "evolution," as some persons prefer to call it, is such as to constitute one of the most satisfactory proofs of the inspiration of its author. And very much the same remark should be made with regard to all the subsequent history in the Old Testament. It was designed rather to illustrate the nature of man and the character of GOD and "GOD's dealings with man," than to give such a history of man and of the world as men who study history from merely a human and scientific point of view would desire. And yet the recent discoveries in the valley of the Nile, in Mesopotamia, and elsewhere, wherever old monuments have been found and all old languages and inscriptions deciphered, not only confirm and illustrate the Bible statements, but derive from these statements such light and illustration as that without the Bible they would hardly be intelligible at all. And here again we have another wonderful confirmation of the facts that the Bible statements were not only written at the time they claim to have been written, but also that they were written by men who were guided in the selection of their facts and in the way of presenting them by a wisdom that was higher than their own.

But besides the fact of the oneness of God,—which excludes all idea of a polytheism,—and the representation of God as the Creator of all things, the Bible of the Old Testament seems to have been written with special reference to an exhibition of the presence of God in the world as the chief Cause and Agent of its physical affairs,—the course of nature,—and as a Moral Governor having regard always to the acts and to the moral character of men. The Jews knew but very little of what is taught in these days as “science;” they had not learned to ascribe phenomena to the agency of “laws” and “nature,” “force” and “evolution,” that can work without a God. They believed, on the other hand, and their Scriptures seemed designed to encourage the belief, that God is the chief agent, the ever-present cause in them all. He “makes the sun to rise,” He “sends the rain,” and He it is that causes “the fruitful seasons, filling the hearts of His people with joy and gladness.” And hence the Scriptures, while precluding any worship of nature and natural phenomena, taught the people to see God in all the phenomena of nature, and to be grateful to Him for whatever should come in the way of the products of the earth, of wealth, and of worldly prosperity. Nor was God represented as only a personal agent, ever at work producing these results which we now ascribe to nature, but He was represented as directing them, to some extent, with reference to the character of the people who lived in the land. It is indeed true that it is said “He maketh His sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth His rain on the just and on the unjust.” There is some law and uniformity with disregard of character to some extent, but yet He is often spoken of as sending the caterpillar and the locust, as shutting up the windows of heaven so that there should be no rain, of sending the frost or of withholding the dew, of giving health or sending pestilence; so that there could be no occasion or excuse for men’s forgetting that God is the One “from whom cometh every good and perfect gift,” all the blessings we enjoy or can hope for. The passage just cited from the Sermon on the Mount was, of course, of a later date than the teachings of the Old Testament. It was after men had observed something of the uniformity of nature, and seems to have been said by way of meeting objections to the teaching of the Bible, which may have even then grown up out of such observations, and of too hasty generalizations from what had been observed. We shall recur to this topic farther on in this article.

But the higher object in treating of the subject was doubtless the character of God as the Moral Governor of the world. Here we find impressed upon the Jewish mind the idea of sin as something wrong in itself, and something offensive to God; not merely as displeasing to Him on personal grounds,—if we may so speak of it,—but as offensive because it is wrong, unjust, and inconsistent with the character of men and the nature of things. The Old Testament represents God as holy and righteous in all His ways, so that if men had offended or displeased Him it was because they had done wrong,—had done something that was intrinsically wrong, something that He had forbidden because it was wrong; and, as a consequence, they felt, when they suffered remorse, the loss of happiness and of prosperity, not only that they had lost His favor, but that the fault was wholly their own. He was, in their estimation, none the less, but rather the more, righteous because He was angry at their sins and punished them, if not as their demerits deserved, yet so as to impress them with a sense of the awful and all-destroying nature of sin and transgression. So far did this go that it seemed to them that there could be no extreme of folly and of wickedness beyond that of the “condemnation” of God which was implied in any attempt to justify themselves, or to proclaim that they were innocent while they were suffering from what was apparently a chastisement from Him (Job xl. 8-10).

If, therefore, there is any one thing which is set forward in the Old Testament with more emphasis and variety of iteration than any other as exhibiting the attributes of God, after representing Him as Creator, it would seem to be the presentation of His character as Moral Governor. Even in nature, the inanimate world, He is represented as “ordering all things for good to them that love Him,” so far as it is possible without destroying all sense of uniformity and ground of dependence on the constitution of nature; without, in short, taking away all ground and basis for scientific knowledge. But in the moral world there is no such limit or necessity for limitation. In the heart and consciousness of each, one God can deal with justice and in accordance with the ends of the individual himself. He can send remorse or can give relief,—a sense and assurance of forgiveness and favor as to Him shall seem best for the spiritual good of His creatures. And if we are shown that God can and does guide His faithful servants with special inward manifestations of His will, guiding them to the thing they should do if they would do His will, we see, also, that He can overrule the acts and purposes of the wicked to accomplish His designs. We see many examples of this in the Old Testament. The envy of Joseph's brethren was made by the overruling providence of God the means of providing for the posterity of Jacob in Egypt. The obstinacy and cruelty of Pharaoh were used as a means of uniting the chosen people and making so strong their determination to go where alone they could be settled, as a means of accomplishing the far-off purpose of the birth in Bethlehem. But we have in the words of the Prophet Isaiah the fullest disclosure of this attribute of God. The Jews had greatly departed from God, and He warns them, "What will ye do in the day of visitation, and in the desolation that shall come upon you?" Then He refers to the King of Assyria, and says, "I will send him against a hypocritical nation, and against the people of My wrath. . . . Howbeit he meaneth not so, neither doth his heart think so; but it is in his heart to destroy and cut off nations not a few" (Is. x. 3-8).

In all the Old Testament the justice of God is made more conspicuous than His love and compassion, though these latter attributes are by no means overlooked and concealed. It was necessary for man to feel first and to learn first to regard God as just—a Being who would by no means allow the guilty to go unpunished—before they would appreciate His mercy and forbearance, when in the exercise of this love He should show these favors to men.

Another view of God's character is disclosed in the Old Testament. Although represented as perfectly holy, He is represented as exercising forbearance towards some of the evil institutions of man, so that the deeper principles of his moral government might take a deeper root and work a more complete renovation of human nature. Of this we see illustrations in His dealings with two of the institutions that have prevailed so extensively in human history, as to show their deep seat in the passions and propensities of the human heart. Human slavery had existed in some form in nearly, if not quite every, branch of the human family before history began, or historic records and monuments were left to show what transpires in the earliest ages of man's existence. Another great evil had an early origin, and has shown great tenacity in its grasp upon society,—polygamy. It is usually attended with easy divorce, on the part of the husband at least. The whole tenor of the Jewish Dispensation and legislation is such as to show that in God's esteem these institutions are both wrong and of evil tendency. But while prohibiting peremptorily idolatry and the unbelief in other gods than the one eternal JEHOVAH, and such gross sins as intemperance and adultery, God did tolerate and allow slavery and easy divorce among His ancient covenant people. He had taught principles and instituted a spiritual discipline that would inevitably outroot them in the course of time,—principles and a discipline that would lead the people to see and realize that they were evil and wrong, and abandon or abolish them voluntarily. Easy divorce and polygamy were peremptorily prohibited in the Christian Dispensation; and we have seen only in these latter days the sentiment of a Christian world making its last struggles against the other.

In all this God seems to have acted upon the policy which we often express in the words "we must take men as we find them," adding thereto the other principle without which the one just stated becomes a means of demoralization and may be used as a justification of anything however bad,—namely, that while we must take them as we find them, we must also adopt our policy and method of dealing with them so as to make them, in due time, what we would have them to be. This policy adopted and persisted in as the dealings of God with man as manifested in both Testaments, shows what was so explicitly affirmed of our Lord in the New Testament, "He knew what was in man." Man cannot be made holy off-hand, nor by miracle, nor by God's working alone in his nature; only by man's own efforts, each one for himself co-operating with the Divine influences. To this end God has revealed truths and doctrines for them. He has commanded duties and He has instituted ordinances, in the observance of which they would grow in grace and in conformity to the will of God.

But in the New Testament we have a fuller exhibition of the attributes of God, and more especially of His love. St. John says, "The Law came by Moses,—grace and truth came by JESUS CHRIST" (ch. i. 17), and, more fully, "God so loved the world, that He gave His only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life" (iii. 16).

The mystery of the Incarnation no finite mind may expect to fully understand. But this is a declaration of our Lord to His disciples that is so fully to our present purpose, that it must form the basis for the teaching upon this part of our subject. In the fourteenth chapter of St. John's Gospel our Lord saith, "Let not your heart be troubled; ye believe in God, believe also in Me." These words were uttered in view of His departure from them by His crucifixion, and when their faith would be subjected thereby to the severest test. Our Lord assumes their abiding and unquenchable faith in God the FATHER, and encourages them to continue to have faith in Him, notwithstanding the adverse events about to occur. But Philip seems to have had some doubt about the FATHER as well, and said to the Lord, "Show us the FATHER and it sufficeth us." If we could only see God it would all be well. We could feel sure that however adverse the indications for the future, all would come out right in the end. Our LORD's reply is worthy of special notice. "JESUS saith unto him, Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known Me, Philip? He that hath seen Me hath seen the FATHER; and how sayest thou then, Show us the FATHER? Believest thou not that I am in the FATHER and the FATHER in me? The words that I speak unto you, I speak not of Myself: but the FATHER that dwelleth in Me, He doeth the works. Believe Me that I am in the Father, and the Father in Me."

As we have said, the mystery of the Incarnation no one can pretend to understand and comprehend so as to say how these things may be; but still we have the fullest and most emphatic assurance that we may take our LORD, His words, and His works, as the fullest exhibition of the attributes of God that we can possibly have. God we cannot see. He is like the wind; it bloweth where it listeth and we hear the sound thereof, but the wind itself we cannot see. We look at the trees and the grain bowing, and we know that the wind is blowing. And so in nature, the more closely we scan its phenomena and study into its secret processes, the more surely we see that God is there, although Him we see not nor can see. Philip, therefore, while asking a perfectly natural question, must be regarded as having asked a privilege that cannot be granted in the sense in which he hoped it might be, and in which the skeptic and unbelieving mind is always asking to have God's existence and presence made manifest to him. But for all practical purposes of faith, of holy living, he that hath seen the Son hath seen the FATHER also. For the FATHER was in the Son, spake by Him, acted in Him, and was in Him reconciling the world unto Himself (2 Cor. v. 19).

For all the purposes of faith, of obedience, of love, of trust, it sufficeth us, therefore, to know and study the words of CHRIST, the Son of God. We have, then, several groups of works and words that may be considered as each teaching something of the attributes of God. We may take the miracles of (1) turning the water into wine (St. John ii. 6 sq.); (2) that of feeding the multitudes by a miraculous increase of the loaves and fishes (St. Matt. xiv. 17; xv. 34; xvi. 9, 10; St. Mark vi. 52; St. John vi. 9 sq.); (3) that of stilling the waves (St. Matt. viii. 23-27; St. Mark iv. 39), as showing His presence in and power over the phenomena of nature as taught in the Old Testament. These miracles are enough to show that He can and does, in fact, so control the elements and the phenomena of nature that He can give fruitful seasons and avert the pestilence when it pleases Him so to do; enough to show that we can place the most implicit confidence in Him in regard to all our worldly affairs, and go on in the way of duty which He has laid down,—not in the way we may have chosen as that of duty regardless of His commands,—and leave results to Him. If we turn to consider another group of the miracles, we find another truth equally assuring to our faith. We refer to the miracles of healing. Disease and infirmity were then, as they are now, when rightly considered, regarded as results of the fall of man and the transgressions of God's laws; although, as our LORD has taught us, we must not in all cases consider disease or misfortune as a result of some transgression by the sufferer. We inherit the consequences of the sins of our ancestors, and often the child is sickly, blind, dumb, or idiotic because of inherited disease from some ancestral sin. Now, our LORD came especially to be a Divine deliverer from sin and its consequences. Hence in these miracles of healing He showed His power to do what He claimed to have come into the world to do. Not only could He forgive sins and restore peace to the troubled conscience, but He wrought miracles expressly, as He Himself assures us, that we might know that the Son of Man hath power on earth to forgive sins (St. Matt. ix. 6; St. Mark ii. 10; St. Luke v. 24), and we read, "the multitudes saw it and glorified God that He had given such power unto men," or perhaps we might render it, "such power to be exercised among men."

Another group of miracles, "the casting out of devils," raises a question which we need not discuss. There is a tendency in modern times to regard these "possessions" as only forms of epilepsy or insanity. But in any view, their cure was a manifestation of God's power over all the influences of evil to which man may be subjected, of whatever nature they may be. And, finally, in the raising of the dead, of which we have several examples, we have a manifestation of His power to deliver us from all the evil that men can do to our bodies, even from the embrace and sleep of death. And His own resurrection, after His crucifixion and sleep of three days in the grave, carries this exhibition of His powers and purpose to the very highest point,—a manifestation of self-inherent powers of the highest kind, of a power that makes all things else powerless in the comparison.

As a manifestation of God's love for man, though a most conspicuous and important part of our LORD's acts, we shall say but little. The whole is summed up in the words of St. John (iii. 16), "God so loved the world that He gave His only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life." And the intensity of this love and what it cost to exercise it and make it effectual for man is shown in the history of the betrayal, the agony of Gethsemane, the shame of the Judgment Hall, and the ignominy and suffering of Calvary. These are enough to show that there is nothing that Wisdom can invent, Love suggest, or Power execute that God will not do for the welfare and salvation of man. They show, indeed, as does also the whole tenor of Scripture, that there is something that man must do himself and for himself, or God can do nothing for him; but they show that there is nothing that can be done that God will not do (1) to guide us in the right way if we will consent to be guided by Him; (2) to save us from pain if we will do what we can to avoid the sin that brings pain and woe to men; (3) to deliver us from the punishment which we deserve, if we will only repent of the evil ways and deeds that have made us deserving of punishment; and (4) to raise us to a higher life in this world and to eternal life in the next if we will only accept the guidance which He has provided for us in His Church,—guidance by the HOLY SPIRIT within and guidance by His Word in our hands; guidance by His ministry, with whom He has promised to be always, even unto the end of the world, and the helps of sacraments, holy meditations, prayer and worship, fellowship and co-operating sympathy which come from membership in His Church, which is His Body and organized means of regenerating the world, when we become co-workers and fellow-helpers with Him in bringing men to see the truth and to be transformed and conformed to His glorious image and spotless character.

But there is a disposition in these latter days to doubt or deny the miracles. Without the miracles CHRIST could be no manifestation of God. A wise teacher and a good, earnest friend He might indeed be, but without the miracles He could be no manifestation of the presence and attributes of God. We have the Gospels written at the time and by the men who saw Him in person, heard His words, words which He spake as never man spake (St. John vii. 46),—this was the admission of His enemies,—and did works no man could do except God were with him (St. John iii. 2), which was the admission of a doubter. It was indeed a credulous and an uncritical age, in which the belief in miracles and impostures of all kinds was prevalent, but there was something about our LORD's miracles that took them out of the common run of extraordinary and unexplainable acts. Not all the persons who saw or knew of His miracles were inclined to believe in Him or in them. His miracles were peculiar and had a meaning that would not allow them to pass unnoticed or unchallenged. If they were true, He was GOD, the very LORD of heaven and of earth, and all must obey Him or perish beneath His displeasure. There was no middle ground and no possibility of compromise in the case. All persons saw and felt the emergency and the necessity of giving heed to what was being done. They saw that if what He said was true, and if the works He performed were really performed, there could be no doubting that His words were true. They saw that not only were they great sinners and in danger of God's wrath, but they feared that if they let Him alone and allowed Him to go on in the performance of such works, He would draw all the people after Him, and "the Romans would come and take away their place and nation" (St. John ix. 48). They saw the full import of His miracles,—they foresaw all that they portended,—and they jealously scrutinized them. When our LORD had given sight to one born blind, "the neighbors and they which had known him that had been healed" came together to inquire into the miracle. They could not deny it, nor could they explain it. The Pharisees accused Him of breaking the Sabbath, and the Jews regarded Him as a "sinner," and threatened to cast both JESUS and the man out of the synagogue. But after the closest scrutiny they could not deny the miracle, and the young man, though he could not tell how it was done, insisted that "since the world began it was not heard that any mere man opened the eyes of one that had been born blind." Miracles and wonders doubtless had been wrought in great profusion, but the opening of the eyes of one that had been born blind, by a mere man, had never been heard of,—therefore, if this man were not of God, He could do no such thing" (St. John ix. 33). They could not answer Him on this point, except by saying, "Thou was altogether born in sins, and dost thou presume to dictate to us? and they cast him out."

We have another notable and very instructive instance in the Acts of the Apostles (ch. iii.). SS. Peter and John had healed a man that was lame from his birth; the matter came before the great Council—the Sanhedrin—for investigation. After all that could be done by way of scrutiny and with the most earnest desire to deny the miracle if they could, they were at a loss what to do; but they admitted "that indeed a notable miracle had been wrought is manifest to all them that dwell in Jerusalem, and we cannot deny it" (Acts iv. 16). But they clearly foresaw the consequences of these miracles, in the influence they would exert on the opinions and actions of the people.

We have proof, however, that the miracles were wrought by our LORD and His Apostles outside of, and totally independent of, the Holy Scriptures. We have in the remains of the first century of Christianity fragments of the works that were written by the enemies of Christianity. The Christian writers claimed miracles, and therefore did not deny that miracles had been wrought. Their line of argument was to deny that they were proof of the Divine presence and powers of CHRIST.

Let us examine for a moment the one great miracle,—the Resurrection of our LORD. That the Apostles and the hundreds of others who had seen him after His resurrection believed in its occurrence admits of no doubt. But did the unbelievers deny the fact? Let us look into the Scriptures themselves and see how they treated the matter. First we have them betraying their fear that He would rise. As soon as they were sure that He was dead they went unto Pilate and said, "Sir, we remember that that deceiver said while He was yet alive, 'After three days I will arise again'" (St. Matt. xxvii. 63). And they secured a guard to protect the tomb "lest His disciples come by night and steal Him away and say that He is risen." But after the resurrection we do not find them denying or attempting to deny the fact. But they do persuade the soldiers to lie about it; they gave them large money to say "that His disciples had come by night and stole Him away" (St. Matt. xxviii. 12, 13). Again, after the great forty days, the matter came up once more for investigation and scrutiny. Our LORD had appeared on several occasions after His resurrection. He had even ascended into heaven in the presence of a great multitude; the lie of the soldiers had proved ineffectual; the Apostles and other believers proclaimed the fact, and "the authorities," who saw that for them everything for this world and for the next was at stake, if the Gospel were true and should be believed, were stimulated to their utmost. Denial did not occur to them as possible, that was out of the question. And so that it should spread no farther among the people they straitly threatened the Apostles. They called the Apostles Peter and John, and commanded them not to speak or teach at all in the name of JESUS or about His doctrine and resurrection (Acts iv. 17 sq.). But the Apostles still continued with great power to give witness to the resurrection. But there was no denial or attempt, so far as we are informed, at denial, and there and then, the very best thing possible, if possible at all,—the denial of the fact of the miracles, and of the greatest of them all—the Resurrection—the enemies of the Gospel did not venture to do. The miracles were, indeed, "notable," known to all men, and they as they confessed could not deny it.

What occurred in the Apostolic age, and is recorded for us in Holy Scripture, was continued for several centuries, until unbelievers outside the Church had ceased to exist. We have many fragments—no whole treatise—of these deniers and unbelievers; fragments preserved in the writings of the Christians who wrote to answer the objections and vindicate Christianity from their attacks and objections. But nowhere and never does there appear a denial of the fact that the miracles were wrought as represented and claimed in the Gospels. We cite but one example out of many and show how the apologists treated this branch of their subject. We cite what is known as "The Recognitions of Clement." It is a work of an early date, but of unknown authorship. It was written in Greek, but soon was translated into Latin, and was, perhaps, more extensively read and more widely influential in the earliest centuries than any other book. It purports to give an account of St. Peter as preaching the Gospel and meeting the objections of unbelievers and adversaries. The account purports to have been given by the Clement who is spoken of by St. Paul (Phil. iv. 3), and who afterwards became the first Bishop of Rome. Of course it is a picture, and nobody supposes it to have been intended to be anything else. It was intended to represent St. Peter as he was then understood to have been as a preacher of the Gospel,—as a modern novelist writes his work of fiction to illustrate parts of history,—and the way and the extent to which it was received and the estimation in which it was held at that early period is a sure proof of its trustworthiness in the matter for which we cite it; that is, we do not suppose that any such scene occurred or that the very words were actually used by St. Peter, but only that such was the way in which it was understood at the time that he would have treated the subject. And it was on the whole the way in which the apologists of that day did treat it.

One Nicetas asks St. Peter how he was to discriminate the true miracle from the false; how to distinguish between those wrought by our LORD and His Apostles and those that were wrought by such persons as Simon Magus; and why he should believe Christianity on account of the miracles and not accede to the claims of the impostors. St. Peter says, as his starting-point, that this is an instinct or insight in all good men, who want to distinguish between truth and falsehood, right or wrong, which enables them to do so, and that this applies to the true and the false miracles as well as to anything else (ch. iii.). But often, he says, the false miracles are senseless and do no good to anybody, such as "showing statues walking, dogs of brass or stone barking, mountains dancing, of flying through the air, and such like things." But "those miracles which were wrought by the good One are directed to the benefit of men, such as those performed by our dear LORD, who gave sight to the blind and hearing to the deaf, raised up the feeble and the lame, and drove away sickness, cast out demons and raised the dead, and did such others like things as you see we do" (ch. ix.). Here is no intimation of a doubt that the miracles were performed, but only a question as to the proper view or explanation of them, which were claimed to have been performed by persons who had no divine mission and were laboring to no good end. But it is claimed that the miracles if they were indeed wrought as claimed are no proof of the truth of Christianity. Says Matthew Arnold, "I do not see how the fact that I could perform the miracle of converting the pen with which I am writing into paper would prove the truth of what I am writing." But we may answer, it depends very much on what you are writing. If you are saying that pens can be converted into paper, and claiming that you can perform the miracle of so transforming them, the act of so transforming your pen into paper would be the best proof you could give of the truth of what you are teaching, and of your power to do what you claim to be able to do. So precisely with our LORD and His miracles. He claimed to be the SAVIOUR of the world and the Deliverer of men. He wrought miracles of deliverance and salvation. He promised to raise men from death and the grave, and He not only raised others but He raised Himself. His miracles might not prove a truth of Mathematics or of Natural Science. But they did prove Him to be what He claimed to be, a SAVIOUR, the SAVIOUR of men; "mighty" and able to save. They showed Him to be God, as doing that which God alone can do, thus giving us our highest ideal of perfect or infinite wisdom and power, and of infinite goodness as well. Considering, then, our LORD as an incarnation of God, the infinite and Eternal Being, who is without being, or days, or end of years, to whom all things are present and all thoughts are known, the eternal and One who because of His very nature as infinite and eternal can speak in the present tense of whatever was, is, or is to come, in relation to men and the events of time, we have a manifestation of God, one in whom dwelt "all the fullness of God," a complete manifestation of His character and attributes.

But in these latter days there are those who doubt whether the miracles were performed, and who in consequence would reduce our LORD to be a mere man. For without the miracles, and especially the greatest,—the Incarnation and the Resurrection,—we have in Him no such manifestation of the Divine nature and attributes as will enable us to accept them without question and verification by comparison with something else. If God was in Him, spake in His words and acted in His acts, then we have God by these words and acts as we know any one of our fellow-men by what he says and does. Words and acts manifest the mind, the man that is in the body. The attitude of men towards the miracles in these latter days is, however, reversed from what it was at first. Our LORD could say, "believe Me for the very work's sake." He made miracles the ground of faith and of belief, and on this ground the Apostles and first preachers of Christianity challenged the belief of those whom they addressed, and by so doing they converted the world to CHRIST and Christianity. But in these days men doubt the miracles, and there is an important sense in which they believe not Christianity for the sake of the miracles, but the miracles (if they believe them at all) for the sake of Christianity. That is, Christianity so commends itself to our judgments, and has wrought such good in the world, that we are ready to regard it as having had an origin that is above anything that is merely human, and as worthy of a Divine origin and the interposition of God by miracles. Nothing but the worthiness of the occasion can induce us to believe in any such extraordinary occurrences.

Nor can it be doubted that the great amount of attention that has been given to the natural sciences has done much to render men skeptical in regard to the reality and the possibility of miracles, and to make them disinclined to believe that any have been wrought. A deeper view of nature will be sure to dispel this illusion. There is no comprehending nature without the recognition of God as a miracle-worker. This world and all the material universe, so far as we know it, is undergoing a change,—is in process of evolution or development, which must have begun in time, and which, therefore, points to a time when it was not. If even matter existed then, it was in a diffused gaseous state, without chemical combinations or organizations, and the masses that now constitute the sun and stars, our earth and its moon included, sustained no such relation to each other as they do now, and have sustained for a few millions of years past. Who or what was before this? It may, indeed, be a piece of mechanism, like a watch which now runs of itself. But there was a time when the brass, steel, and gold of the watch did not exist in their present relation, and even now it is no example of perpetual motion. The watch runs and keeps time only as it is wound up by a power that is not a mere piece of mechanism,—something totally unlike mechanism,—by some intelligent person. Evolution—a theory that is now in great favor—is but a process. It is no adequate explanation of anything. It had a beginning; it must come to an end. It has a subject-matter to work upon that it did not create and cannot destroy. It had a beginning which it did not originate, and it is under a law which it did not ordain, and it will come to an end, when whatever is eternal in its nature will continue on as though evolution had never begun; to an end when all that is in its course or compass must either be wound up again like a watch or stand still in an endless condemnation of matter forever. But with God as its Author and Creator of its subject-matter, with His will as its limit and its law, and His purpose as the explanation of whatever has been, now is, or shall be in the course of mundane affairs, all is intelligible. But God as the Beginner was a miracle-worker, and every interposition of His power to produce a new order of things or to originate a new era is a miracle. Of such interventions we can mention several that no scientific man can doubt. There was a beginning of chemical action, of condensation, and of motion. At a time not far in the past, comparatively, there was another interposition, when some of the elements became living matter,—plants and animals,—with the hitherto unknown phenomena of growth and reproduction of decay and death. And so, too, all researches have thus far failed to find any way to account for the introduction of the new species of plants and animals which have followed each other in the successions of geological time, until at last, and quite recently, man made his appearance, without special Divine interposition in each case. In the present state of our scientific knowledge they are as undeniable as they are unexplainable without a recognition of Divine interposition,—which is as miraculous in its nature as the introduction of Christianity, including the Incarnation and the Resurrection with all the miracles that are ascribed to our LORD. Science justifies our belief in the miracles of Revelation. This clear justification must be urged, since great efforts are made to find a theory of evolution or development that shall explain all without a recognition of Divine power. And thus nature and its interpreted science justifies and vindicates our acceptance of the Bible as the Word of God,—as a manifestation of His nature and attributes.

Having once proved from mere inanimate nature, from the nature of matter that there must have been, and must still be, something that is above nature, something that is spiritual in its nature, nay, something that is a Personal Agent and Creator, the phenomena of the material universe become a manifestation of the attributes and will of God. Not only does nature, considered as the work of His hands, show His wisdom in planning it and His power and omnipresence in executing His plans and in carrying on its course of events, its evolutions, but its phenomena everywhere show His purpose as well as by the principle of what we call final causes. Thus a watch or any other piece of mechanism shows not only the skill and physical strength of the maker, but it shows also that he had a purpose, a design, a final cause in planning and making the mechanism. As we consider the movements of the hands and study its internal structure, we cannot doubt that the maker of a watch designed that by the continuance and regularity of its movements it should indicate the passage of time as truly as the sun and the stars indicate the same fact by their motions, and far more conveniently for our use. In this view, any fact or phenomena of nature, every law or truth of science, is an expression of God's will and purpose in nature, as truly as any fact of sacred history and any command or duty is an indication of His will and purpose in history and in the affairs of man. Whatever occurs in nature or in history, in the phenomena of the natural world or in the life of man, is indicative of the way in which He would have things done by man, and those creatures of His hand who can understand His laws and choose for themselves what they will do, and whether they will do right or wrong. Even whatever is painful and adverse to our wishes must be regarded as a proof of those remedial measures by which He would either prevent wrong-doing or obviate its evil consequences. Hence not only the more striking and remarkable indications of design and adaptation of means to ends, but the more uniform and regular of natural phenomena are indications of the way in which He would have things done, and proofs of His wisdom and power. And the more perfectly regular and uniform they are, the better do they indicate His wisdom and power, just as in human works the perfection of the machinery and the completeness and the certainty with which it accomplishes what it was designed for, the greater skill does it show in the designer and maker of the machine. The law of gravity explains God's will in the universe of matter as truly as the law of love expresses that will in the world of social being, and the fact that they fall—atoms and masses—proves His presence and agency as truly, though not as strikingly, as the miracles that are recorded in the New Testament. It is worthy of note that in nature the two attributes of wisdom and power are more conspicuously manifested. Love, benevolence, or goodness, are indeed the predominance of happiness over misery and suffering. But the extent and amount of suffering has led some persons to doubt whether nature alone, and by itself, shows that His goodness or love is infinite, or without limit, or admixture of some feeling of a different nature. "We cannot," say the objectors, "see why there should be suffering at all, or if any, why there should be so much, or why it should be seen so often when there can be no offense in the sufferer to occasion it, nor any apparent benefit to make it a means of greater happiness." But we must remember that we can at best understand the matter only imperfectly; and especially that, to judge of God's dealings and of His works as indicative of His attributes, we must not neglect to take into account what He has done by way of Revelation, and especially by sending His SON to be a way and a means of salvation. This is a part of His work, and is necessary to a full manifestation of His attributes of goodness, love, and mercy, and they do manifest them as no other acts of His have done or can do.

The "New Philosophy," as it is sometimes called, has helped our natural theology in several ways. While there are, indeed, some men of peculiarly constituted minds who have taken extreme views and thought that nature was comprehensible without God, the general tendency has been—and the final result will be—to give greater distinction and sharper outlines to the facts and principles of scenes which make the presence and agency of GOD more manifest and incapable of doubt or denial than it was before. We know now more precisely what we can ascribe to matter and the forces of nature, and just where the agency of God comes in, than we did a few years ago. He must have begun the present "evolution," and He must have interposed specially and by way of miracle many times since; and even the "forces of nature," to which as to second causes we are accustomed to ascribe the phenomena of nature, are seen to be nothing without Him. We have seen that "evolution" cannot be eternal, and a world of mere matter without God could no more go on forever through a series of successive evolutions than a watch could run forever without being repeatedly wound up.

We have alluded to the flood of light the recent attainments in science have thrown upon the concise and rather obscure statements in the first chapter of Genesis. But there are many other statements and profound principles in the Bible which these illustrate, and to which they give a new meaning or a fullness of meaning which had not before been recognized. We have been accustomed to regard God's action in nature as ending on the "sixth day." But our LORD said, "My FATHER worketh hitherto, and I work (St. John v. 17). Hitherto, "until now," God worked in creating, until the appearance of man. He worked in history and in providence from this creation until the birth of CHRIST, and He in CHRIST works now, and has wrought ever since the Incarnation, "in the regeneration" (St. Matt. xix. 18). In this stage of His work, and to accomplish it, the WORD became incarnate, suffered on the Cross, instituted His Church, with its Worship and Sacraments, its Ministry and Discipline, and for this He sent the HOLY GHOST to lead His disciples and His people "unto all truth," and for this and by way of carrying it on, He from that day to this has called and sent holy men as ministers, evangelists, and missionaries of His word. (Eph. iv. 12, 13.) Again, the students of nature and natural science claim to have found as one of God's Laws what they call "the struggle for life, with survival of the fittest." In view of this Law, anything in nature is considered as having a desire to prolong its existence, and laboring under the necessity, in order to do so, of continued exertion and of avoiding the enemies which otherwise would terminate its existence. And if we suppose any change in circumstances or environment, the one that has the greatest capacity or willingness to adapt itself to the new conditions is most likely to live, is "fittest to survive" under the circumstances. And in both these ways, it is held, the natural species are undergoing changes which are, on the whole, with few exceptions, in the direction of improvement and advance towards a higher type or a higher mode of life. In this way it is held that one branch of the human family, by migrations from the original centres and encountering on its way new environments and new climates, has become red like the Mongolians, another black like the negroes, while in Europe the race has advanced in stature, size of brain, and other physical conditions which give opportunity for a higher civilization. Now our LORD in the Sermon on the Mount announced this law as pertaining to nations, religions, and institutions, of society and of civilization, under the symbol of trees: good trees bringing forth good fruit, and bad trees that cannot bring forth good fruit, but are hewn down and cast into the fire (St. Matt. vii.). This is but history. Whatever is doing the will of God and is accomplishing His purposes is spared, and is a success so long as it is needed and does His work. But success does not always imply godliness. The worst of men and the most ferocious of tyrants have sometimes been successful. But they were executing the will of God upon those who were not doing His will or regardless of His laws. They are made to clear away the obstacles to the accomplishment of His plans, to bury the dead, remove the offal, and consign to oblivion the institutions of evil. Our LORD could not have been betrayed and crucified—as it was foretold He should be, and as it was needful for the shedding of His most precious blood that taketh away the sin of the world—if there had not been a heartless traitor and a still more heartless rabble to execute the purpose. It is doubtful whether the early converts to Christianity would have been sufficiently impressed with the nature and value of Christianity if it had not been for the violence of its persecutors, giving occasion for confession and for martyrdom. Judaism and the Jewish nation lasted as long as it and they were preparing for the coming of CHRIST. But when they failed to do God's work they became an evil tree, —and the Romans, who certainly were no better in most respects than the Jews, did God's work, drove them from their homes and destroyed their city. They live, although scattered, despised, and persecuted, because they are doing one part of God's work as no other people or agency could do it.

But the other people of that age who did not accept the Gospel have passed away, and all their religious and their political institutions, their philosophies, and whatever else was a means of influencing the lives of men. Within a few centuries after the introduction of Christianity there were no heathen or unconverted peoples or families within the domain of what was then the civilized world. Fix your attention upon any family, village, or neighborhood of people as it was then, and ask yourself what has become of their posterity, and you will find that many were converted and brought into the Church, and the rest of them, if indeed any were not converted, became extinct, leaving neither name nor descendants. So with doctrines, usages, and institutions within the Church, whether good or bad, they come in when there is occasion for them or work for them to do, stay as long as they are needed for their work, and that is forever if they are intrinsically good, but if they are or become bad, they are like the evil tree that no longer bringing forth good fruit, is cut down and cast into the fire. The matter is sometimes treated as though our LORD in these words was giving a test for the characters of men. But this can hardly have been His purpose. The context clearly shows that He had something else in mind, and the view we have taken of it points to history as a manifestation of God's purposes and attributes, no less than the phenomena of nature. And in fact history exhibits some of His attributes—His benevolence, His love, His personality—better than mere inanimate nature or even the animal creation can do. In mere nature there is nothing to resist or to counteract His will; hence with infinite wisdom and power there may be, as we see that there is, perfect uniformity, and this observed uniformity has been urged by objectors and skeptics as a reason for denying the personality of God. But in history we have human beings with a power of choice of their own. And here it is that we find God apparently changing His purposes,—changing at any rate His means,—His more immediate purposes to suit man's wants and condition. When man repents God relents. Under the Old Dispensation He allowed many things on account of the hardness of their hearts which He absolutely prohibited in the New. Thus animal sacrifices and bloody offerings were not merely accepted, they were commanded; they served a transient purpose; when the atonement was "once made for the sins of the whole world," all forms of bloody offerings passed away and gave place to something far more spiritual,—something adapted to a higher state of civilization, a more elevated phase of life and habit of thought. For the same reason many things that seem cruel, harsh, even unjust, appear to have been allowed and approved by God in the earlier days of humanity, which are now seen to be inconsistent with Christianity, if they are not expressly forbidden in the New Testament Scriptures. In all this we see how it is that God may be a being of perfect holiness and yet tolerate, and for a while appear to approve what we can now see to be wrong. His holiness will appear in the end to all men.

It is indeed quite true that we find in the Bible many statements with regard to God which we cannot take literally or regard as adapted to the higher views which the more cultivated minds of modern times are able to accept. But we must remember that God deals with men as they are and according to their needs. He takes them as they are in order to secure the acceptance of the means that are necessary to make them what He would have them to be. We must remember that He is a Person incomprehensible in His nature and modes of existence, but yet we are so made in His image that we can in a measure understand Him although we do not and cannot conceive of Him under forms and modes that are, more or less, inadequate, because they are too much like those of men. But in this respect all men are essentially alike, we differ in degree only. From the feeblest infancy of the lisping child up to the broadest powers of comprehension ever attained by saint or scientist we think of Him to some extent as acting under limitations of time and space, of human weakness and infirmity which we can readily show can have no place in the Divine Nature. Something of this kind is necessary in God's dealings with man in order to give a sense of reality to our ideas of Him and to make His name a power upon our thoughts and feelings. Abstractly, the Personality of God is incomprehensible to us, and practically it is a different thing for each individual because of our infirmity, so that no one can understand or comprehend Him perfectly. Let us begin by regarding Him as wise and good and holy, and as we progress in wisdom and holiness our ideas of Him and His attributes will advance towards that fuller comprehension of His Being which we may always approach but never fully reach unto. But in all stages of our culture we may know that He is not only God and Creator, but Father and Friend as well. A Father and a Friend who never slumbers, nor sleeps, who faints not and is never weary, and whose mercies never fail.

Gospels. The word itself means good tidings, "godspell," and in its comprehensiveness includes the several parts of the Redemptive Acts of our LORD. "Behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people," was the Gospel of the Incarnation of CHRIST. Again, St. Paul (Rom. x. 9-15) connects the good tidings with the belief in and confession of the Resurrection. The LORD Himself makes the Gospel to lie in a belief in the Kingdom of God (St. Mark i. 15). Each of the main facts of the Gospel in its fullness can become the central point which may bear the title belonging to the whole. The Gospel, then, is the message of the Church, the teaching of Christianity, the redemption in and by CHRIST JESUS, the only-begotten Son of God, offered to all mankind. But it is the title of the four biographies of the LORD JESUS by four separate writers, two of whom were Apostles, two others companions and fellow-workers with other Apostles of the LORD. But the title is again suggestive. It is the "Gospel—the glad tidings of salvation according to" St. Matthew, St. Mark, St. Luke, or St. John. And as the Gospel is bound up in the very life of CHRIST, His biography and the record of His acts, and the proclamation of what He has to offer the soul, are all gathered into the single word, "The Gospel."

Again, the word is used to mean that part of the record of His life, teaching, and actions which is selected to be read on each Sunday, holiday, or fast-day. There are, then, three uses made of the one word,—the Gospel for the whole doctrine of Christianity in the salvation offered by the SON of GOD; the four several accounts of His life; the short passages read in the Eucharistic Scriptures.

The accounts of the several Gospels will be given under the names of the several writers (Vide ST. MATTHEW, ST. MARK, ST. LUKE, ST. JOHN), but here it will be well to consider them as grouped together in a common work,—i.e., to set forth the glorious Gospel of the SON of GOD. The first three are generally spoken of as the Synoptists,—i.e., those who give an abbreviated account, a synopsis of the LORD's Life. The Gospel of St. John has received, in recent discussions, the title of the Fourth Gospel. Indeed, the three Synoptists have much more in common with each other than they have with the Gospel of St. John. The dates of the composition of their Gospels are closer together. St. John's Gospel is nearly half a century apart from them. They wrote before heresies and internal dissensions had to any extent disturbed the Church, which was girded up to meet her early foes. St. John's Gospel was written when heresies had begun; when they who were once within, but not of, the Church had gone out. There was an intensely practical realization of His work. A man among men as well as the Son of GOD. The anointed JESUS who was King of Israel. The great High-Priest, and the Sacrifice for the sins of the whole world. His was as intense a realization of the work of CHRIST, but it was from its doctrinal aspects that the disciple whom JESUS loved grasped it. The Gospel in its divine side, in its theology, not in its anthropology, or its soteriology, so prominently as in the others, is dwelt upon. Nor must it be for a moment admitted that the view that either one of the four makes the prominent characteristic is ignored by the others. Only that each dwells upon that characteristic of the LORD's life and Person which he had grasped more completely.

The three Synoptists have certain points of agreement, certain points of independence, and a certain order of chronology peculiar to each. They bear witness in their own way as independent eye-witnesses, with variations even in those cases where all four agree, which show them to be thoroughly truthful. The apparent contradictions are real confirmations of their truth. Without wasting space to demonstrate this, we will indicate those passages in which the three agree, premising that they all agree together in recounting only nineteen facts which St. John records also, which could be reduced in part by avoiding a subdivision of leading events. The four agree in, I. St. John Baptist's Ministry. II. Baptism of JESUS CHRIST. III. John Baptist in Prison. IV. CHRIST's return to Galilee. V. Feeding of the Five Thousand. VI. Peter's Profession of Faith. So far, the leading events; but from hence onward the Passion of our LORD must of course present many points of coincidence, and yet the accounts are thoroughly independent. VII. Anointing by Mary. VIII. CHRIST enters Jerusalem. IX. Paschal Supper. X. Peter's fall foretold. XI. Gethsemane. XII. The Betrayal. XIII. Before Caiaphas, Peter's denial. XIV. Before Pilate. XV. Accusation. XVI. Crucifixion. XVII. The Death. XVIII. The Burial. XIX. The Resurrection. The three Synoptists agree in forty-four facts besides those in which they agree with St. John: I. The Temptation. II. The four Apostles called. III. Simon's wife's mother healed. IV. Circuit round Galilee. V. Healing a leper. VI. Stilling the Storm. VII. Demoniacs at Gadara. VIII. Jairus's daughter, and the woman healed. IX. Healing the paralytic. X. Matthew the Publican. XI. "Thy Disciples fast not." XII. Plucking ears of corn on the Sabbath. XIII. The withered Hand, Miracles. XIV. The Twelve. XV. Parable of the Sower. XVI. Grain of mustard-seed. XVII. His Mother and His brethren. XVIII. Sending forth the Twelve. XIX. Herod's opinion of JESUS. XX. Passion foretold. XXI. Transfiguration. XXII. Lunatic healed. XXIII. Passion again foretold. XXIV. The little child. XXV. Offenses. XXVI. The grain of mustard-seed. XXVII. Infants brought to JESUS. XXVIII. The rich young man. XXIX. Promises to the Disciples. XXX. Death foretold. XXXI. Blind men at Jericho. XXXII. "By what authority doest thou?" XXXIII. Parable of the Wicked Husbandman. XXXIV. The tribute money. XXXV. The state of the risen. XXXVI. David's Son and David's LORD. XXXVII. Against the Pharisees. XXXVIII. CHRIST's second coming. XXXIX. Last Passover. XL. Judas Iscariot. XLI. Before the Sanhedrim. XLII. The mockings and railings. XLIII. Darkness and other Portents. XLIV. The Bystanders. The Synoptists agree in testifying to forty-four separate events, acts, or teachings of CHRIST where St. John has no parallel fact recorded. We have four witnesses to maintain main facts; three to forty-four other facts. These facts include the central facts of His Baptism, A specially important Miracle, The Confession that He is the SON of GOD, The Paschal Supper, Gethsemane, Betrayal, Trial, Crucifixion, Resurrection. The more important facts to which the three Synoptists only testify are The choice of the Twelve and their Mission, The Passion foretold thrice, The Transfiguration, Judas, Mocking, Darkness, and Bystanders. As our object is one of general comparison, and to show the amount of concurrent testimony the Gospels contain, we will add a list of the facts in which two of the Evangelists agree, without pausing to distinguish which two, since we are only trying to illustrate the truth of the rule "that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may be established." I. The birth of our LORD. II. The two Genealogies. III. Flight into Egypt. IV. The Centurion's Servant. V. Messengers of John. VI. Parable of Candle under a bushel. VII. Of the Leaven. VIII. On teaching by Parables. IX. Reception at Nazareth. X. Third circuit around Galilee. XI. Death of John Baptist. XII. The washen hands. XIII. The Syrophenician Woman. XIV. Miracles of healing. XV. Feeding the Four Thousand. XVI. The sign from heaven. XVII. The Leaven of the Pharisees. XVIII. Elijah. XIX. One casting out Devils. XX. The lost sheep. XXI. Journey to Jerusalem. XXII. Answers to Disciples. XXIII. The LORD's Prayer. XXIV. Prayer effectual. XXV. The unclean spirit. XXVI. The sign of Jonah. XXVII. The light of the body. XXVIII. The Pharisees. XXIX. What to fear. XXX. Covetousness. XXXI. The Leaven. XXXII. O Jerusalem, Jerusalem! XXXIII. Parable of the Great Supper. XXXIV. Following CHRIST with the Cross. XXXV. Offenses. XXXVI. Faith and Merit. XXXVII. Divorce. XXXVIII. Request of James and John. XXXIX. Parable of the Ten Talents. XL. The barren Fig-tree. XLI. Pray and forgive. XLII. The Parable of the Wedding Garment. XLIII. The great Commandment. XLIV. The Widow's mite. XLV. Parable of the Talents. XLVI. Disciples going to Emmaus. XLVII. Appearances in Jerusalem. XLVIII. Ascension. The central points of great importance are, the human birth, the mysterious law of teaching by parables, the disciples going to Emmaus, the appearances in Jerusalem, and the Ascension.

We have one hundred and eight acts or teachings out of two hundred and seventeen different topics, and the larger number of the remaining one hundred and nine (except St. Luke's circumstantial account of the birth of our LORD), is made up of discourses reported by one or other of the Evangelists alone,—discourses most valuable, but not needing the concurrent testimony the other facts have received. We have, then, the evidence of the legal number of witnesses to His Birth, His Baptism, His Temptation, His Preaching, His Miracles, His Transfiguration, His prophecy of His own death, His prophecy concerning Jerusalem, His institution of the Last Supper, His Passion, Betrayal, Trial, Crucifixion, Death, Burial, and Ascension. These are the outlines of His Gospel. The details that have filled up this outline were the original matter which each could furnish, under the guidance of the HOLY GHOST, out of the abundant stores of his own memory. But there is a theory which has been broached, and has found much favor. It is that there was a document already in circulation, from which the three Synoptists drew such material as they deemed best for their purposes; that St. Mark adhered most closely to this document, and that the other two departed from it at will; and an effort has been made to restore out of the three a supposed text which would represent the contents of this imaginary fourth and earlier authority. Apart from the absurdity of supposing such a document to have utterly disappeared without leaving even a tradition behind it, and of imagining that the Evangelists—if this document were of any worth—would have superseded it by their own narratives without any acknowledgment in some way; apart, too, from the indirect denial of the inspiration of our Gospels which such a theory involves, the whole is baseless, because wherever we find the Evangelists departing from each other we must imagine an altered copy. Therefore this supposed original document has to be supplemented by four other documents altered from the first,—two St. Matthew, one St. Luke, one St. Mark, used in Eichhorn's theory, while Bishop Marsh has to conjecture the use of eight. This, as will be seen, is fatal to the whole conjecture. One good result is that this minute study of the verbal differences existing between their accounts has established the complete independence of the three Evangelists, and has purged the text of interpolations. Another conjecture has been made, that as the Apostles taught the same things, there was an oral narrative from which the Evangelists drew. The Apostles would, in their preaching, proclaim the same facts, and, it is very natural to suppose, in as nearly as possible the very same words. There, then, would grow up a skeleton outline on which the three Evangelists could most naturally place their own separate accounts.

This theory would account for the use of the same language and for many coincidences; but it would break down upon the independent order of events on which each Evangelist arranged his narrative. St. Luke is on the whole more nearly chronologically accurate, but all three follow no fixed plan of dates, but group certain classes of teachings or certain series of miracles together, which most probably were taught or performed on very different occasions. This they did to place in one view the leading conception each had formed of the MASTER, His work and His purpose, and this fits best with the inspiration of the HOLY GHOST, leading them to set forth the many-sidedness, the perfect human sympathies, the loving condescensions of the LORD JESUS in far better way, giving room for a better showing of His Divine nature and wondrous power than any other form could supply. A close study of the Gospels will show from their very structure that they in this way only, humanly speaking, could set before us the two natures in the one perfect sinless Person of CHRIST the LORD; that in this way they link their contents to the contents, and their form to the form of the Inspired Scriptures of the Old Covenant. The Gospel of St. Matthew begins with the genealogy of JESUS CHRIST, the son of David, the son of Abraham, narrating His miraculous birth, and appeals to the prophecy of Isaiah for a proof that He who was according to the flesh the son of Abraham, was also because of this birth the Emmanuel as well as the Joshua of the people. The whole Gospel rests upon the foundation of prophecy. So St. Mark opens with startling abruptness, "The beginning of the Gospel of JESUS CHRIST the SON of GOD as it is written in the prophets. Behold, I send my messenger before Thy face, which shall prepare Thy way before Thee; the voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the LORD, make His paths straight," and at once points to this messenger St. John Baptist, who by his fulfillment of the prophecy proved that JESUS CHRIST was the MESSIAH of prophecy. St. Luke's Gospel is much more elaborate, and details more at length the birth of the messenger, and then that of the CHRIST. Yet not only the visions and messages of the angels are in strict parallelism to the visions and promises of the Old Covenant, but the Hymns of thanksgiving are thoroughly Hebrew in every way, and as soon as the events require it appeal is at once made to the prophets. St. John's Gospel seems (as at first did St. Luke's) to break this law of conjoining to the old prophecies, but it really does so in a far more wondrous way. "In the beginning God made the heavens and the earth," but also, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God." Upon this basis is built the whole superstructure of that glorious Gospel. With less direct quotation from the older Scriptures there is framed into the texture of his Gospel as profound an application of the prophets as in the other three.

Each writer has his method. Each writer has his own individuality, and is enthused by his own characteristic devotion or love, or self-negation, yet is as completely inspired by the HOLY GHOST, kept from error in recording what he knew by the ordinary means of obtaining information, given insight to record accurately the true worth, in just wording of each event or discourse, had revealed to him those doctrines which human wit could not fathom, but which were necessary for our salvation. So St. John (to take but one) recorded with absolute accuracy all he knew, from his own first interview with our LORD, and the many facts of which he was an eye-witness, till he saw the water and the blood flow from the spear-pierced side, saw the risen LORD in that upper chamber, and again upon the shore of Galilee, and heard His triple restoration of the recreant Apostle. It was with greater fullness of the same Spirit, who had given him inerrancy, in fact, that he could divine the true meaning of the High-Priest's unwilling prophecy, or recorded our LORD's discourses. And the same HOLY GHOST gave to him the revelation of the JESUS CHRIST, the Word of GOD, who was with GOD, and was GOD.

It was not in mortal man to dare to make that statement, which yet is the corner-stone of our salvation. And this in a less prominent way, but not the less truly is the fact with each of the others. It is only their own characteristic temperament making them what they were that gives its form to their record. The fire burns as hotly, but the crust of character is different. The Publican naturally would not feel precisely as, though not less deeply than, the more polished Physician, who was the constant companion of the fervid Apostle Paul. Here we may remark upon the persons who were divinely chosen. St. Matthew, the sober, earnest, devout man, the business man, who, without hesitation, gave up his earthly business for a heavenly traffic, looking at his Master as the man of men, the Son of David, and believing with a daily growing, developing power, that He was the CHRIST, the SON of the Living God, in his very quiet shows as intense an enthusiasm as did St. John after sixty-six years of toil for the same Master. Two only of the Apostles were directed to write a narrative of what they knew of that Word of life whom they had seen, handled, followed, loved, ate with, watched with, and for whom they were ready to lay down their lives. It was directed that two others, whose narrative shows them to have been eye-witnesses to some things, and to have received ample, accurate, and undeniable information upon other facts, should write the other two biographies. It is the unbroken tradition that St. Mark wrote his Gospel for the converts of St. Peter, and that St. Luke wrote his for the Churches that St. Paul established; that each wrote under the directions and with the oversight of his Apostolic leader. Here, again, is another proof that the same Spirit who selected the prophets of old from the husbandmen, the shepherds, the plowmen, as well as from the priests and learned families, selected men whom man's judgment would have passed over.

(The contents of each Gospel and the characteristics of each Evangelist will be discussed under the several names MATTHEW, MARK, LUKE, JOHN.)

There was another use made of the Gospels which brought in a third sense. The portion of Scripture from the life of our LORD, appointed for the lessons in connection with the Holy Communion, was called the Gospel. It was a carrying out in the Scriptures of the New Testament the older parallel usage in the synagogue worship. The Law and the Prophets were divided into fifty-four portions each, and appointed to be read through the year. Since these would certainly not be neglected in Christian assemblies, we can well see that at the earliest possible moment the acknowledged Christian Scriptures would be so used. We have a record of the point before which these Scriptures were not so read. The ancient Liturgy of St. James contains this Rubric: "Then are read at large the Sacred Scriptures of the Old Covenant, and of the Prophets, and the Incarnation of the Son of God is set forth, His sufferings and His Resurrection, the Ascension into heaven, and His second coming again with glory. And this takes place daily in the sacred and divine ministration." Here the Law and the Prophets are read and the Gospel is set forth, i.e., recited orally. But this, then, shows the Liturgy to be in its frame-work older than 140 A.D., for Justin Martyr tells us that the memorials (i.e., Gospels) of the Apostles and the writings of the Prophets are read. It is inferred that the Gospel for the day was read as early. It is rather a hasty inference to push it to a conclusion that there was a series of Gospels selected and set forth as ours are. But it is fair to conclude that the Gospel lections were then customarily introduced. The evidence between that date and that of St. Ambrose is too slight to be adduced to prove more than Justin's words do. But by that time Gospels and Epistles were in regular use. The Council of Laodicea (365 A.D.) ordered the Gospels to be read with the other Scriptures on the Saturday also. To omit other details the Comes of St. Jerome, from which it is probable our Epistles and Gospels come, gives the Gospels for over two hundred days. The use was probably determined by the Bishop of the Diocese, and so we may account for the many variations remarked as occurring at different times. The Comes gives the number cited above, the Mozarabic adds an Epistle and Gospel for the Wednesdays and Fridays in Lent, but there was no such use in Gaul. The Irish Sacramentary provides but one Epistle and Gospel for the whole year; the Epistle is 1 Cor. xi., the Gospel St. John vi. The Eastern Church reads them in order. Again, the use varied as to who should read the Gospel. St. Cyprian had the lector or reader do this, but elsewhere the Deacon, and this became universal. But in some places the Bishop only read it, in other places it was the Priest's office; but this was local. In the American Church the Deacon, if he be alone, reads it, the Priest if he be present, and the Bishop if he choose to do so, when he is present, though there is no rule about it. The rule should be to read the Gospel from the north front of the Holy Table. If there is an Epistoler, he should read from the south front of the Holy Table. But more important is the rule to listen to the Gospel reverently standing. This was very ancient, being directed by the Apostolic Constitutions, and historians who note the infringement of this rule do so with surprise. The Doxology, Glory be to Thee, O LORD, was likewise very old. It was an Eastern custom, and spread thence over to Gaul.

Grace. The word originally meant the free gift, favor, or benefit. Then it received the technical meaning it has now in the semitheologic language of the pulpit. It is one of the most important of all the terms used, for the Grace of our Lord JESUS CHRIST, the free gift He bestows of everlasting life, the free gift of the HOLY GHOST and all the blessings that attend His presence, the favors and benefits that the practice of the Christian virtues procures in our daily life, are all comprehended under that one all-embracing word. The Sacraments are called the means of grace, and not these only, but every outward act, as prayer, almsgiving, fasting, self-denial, are such means. We may truly say that the work of the Second and Third Persons of the HOLY TRINITY is summed up in that single word. Let us, then, keep clearly in mind that the great source of all spiritual graces is the free gift of CHRIST from the FATHER. He gave His only-begotten SON. The basis of Grace is love. The love of GOD to us procured the Atonement, the Absolution, the Gift of Everlasting Life, the hope of Glory. These are of the Grace of CHRIST. When He ascended upon high He led captivity captive, and gave gifts to men, yea, even to His enemies, that the Lord GOD might dwell among them. All spiritual gifts are accompanied with some outward pledge of the reality of the gift. Therefore the gift of the SPIRIT in Confirmation, the gift of Absolution in Baptism and the Holy Communion, the blessings which crown a true repentance, a living faith, a hearty and loving zeal in the Christian life, the reply to prayer, to alms, to all acts of Christian self-control, all of which are so beautifully summed up in the general thanksgiving: "We, Thine unworthy servants, do give Thee most humble and hearty thanks for all Thy goodness and loving kindness to us and to all men. We bless Thee for our creation, preservation, and all the blessings of this life; but, above all, for Thine inestimable love in the redemption of the world by our Lord JESUS CHRIST, for the means of Grace and for the hope of Glory." But there is another side of the subject, upon which we must bestow a few words. The whole Gospel is filled with the Grace of our LORD; but how about ourselves? It must be laid down as an axiom that GOD gives us no gift that is not in sympathy with and in the full reach of our true nature. In fact, so far as we can see, each gift is only a restoration in such part of the original holiness in Paradise. There is in us capacity to hold whatever His Grace bestows. The first part of His work must have been that the Cross of CHRIST put all men into a condition of capacity for salvation, but there is also, more or less strongly, in us each an ability to lay hold of this Grace, otherwise the gift of salvation were beyond our nature, and a new creation of faculties, to enable us to receive His mercy, would have to be made. This ability is, indeed, of the weakest and faintest, and therefore we need help and strength. This He supplies; but as God gives us no gift that is not apt to our nature, so He asks us to receive nothing which we are not able to perceive ourselves when once it is put rightly before us. (Hence the lament of CHRIST over Jerusalem: "If thou hadst known, even thou at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace, but now they are hid from thine eyes.") But our weakness paralyzes all our efforts. The X. Article puts this clearly. "The condition of man after the fall of Adam is such that he cannot turn and prepare himself by his own natural strength and good works to faith and calling upon God. Wherefore we have no power to do good works, pleasant and acceptable to God, without the Grace of God, by CHRIST preventing us, that we may have a good will, and working with us when we have that good will."

The miracle of the paralytic man is a type of our capacity, aptness, disability by sin and weakness, and of God's preventent grace. He was borne of four into CHRIST's presence. He was disabled and could do nothing, yet he was a man in body and mind, capable of, fit for, that natural health which lawfully should be his. He was healed,—"thy sins be forgiven thee," which was the free preventent grace of the LORD, and he took up his bed and departed to his own house. So St. Paul declares, "work out your own salvation with fear and trembling, for it is God which worketh in you both to will, and to do, of His good pleasure." So our LORD, "no man can come unto Me except the FATHER, which hath sent Me, draw him." But we are to beware of what is called irresistible grace. An irresistible grace supplants the responsibility of the will. We can well believe in the urgings and pleadings of the Spirit, the quickening of the conscience, the persuasions of a lively love, and desire for holiness, but all Scriptures point to the Law that the will must choose finally. Grace is all-sufficient for whatever we can do or can desire, but it does not remove our true self and take its place. Co-operating grace may so work in us as to help us, possibly insensibly, to yield ourselves and our members servants to righteousness unto holiness. His Grace is sufficient for us all, in the moments of our greatest weakness, to give those who yield to His gifts all-sufficient strength. And while our state continues probationary, and therefore involves trial from God and temptation from Satan, God is faithful, and by His grace in His own wisdom will make a way to escape before the pressure is too great for our faith or our strength,—i.e., beyond the limit which the flesh can attain of obedience. But our obedience is demanded up to that point. Therefore St. Paul blames the Hebrew Christians for that with the grace given them "they had not yet resisted unto blood." Co-operating grace is the sanctifying work of the HOLY GHOST in the willing and ready heart. But the heart must be ready and self-sacrificing, "For let the Spirit be never so prompt, if labor and exercise slacken we fail. The fruits of the Spirit do not follow men, as the shadows doth the body, of their own accord. If the grace of sanctification did so work, what should the grace of exhortation need? It were even as superfluous and vain to stir men up into good, as to request them when they walk abroad not to lose their shadows. Grace is not given us to abandon labor, but labor required lest our sluggishness should make the grace of God improbable." (Hooker, vol. ii., Ap. to Book v., p. 697.) But there are certain means of grace also,—the Sacraments; of these Hooker thus speaks: "Touching Sacraments whether many or few in number, their doctrine is that ours both signify and cause grace; but what grace and in what manner? By grace we always understand, as the Word of God teacheth, first, His favor and undeserved mercy towards us; secondly, the bestowing of His HOLY SPIRIT, which inwardly worketh; thirdly, the effects of that Spirit whatsoever, but especially saving virtues, such as are faith, charity, and hope; lastly, the free and full remission of all our sins. This is the grace which sacraments yield, and whereby we are all justified. To be justified is to be made righteous. Because, therefore, righteousness doth imply, first, remission of sins; and, secondly, a sanctified life; the name is sometimes applied severally to the former, sometimes jointly it comprehendeth both. . . . For sacraments with us are signs effectual; they are the instruments of God whereby to bestow grace; howbeit grace not proceeding from the visible sign, but from His invisible power. . . . Were they not as good, to say briefly, that God's omnipotence, will, causeth grace, that the outward sign doth show His will, and that sacraments implying both are thereby termed both signs and causes, which is the self-same that we say?" (Ib., pp. 700, 703, 705.) The XXV. Article teaches this: "Sacraments ordained of CHRIST be not only badges or tokens of Christian men's Profession; but rather they be certain sure witness and effectual signs of grace and God's good will towards us, by the which He doth work invisibly in us, and doth not only quicken, but also strengthen and confirm our faith in him. . . . And in such only as worthily receive the same they have a wholesome effect or operation; but they that receive them unworthily purchase to themselves damnation as St. Paul saith." To sum up, Grace is God's free gift to us. It is in the Life, Death, Resurrection of JESUS CHRIST, of which we obtain the benefits and in which we share. Herein Sacraments become the conveying and the visible signs of such sharing. The LORD receiveth and giveth to us the Gift of the HOLY GHOST, pervading our life and sanctifying it, and using every action and habit as a channel by which to convey to us more grace. But we must yield ourselves heart, soul, and body to His influence, and work with Him lovingly, obediently, unflaggingly. Grace is the atmosphere of the Church by which we walk in the Light of the Gospel of CHRIST. It pervades all, it is the proof of the presence of the blessed Trinity.

A Thanksgiving at Meals.—The Jew used it. Our LORD sanctioned and sanctified it by using it as an element in His working the miracles of feeding the multitudes, and crowned its power by using it at the institution of the Holy Communion. The Apostles taught it. Meats "were created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth" (1 Tim. iv. 3-5). The Fathers are full of references to it. The directories and sacramentaries contain forms of Grace before and after meals. This is probably the oldest form now surviving: "Blessed art thou, O LORD, who feedest me from my youth up, who givest food to all flesh. Fill our hearts with joy and gladness; that always having a sufficiency, we may abound unto every good work in CHRIST JESUS our LORD, through whom be glory and honor and power unto the world without end. Amen." (Apost. Const., l. vii. c. 49.)

Gradual. Often in Old English Grayl or Grail. An anthem sung after the Epistle. In Africa it was a whole Psalm. It was early sung from the step (gradus) or place where the Epistle was read. The music was often very florid. The service-book which contained the anthem or Psalm, was called the Gradual or Grayl.

Grave. The pit properly prepared in which the coffin containing the corpse is placed. In the early Church, certain persons often associated into a guild, and called Fossores, had charge of the graves and their details. The cemeteries were carefully cared for, and the graves of the dead were looked after with a great deal of loving care.

Growth of the Church. Many and valuable statistics have been yearly published to exhibit the rapid growth of the Church, which has been at an average yearly rate of seven per cent., or of twenty per cent. from one triennial report to the General Convention to another. They all tend to show that she is gradually gaining that position which, with her notes of Unity, Apostolicity, and Catholicity, will win men to her holy ways. Wherever the full, plain Doctrines, Constitution, and Liturgy of the Church are set forth as the Canon directs (Tit. i., Can. xxi.), these men will be drawn to her. It must be so, for, aside from the mere changes involved in an altered civilization, she reproduces for the present day the doctrine and the polity of the Church as the New Testament exhibits it, and in her Liturgy she goes back to originals which sprang from the Church at Ephesus. But this growth from seven dioceses and one hundred and ninety clergy in 1790 A.D. to forty-eight confederated Dioceses and fifteen missionary jurisdictions, with sixty-seven Bishops and three thousand five hundred and twenty-six clergy, from twelve thousand communicants in 1800 A.D. to three hundred and seventy-two thousand five hundred in 1883 A.D., and devoting nine millions of dollars annually to religious work, is full proof that God is prospering us, that we are under the guidance of the Captain of our salvation. But if the number of communicants form two-thirds of our congregations, and this is an overestimate, as statistics show, the Church reaches a total of five hundred and sixty thousand adults. She draws into her Sunday-schools three hundred and fourteen thousand children. In other words, she is directly in contact with more than sixty-five per cent. of the population, teaching, training, influencing them. In the year 1800 she reached but one in four hundred and twenty. These statistics show a most wonderful blessing resting upon us. It is just to record here the report of the Committee on the State of the Church to the General Convention of 1883 A.D.:

"An hundred years ago the English branch of the historic Church of CHRIST in this land was wrenched from the mother-country, and the mother-Church was left in fragments on these shores. On the 11th of May, 1784 A.D., ten clergymen and six laymen sitting in New Brunswick, N. J., as the 'Corporation for the Relief of the Widows and Orphans of Deceased Clergymen,' resolved themselves into a 'Voluntary Convention,' and took preliminary steps, which resulted in the October following in a representative assemblage of some eight States in the city of New York, which agreed as a 'first principle' that 'there shall be a General Convention of the Episcopal Church in the United States of America.'

"The next October that General Convention met in this city of Philadelphia. 'A general ecclesiastical constitution' was agreed to; the Book of Common Prayer of the Church of England was revised, to make it consistent with the American Revolution; and a plan was reported for obtaining the consecration of Bishops in England. It was the season of Michaelmas when these great things were done, and the collect for 'All Angels' was signally answered. Here was a branch of the Apostolic Church, united and free, occupying a position unprecedented since the Christian era,—neither patronized nor persecuted by the civil powers. We have but to contrast that initial convention, less in number than many of the convocations of our rural deaneries, with the great legislative assembly here present,—one of the largest representative religious bodies in the world,—to exclaim, 'What hath God wrought!' We have now, in this year of grace 1883 A.D., 48 confederated Dioceses and 15 Missionary Jurisdictions, with 67 Bishops, more than 3500 other clergy, 3000 organized Parishes (not including missionary stations), and nearly 375,000 communicants, using the same Liturgy, and yielding obedience to the Canons enacted by the General Convention. One of the most noteworthy and gratifying facts connected with this council was the presence, at its opening service to give the absolution, and later in the session to pronounce the benediction, of that patriarchal man of God, the Right Rev. Benjamin B. Smith, D.D., LL.D., our Presiding Bishop, now in the ninetieth year of his age and the fifty-first of his Episcopate, whose seniority in both respects antedates every Bishop of the Anglican Communion throughout the world. The year of our LORD 1832 A.D., when, with three others,—long since gone to their reward,—he was consecrated to his high office, will forever mark an epoch in the American Church. Perhaps the most touching incident in the sessions of this body was the appearance in the House of Deputies on the fifteenth day of its deliberations of the Right Rev. Dr. William Mercer Green, the venerable Bishop of Mississippi, 'whose praise is in all the churches,' who came to say 'farewell,' and to tell us, with deep emotion, that he was the sole survivor, Clerical or Lay, of the General Convention of 1823 A.D., just sixty years ago, and that when he took Holy Orders there were but nine Bishops in the United States of America. The reports from the various Dioceses and Missionary Jurisdictions show a vast amount of labor, coupled with great self-denial and a quenchless zeal. In some Dioceses the results thus shown are remarkable; in the least favored, as statistics compute favor, the reports are hopeful. What must thus be here stated in general may be seen in detail in the tabulated reports herewith appended. It is the conviction of your Committee that, in these reports, Church-membership should be computed on the basis of the baptized rather than on that of communicants. This basis would be more churchly and less misleading. Our greatest deficiency, as in many years past, is the inadequate number of candidates for Holy Orders. This is a deficiency not confined to us, but is common to all religious bodies in this country who require an educated ministry.

"The same causes, we believe, obtain in all alike. God's inward call to the office and work of the ministry, we are persuaded, is at a far earlier period in life than most suppose. The child Samuel is a type of the character and age to which the LORD speaks; but in too many American homes the indication of such a call on the part of a child is considered unfortunate and to be deprecated. Add to this, without alluding to any other obstruction, the vastly increased expense of securing a proper education for the ministry as contrasted with that expense a generation ago, and we have two leading causes for the scarcity of postulants. The unfavorable conditions of the ministry, which obtain in this country such an inadequate support, frequent parochial changes and lack of provision for old age we purposely pass by, with the single remark that the 'Clergymen's Retiring Fund Society' will, if expanded as it ought to be, amply supply the wants of the clergy when they deserve, if indeed they do not need, to be placed on the retired list. The introduction of the business of the Board of Missions into the daylight sessions of this body, begun three years ago, has enlarged among the representative laity of the Church the interest in missions and given new impulse to that work. The crowded assemblages on those days, when both Houses sat together in such deliberations, amply demonstrates this; but it is to be regretted that so striking a feature as having all the Bishops on the platform at once on the first day of such business, rather than scattered on the floor of this house, was not continued this year, to the widespread disappointment and lessened interest of some who cannot look upon our Right Reverend fathers in a body more than once or twice in a lifetime. It may seem to some a small thing, but your Committee think it should not be omitted.

"The Committee would call particular attention to the Church Temperance Society, an agency modeled after the Church of England Temperance Society, and inaugurated in this country since our last Triennial Council, which, it is believed, will command the indorsement of those who cannot accept the methods commonly employed for checking the ravages of that sin which, while not so general in America as in some localities abroad, has, it can be averred without extravagance of speech, consigned more to premature graves than war, pestilence, and famine combined. Descending to particulars, as illustrating the present spirit of the Church, we can only allude to the fact that cathedrals, church schools, and colleges, Hospitals, and homes, have grown apace in number and efficiency. Dioceses have been subdivided into districts for more effective missionary work in their own borders, bringing clergy and laity of common centres into more frequent council as fellow-helpers. Deaconesses and sisterhoods have been multiplied to do what only holy women with a distinctive dress and under Diocesan direction can do. Guilds, in many leading parishes, have set all their membership to active parochial work. Church-music has made progress, so that what was ostentatious and unseemly in the house of God has given place to that which is classical, dignified, and churchly. And whereas, only forty years ago, there was but a single parish in all the land that had the Eucharist weekly, there are now some three hundred parishes where it is celebrated as the central act of Divine worship at least on every Lord's day. The enriched Book of Common Prayer, with the new Lectionary, is hailed with general delight, as not the least among the increased instrumentalities for pulling down the strongholds of sin, Satan, and death, and as commending our branch of the Kingdom of our Blessed LORD as pre-eminently adapted to the composite character of the American people. With all these advances has come, more and more, the gift of charity, the very bond of peace and of all virtues; a broader, more tolerant, and catholic spirit, which has pervaded the whole length and breadth of the Church to a degree never before known in her national life. The day seems upon us of which it may be said, 'Thy watchmen shall lift up the voice; with the voice together shall they sing, for they shall see eye to eye, when the LORD shall bring again Zion.'"

Guilds, Church. A Guild is a society organized for some common object. The name is said to be derived from the Old English "gild," the payment which each one was bound to make, or as others say, from the Welsh "gouil," a holiday. Guilds have a secular as well as a religious history, extending, it is claimed, far back into heathen times and countries.

I. Theory.—Guilds seem to arise out of the associative instinct in man. In the Church, they are an instance of the power of the Incarnation applying itself to the natural principles and tendencies of men to complete and exalt them. The taking of the manhood into God magnifies and ennobles men in general, gives each one a new value in the eyes of all the rest, and then laying hold of the spirit of association presents to us the Communion of Saints as the highest form of associate life. Baptism, therefore, being the impartation of the incarnate life, and the admission in consequence into the fellowship of that life, creates a new fraternity. The baptized, as members one of another, with lives knitted together and interests interwoven, engaged in mutual labor and devotion, reciprocating services, interchanging gifts, sharing in the benefits of each other's good works, suffering together, rejoicing together, constitute an organism in which each has his own place, his own office, and in his own degree acts on all the others.

A Guild is an endeavor to realize more intensely and practically this organic relation of the members of CHRIST one to another, and to bring it to bear on specific objects. It is an emphatic avowal and expression of the fact of the Communion of Saints. Its motive being, therefore, a supernatural one, it looks for its sustaining force to the Grace of God bestowed through sacraments and prayer. As a Guild has a common aim, so is it distinguished by a common devotional life, being mindful of the promise that "if two shall agree on earth as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of My FATHER, which is in Heaven."

II. Organization and Management.—The Guild method will answer a variety of purposes. Any class of works capable of concerted and differentiated activity, pertaining either to the outward, visible, and more material side of religion, or to the spiritual life more directly,—works of mercy, charity, and benevolence, works of sacred art, no less than efforts to strengthen personal holiness,—may be promoted in this way. It is said that immediate neighborhood is an element of the Guild idea. This renders Guilds most meet and apt for parochial use.

The fundamental qualification for admission to all Guild organizations should be baptism. When this is taken to constitute eligibility for Guild work, Christian work is dignified greatly. It appears then in its true light as a privilege and a right inherent in that brotherhood in CHRIST, which results from baptism. The responsibility of the members of CHRIST of sharing in the labor of the body is brought home by the Guild system. It affords a plan for securing efficient and disciplined Lay co-operation. The due prosperity of a parish demands the action of every head and heart and hand. Without general occupation our common life stagnates. Without order, and the consideration of fitness in the allotment of work, confusion ensues. Things left to be the business of everybody at once become the business of nobody. The Guild, after calling attention to responsibility, defines, distributes, and fixes it according to aptitude. It increases labor,—not so as to make heavier burdens for some, but, by increasing the laborers, that results may be multiplied and obtained from all. To do this, the various talents and capacities, which form the common store of a band of people, diverse in character and taste, with different degrees of inclination and leisure to devote themselves to church work, must be called out, and made to contribute each in its own way to the one purpose. A system is called for which shall allow the fullest and the freest play of the peculiar gifts and abilities of each. The Parish Guild may operate as such an agency. Its natural and proper head is the parish priest, styled, according to the traditional nomenclature, Master, Warden, Superior, or Provost. It should be entirely under his control and oversight.

Members should require his approbation, and the assignment to work should be his. In this kind of Guild, designed to unify, employ, and interest parishioners in general in the combined work of the parish, membership should be within the spiritual limitation mentioned above, as comprehensive as possible of both sexes, and of all ages. It can then be subdivided into wards, chapters, or committees, each with its own head. The care of the altar and vestments, the poor, the sick, strangers, missions, teaching, sponsorship, church literature, music, decoration, are phases of activity, some or all of which present the opportunity for useful thoughtful care in every congregation. These subordinate departments may have their own ordering of their own work, and at some appointed time, once a month or less often, a meeting of the whole Guild may be held, at which the different wards can report to the Master the condition and progress of the particular work intrusted to their charge. Meanwhile, there goes up from every member the special prayer which has been set forth as the daily intercession for the Guild and its intentions. The united offering of the same supplication should be accounted an indispensable means of attaining success.

Experience has widely shown how largely parochial earnestness may be augmented, and new lines of good discovered, by thus judiciously arranging and disposing of the time and abilities of those of the Faithful who have a mind to work.

Another very desirable and beneficial form of Guild organization is that which has spiritual improvement in view. Guilds of this kind are best composed of the same sex, and restricted to certain specified ages. The object proposed in these Guilds is the maintenance of the spiritual life, fidelity to religious obligations, and deepening of devotion. Boys and girls, young men and young women, are most simply and easily influenced and retained in attachment to the Church through instrumentalities of this sort. When the period of adolescence is reached, it is often found difficult, especially in the case of boys, to keep them true to their religious duties. Here the spiritual Guild comes in, and through the sanctified power of association supplies a very timely agency to fortify young persons against worldly and evil companionships, and to invigorate their constancy to God and Holy Church. It reinforces moral courage at that uncertain age when it is most prone to falter. It facilitates and expedites the work of a pastor, because it organizes. Without at all dispensing him from the necessity of direct personal intercourse with individuals, it places him in a position to reach individuals more effectually. Instead of his attempting to look after a large number of scattered individuals, one by one, it brings them under his eye and hand, partaking of, and supported by, the enthusiasm of their numbers, so that he can collectively sway and guide, while at the same time it puts him in the way of becoming more intimately and personally acquainted with the needs and circumstances of each one, and of winning their confidence to counsel, advise, and help them. In these Guilds, the framing of a Rule of Life is one of the first things to be considered. Members are either all communicants, or they include the unconfirmed as well. In case there are these two grades of members in the same Guild, it will be necessary to adapt the Rule to each. In the construction of a Rule, pains should be taken to make it as concise and brief as possible. It should cover the chief obligations of worship and holy living, and guard against the temptations which are most likely to assail and beset the lives of those who are to keep it. Private prayer, attendance at Church, grace before and after meals, observance of the prescribed Days of Fasting and Abstinence, self-examination, the avoidance of evil company, and refraining from bad and impure language, are among the points which may be usually incorporated. Another feature, which has been found to be exceedingly profitable and salutary, is for the Guild to receive the Holy Communion in a body once during the month. This will secure at least one communion a month, where, in many cases, it might be otherwise neglected or forgotten. More thorough and reverent preparation for communion may be thus cultivated. The pious pastor may lead his youth to approach the altar with regularity, with contrition, with fervor, and with fruit. A generous and right-minded emulation will be roused among them, and they will naturally vie with each other in the exercise of self-sacrifice, and in solicitude to perform their sacred duties well. It will be found easy, by the adoption of this Common Rule, to lead them to communicate at an early hour, fasting, and with searched and purified consciences. And if, after the celebration, the Guild remain for a few minutes to say together an office of Thanksgiving, it will be found most conducive to the advancement of their spiritual character.

Meetings may be held twice a month, or oftener. These afford the priest in charge opportunity for instructions in religion, and should be marked by the seemly recitation of some stated office of Devotion. The office of Compline is well suited for a Guild which meets in the evening. For Guild-meetings held in the daytime, some one of the earlier Day-Hour Offices might be selected. In the conduct and management of Spiritual Guilds, the idea should be firmly adhered to of forming habits by the performance of distinct acts of devotion, and by the regular exercise of the devotional faculties.

These Guilds, if properly and wisely administered, may be developed in such a manner as to be a substantial strength to the Church. They may be made to do a more positive and pronounced work than can possibly be expected from the miscellaneous and fragmentary constitution of Sunday-schools. The Guild will put nerve and sinew into Sunday-school work, and standing ready, will take boys and girls and mould and shape them as the Sunday-school from its nature can hardly do. It will impress boys and girls of any age, and especially at that restless period when young persons begin to feel that they have outgrown the ordinary Sunday class, and when they need something more bracing and definite, something that will be more felt in their daily life than the Sunday-school can give them. Guilds will supply in many cases the lack of home influence. They may be made to afford sympathy, elevating companionship, instruction, and wholesome recreation. The esprit du corps which they awaken is most valuable if directed aright. Guilds may be the means of raising up in Parishes a band of persons, trained and devout, burning with zeal and energy, foremost in good works for the souls and bodies of men,—powerful as an influence and example, a body-guard to pastors, and a glory to the Church.

Church Guilds, in the ages of their fullest development, always seemed to flourish, especially in England. They are, therefore, a part of the traditional life of the Anglican Communion. And the atmosphere of American society and institutions would seem to be wonderfully adapted to perpetuate this tradition.

Subjoined is a specimen of the Constitution and Rule of Life of a Spiritual Guild.

GUILD OF ST. STEPHEN THE MARTYR.

Object.—To help and encourage young men and boys to lead a Godly and a Christian Life, and to unite them in the fellowship of the Church.

CONSTITUTION.

I.

The Guild shall be called the Guild of St. Stephen the Martyr.

II.

The Guild shall consist, first, of companions, who shall be communicants. Second, of probationers, who shall be baptized boys, twelve years old and upwards.

III.

The Rector of the Parish shall be, ex officio, Supervisor of the Guild, and either he or some Priest appointed by him shall be its Director. A Warden, or Wardens, shall be appointed by the Rector. The Secretary and Treasurer shall be elected at the Annual Chapter of the Guild on St. Stephen's day of each year.

IV.

Any person wishing to join the Guild must be proposed at one meeting, elected at a following one, and receive the approbation of the superior.

V.

Members shall contribute monthly such specified sum as shall from time to time be fixed by the Guild.

VI.

On general questions, probationers shall be entitled to one-half a full vote. On admission of members, companions shall be elected by their own order, probationers by the entire Guild.

RULE OF LIFE FOR COMPANIONS.

I.

To pray regularly every morning and evening, devoutly kneeling.

II.

To be present, if possible, at a celebration of the Holy Communion, on all Sundays, and greater festivals of the Church.

III.

To communicate with the other members of the Guild on the fourth Sunday of every month, always fasting, and to make a careful preparation before, and thanksgiving after, Communion.

IV.

To practice daily self-examination.

V.

To say grace before and after meals.

VI.

To observe the fast-days of the Church, by one act of self-denial at least.

VII.

To say daily the prayer for the Guild.

VIII.

To say prayers before and after each service in Church.

IX.

Never to talk lightly of holy things, nor to quote Scripture irreverently.

X.

To avoid the company of bad boys and men, and all places likely to be the means of tempting to sin.

XI.

Not, except for some good reason, to attend any place of worship or Sunday-school not belonging to the Anglican Church.

XII.

To try to do some special work for God and His Church, under the direction of the Parish Priest.

RULE OF LIFE FOR PROBATIONERS.

I.

To say one's private prayers morning and evening daily, devoutly kneeling.

II.

To attend, every Sunday, a service of the Church.

III.

To abstain from swearing, bad and impure language, and all bad company.

IV.

To behave reverently at all times in God's house.

V.

To say the prayer for the Guild daily.

VI.

Never, except for some good reason, to attend any place of worship or Sunday-school not belonging to the Anglican Church.

REV. GEO. McCLELLAN FISKE.

Habakkuk. The eighth of the minor Prophets, of whom we have no accurate information. Arguments which are rather ingenious than fully convincing place him in the first year's reign of Josiah (630 B.C.). It is well to read the prophecy through as a single connected composition, and not as several disconnected ones. The bitter wars the Chaldeans would bring upon Judah are the great burden of his prophecy, and the need of a purging of the nation before Him who cannot look upon iniquity. That Judah should survive the scourge he does not doubt, but the woes and calamities that shall fall upon his people because of their sins is not lessened by the knowledge that the instruments of purging, the Chaldeans, shall suffer still more fearfully. He closes with a prayer which is one of the sublimest of all the noble poems that the Hebrew Prophets have given us by the grace of the HOLY SPIRIT. The leading thought of the Prophet is the trust in God despite all discouragements. His "the just shall live by faith" is quoted thrice by St. Paul. The seventeenth verse of the third chapter was the text that furnished Hooker the subject for his sermon on Justification by Faith. (Vide Smith's Bible Dictionary, Pusey on the Minor Prophets.)

Hades. The place where the souls freed from the body remain till the Resurrection. It was confused in the translation of 1611 A.D. by the use of the word Hell with the place of torment. The term Hades is used by our LORD in St. Matt. xi. 23; xvi. 18; St. Luke x. 15; xvi. 23. St. Peter uses it in Acts ii. 27, 31. In one reading of 1 Cor. xv. 55, it is used (if the reading be the true one) by St. Paul. St. John uses it in Rev. i. 18; vi. 8; xx. 13, 14 (St. Peter uses a participial form, tartarosas, from the noun tartarus, in his second Epistle, ch. ii. 4, "thrust down to tartarus," which was a part of Hades in the pagan teaching). The equivalent in the Old Testament was Sheol, usually translated the grave, but sometimes Hell, and with the same evil results as befell the confusion in translating Hades by Hell. Jacob will go down to Sheol, the place of departed spirits (A. V. down to the grave), mourning for Joseph. David saith God will redeem my soul from the power of Sheol (A. V. grave) for He shall receive me, and just before, "Like sheep are they laid in Sheol (A. V. grave), death shall feed on them, and the upright shall have dominion over them in the morning, their beauty shall consume away in Sheol (A. V. grave) from their dwelling." Isaiah, in one of the most magnificent of his descriptions, "When the King of Babylon dieth (xiv. 9) Sheol from beneath is moved to meet thee. It stirreth up the dead for thee, even all the chief ones of the earth; it hath raised up from their thrones all the kings of the nations. . . . Thy pomp is brought down to Sheol (A. V. grave), and the noise of thy viols." Enough is given to show that the Hebrew knowledge of Sheol was identical with the New Testament teaching upon Hades. Many speculations have been made about the condition of the dead. In the parable (or, as many Fathers hold, the history) of the rich man and Lazarus, there is the declaration that a great gulf is fixed between those in "Abraham's bosom" and those "in torments." It teaches us that we retain feeling, memory, reason, and that then we have a foretaste of the state after judgment. That this would follow from the liberated state of the soul is a natural conclusion which even the heathen held, and which is confirmed by the translation given by some of St. Peter's declaration that our LORD was quickened in His soul, by His death, a translation the Greek will naturally bear, and therefore that the act of death here is an added power of existence, whether for joy, as in the case of Lazarus, or of pain and agony, as in the case of the rich man.

Haggai. A name meaning festive or festival. He was the first to prophesy after the captivity of Judah, being called to speak in the Name of the LORD in the year 520 B.C. (Haggai i. 1). It does not appear that he had any claim to the title of prophet before this time, either by call or by family descent; for concerning his parentage nothing is certainly known, though tradition relates that he was born in Babylon. Yet some conjecture that he may have witnessed the destruction of the first Temple (Haggai ii. 3), and so have been contemporary with Jeremiah and Ezekiel. However this may be, it is very probable that he was among the exiles who returned to Jerusalem under the edict of Cyrus (536 B.C.) and witnessed the setting up of the altar of God in Jerusalem (Ezra iii. 2). Besides being the author of the book which goes by his name, he is thought to have composed a considerable portion of the Book of Ezra (Ezra iii. 2, to the end of chapter vi., with some omissions), and tradition assigns not a few Psalms to him, with Zachariah, but whether as authors or editors cannot be determined (Ps. cxi., cxxv., cxxvi., cxxvii., cxlv.-cxlviii.).

The events referred to in the prophecy of Haggai are recorded in the portion of Ezra just mentioned, the prophecy being a message from God to ruler, priest, and people relative to the rebuilding of the Temple.

An examination of the book shows that it may be analyzed into four parts, nearly corresponding to the times when they were spoken. The first division, spoken in the second year of Darius, the sixth month and first day (Haggai i.), is a message to Zerubbabel, Governor of Judah, and Joshua, the High-Priest, reproaching rulers and people for apathy in the work of rebuilding the Temple, and threatening a drought and famine, followed by a word of encouragement upon their rousing up to renewed energy in that work.

The second division, spoken in the seventh month and twentieth day (Haggai ii. 1-9), was designed to encourage those who felt the contrast between the former Temple and that then building, and ends with the well-known prophecy of the glory of the latter house being greater than that of the former, fulfilled in due time by the visible presence of our LORD in it. The third division, spoken in the ninth month and twenty-fourth day (Haggai ii. 10-19), is a warning to the priests and people on the folly of offering a divided service to God, and the promise of a blessing upon the prosecution of the work on the Temple (see ch. ii. 18).

The fourth and last division, spoken the same day (Haggai ii. 20-23), while a special prophecy to Zerubbabel of the overthrow of the power of his enemies, is also a declaration to him, as the Prince of Judah, the lineal ancestor of our LORD, of the breaking down of the kingdom of sin, Satan, and death, and the establishment of the power of God and the kingdom of His CHRIST.

Hagiographa. I. A division of the Old Testament, which included the Psalms, the Proverbs, Job, the Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, Chronicles. This division our LORD Himself recognized after His resurrection: "These are the words which I spake unto you, while I was yet with you, that all things must be fulfilled, which were written in the Law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning me" (St. Luke xxiv. 44). In these holy writings the Jews included the historical books of Esther, Ezra, Nehemiah, and the two books of the Chronicles and the Prophet Daniel, whose book is so largely historical. The reference there made by our LORD was not solely to the Psalms alone, but to all Messianic references in the collections of these holy writings.

Hallel. The Psalms so called are the six, cxiii.-cxviii., and are so called from the first word of the first Psalm of the series, Hallelujah. They were used at the three solemn Feasts of the Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles, and on the Feast of the New Moon. They were used on these three feasts in the Temple service. The series was divided into two parts, the first part ending at the close of Psalm cxiv., the other ending with the cxviii. It was the festal hymn of the Passover feast, and was so used by our LORD. The hymn that was sung by Him and by His Apostles was doubtless the cxviii. This last Psalm was used antiphonally, as will be seen by noting its construction. It was probably used processionally. It was to this Psalm that our LORD made two formal allusions during the last six days preceding His crucifixion: "Did ye never read in the Scripture, The stone which the builders rejected the same is become the head of the corner; this is the LORD's doing, and it is marvelous in our eyes?" And again, "I say unto you ye shall not see me henceforth until ye shall say, Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the LORD." The six Psalms form the Hallel; (another series of Psalms from the cxviii. (or cxx. or cxxxv. 4), and ending with the cxxxvi. Psalm, was called the great Hallel. But the Hallel of the Feasts was composed of the above six Psalms.

Harmony of the Gospels. (Vide DIATHESSARON.) The effort to place the events and incidents of our LORD's life in a chronological order was made at an early date after the Gospels were in circulation. It was very natural that this attempt should be made. The attempt has always had its peculiar difficulties, arising both from the Person and the reverence due to Him and from the scantiness of material. The gaps in the narratives, the lack of any chronological order continuously observed, the possibility, nay, probability, that the same discourses and parables were repeated at different times before different audiences, the possible likeness in incident in really different miraculous cures, are against the complete success of any attempt to make such a harmony as shall be of proof against any objections. The main incidents of our LORD's life, the greater stepping-stones from one phase of His ministry to another, can be put beyond an honest objection. Again, it is not every one who will make the trial who has the true reverent tone of mind. And the same is true of those who study the labors of others in this department of New Testament investigations. To some it is a most vivid picture of the marvelous life, and gives to them an insight they could not otherwise obtain. In others there is an irreverence and failure to appreciate these gains, a caviling, questioning spirit, which wastes itself upon petty questions. Tatian, whose work is lost, was the first who made the attempt, and apparently without any judgment and with some daring changes of the text. It was therefore suppressed. Ammonius took St. Matthew's Gospel as the basis, and comparing the others with it, made up a scheme of parallel places which he placed by its side. These Ammonian sections are often found in the cursive manuscripts of the Gospels. Eusebius of Caesarea (340 A.D.) arranged these into ten sections, showing where all four agreed, when three agreed, then wherein

St. Matthew and St. Mark agreed, where St. Matthew and St. Luke, where St. Luke and St. Mark, and wherein each had some separate event not recorded by the others. The system was an intricate one, but it has been digested into order by Bishop Wordsworth in his Greek Testament. In recent times many valuable Harmonies have been issued, such as that which accompanies Williams's "Devotional Commentary on the Gospels," in which the arrangement enables us to determine when the Evangelists used the same words and phrases. These are so readily accessible that it is needless to place here a synopsis of Harmony. As has been said above, no arrangement can be made which will not be open to some objection, and probably it is best that it is so. The research thus stimulated and the minute study of the details of usage and allusion has proved to be of immense service in establishing the credibility of the Gospels, in bringing out the inner meaning of many passages, in showing the impossibility that the Gospels could be forgeries, for they are bound by many slight and delicate ties to the time, the place, and the surroundings of the date claimed for them, ties which no forger, no matter how skillful, could have formed with the history and complex social relations which he would necessarily introduce into his work. In this way vast service has been done, despite the difficulties and disappointments which must surround every Harmony.

Head. The head, as the seat of thought and reason, was the type of Lordship. So our LORD is the Head of the Body, His Church. So the husband is the head of the wife, the chief, the responsible person of the household. So covering the head was a token of subjection. Anointing the head a ceremony (a) of conferring kingship, (b) of consecrating to the High-Priesthood, (d) to the Prophetic office, (e) as a joyful festal act, (f) for recovery from sickness (Jas. v. 14). The LORD was anointed for His burial. But there was and is the spiritual anointing which we share with our LORD, the unction of the HOLY GHOST (1 John ii. 20, 27).

Heart. In Scripture the ideal seat of emotions and affections, as of joy and sorrow, of longing and satisfaction, of envy and of hatred, of love and peace; of the intellectual operations, as of thought and of reason, of understanding and of meditation; of will and desire, as of lust and evil imaginations, of duplicity and folly, of honesty and goodness; of the internal state, "as he thinketh in his heart so is he; eat and drink saith he to thee, but his heart is not with thee." A heart so constituted is indeed the battle-ground for opposing forces, and needs every aid. Keep thine heart with diligence, for out of it are the issues of life. Many images are used to express the Divine desire to control man's heart: "My son, give me thine heart." "With the heart man believeth unto righteousness." Love is poured into our hearts, "He trieth the heart and the reins, He soweth His seed in man's heart." Scripture is full of both the workings of the natural emotions and of the Divine influence upon the heart of man.

Heathen. All tribes who were not either by descent, or by admission into the Covenant by circumcision, into the family of the Chosen People. The word Goyim is translated as heathen, Gentiles, nations, and refers to nations with whom the Israelites were surrounded, as the seven nations of Canaan, and the more distant people with whom they came into contact later. They were separated from them by strict enactments. They could buy or sell of the Gentiles man-servants and maid-servants. The Moabite was excluded to the tenth generation. The Edomite could be admitted into the nation in the third generation. A deep demarcation was established by the Law, and after repeated scourgings and punishments was at last accepted by the people, between themselves and the heathen. But they were to be the missionaries and teachers of these heathen. Jonah was sent on such a work. The Jews were scattered as dew upon the grass among the nations, to spread the doctrine of the oneness of God preparatory for Christianity. The Gentiles were to have the good tidings preached to them also, and at last when Israel turned away from its MESSIAH, the heathen were to become the chosen people, and to be grafted into the stock of the olive. It is our own glory and responsibility that as Gentiles no longer heathen in faith, but of the nations that are afar off, we have been gathered into the spiritual Israel. In us is fulfilled the prophecy of Noah: "God shall enlarge Japhet, and he shall dwell in the tents of Shem."

Heaven. As a material part, so to speak, of the universe, the Mosaic record gives very distinct and definite description. The firmament dividing the waters from the waters. The expanse, with its part in the economy of the world, is apparently spoken of in such hard, definite language, that it has been one of the objections made by modern science to his description, and yet it has been shown (Dawson, Science and the Bible) that the words do really describe appearances accurately, and that they bear a perfectly fair scientific interpretation. But it is not necessary here to speak of the heavens in their natural aspect, nor of the classification into the seven heavens of the Rabbins. The language of St. Paul, of his being caught up into the third heaven, has far more weight than we can attach to any other enumeration, but even this tells us nothing beyond the bare fact. Origen says, with eminent good sense, the Christian Scriptures tell us nothing of these subdivisions. But we use this term in a theologic and mystic manner. Heaven, then, the Scriptures tell us, is the abode of God. The heavens are His throne, the earth is His footstool. To localize the presence of an omnipresent God is difficult, but the Scriptures are certainly full and explicit. Isaiah saw Him on His throne, high and lifted up. Ezekiel saw His glory round His throne, which throne was as the appearance of a sapphire stone. St. Stephen saw the heavens open and the Lord Jesus standing on the right hand of God. St. John had a vision of the throne set in heaven. However these and innumerable other texts might be singly interpreted, in their general consent they point to the heavens as the presence chamber of God. Perhaps Coleridge's saying, that it is not so much "that God is everywhere present, but that everything everywhere is present to God," transferring the centre of observation from ourselves to the presence of God, has the germ of the truth in it. We cannot comprehend the laws of a self-existent Spirit, so that it is useless to speculate, and we can only receive and believe. It is not contrary to what nature and our own powers tell us, though it is far above all our ability to understand, to hold that the Creator of the universe hath all things laid open in His presence and yet hath His throne whereon He sitteth evermore, and yet to hold that the heavens and the heaven of heavens cannot contain Heaven. This Heaven and Presence Chamber of God is the abode of the ministrant spirits, the Archangels Cherubim and Seraphim, the angels and living creatures, the thousand thousands and the ten thousand times ten thousand which stand before Him and who are made messengers and ministers to the heirs of salvation. From this presence Michael was sent to Daniel; from this presence Gabriel was sent to the Blessed Virgin Mary. In this abode of glory and unapproachable splendor of light is the future happy home of the Christian. The Scriptures bid us look up to heaven. The Son of God came down from heaven, and up into heaven He was received when He ascended to His FATHER and our FATHER to His God and our God.

Hebrews. It has been earnestly debated whether the Epistle to the Hebrews is or is not from the pen of St. Paul, and Apollos, St. Luke, and St. Clement have each been suggested with more or less of plausibility as being the author of the Epistle, which the instinct of the Church has ever ascribed to St. Paul. It is not intended to enter into this discussion, which cannot be settled, but it is well to abide by the general voice or silent assent of the Church. And surely the weighty doctrines and the spiritual insight displayed in the Epistle are fully consonant with the noble genius of the Apostle to the Gentiles. It opens with no uncertain blast of the Apostolic trumpet. "God, who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by His Son," can well take its place beside the sublime opening of St. John's Gospel,—“In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God,”—and is the continuation of it in a manner. The date of the Epistle must be placed some time soon after the Apostle's first imprisonment, while he was in Italy, and most probably about 64 A.D. It has hardly an equal in the whole range of the Pauline Epistles for sustained loftiness of tone. There is a sweep of rhetoric in some passages, beginning with the first chapter and culminating in the grand roll-call of the heroes of Faith, which are unmistakably the outpouring of St. Paul's mind. Who but he could have penned the argument of the chapters vii.—x. ? Who but St. Paul of all the known writers of the Apostolic age could have written the tender, devout passages descriptive of our Lord as the sympathetic High-Priest (ch. ii. 14-18; iv. 12-16; vi. 17-20), or could have composed the twelfth chapter? A careful comparison of the marginal references will show how St. Paul, though writing to a wholly different audience, the Christian Jew of Palestine, yet wove into his argument so much that he had written to the mingled congregations or to the purely Gentile Churches of his own founding. It is but the outpouring of that zeal and love which filled his heart. “Brethren, my heart's desire and prayer to God for Israel is, that they might be saved” (Rom. x. 1).

The argument of this Epistle can be best understood if the Apostle's doctrine of Justification be presupposed, and faith, practical living faith in the Atonement, be taken as the proper subject, and that it is an expansion of the doctrine contained in the 24th, 25th, and 26th verses of the third chapter of Romans, and that this expansion is made purposely for the Hebrew Christians, and so that the Priesthood of our Lord is brought out most prominently.

Ch. i. and ii. God's Son (a) by nature above Angels. (b) Passed by the Angels, became man, submitted to humiliation and death that He might become the captain of our salvation, sanctify us, and be our merciful and faithful High-Priest.

Ch. iii. and iv. As captain—i.e., leader—He is compared with Moses, and ourselves are warned by the example of the Israelites in the wilderness. And He is again set forth as our High-Priest.

Ch. v. But a Priest must make an Atonement. So Jesus is a Priest forever. (a) As God's only-begotten Son. (b) By Consecration of the Father.

Ch. vi. The Apostle characteristically pauses to set forth Christian doctrine, and our steadfastness upon the foundation of God's oath.

Ch. vii. CHRIST is an Eternal Priest, for a provision for the transference of the Priesthood according to the Gospel was made in Abraham. And the Levitical Priesthood was only bound up with the Law, and was repealed by the Oath, "Thou art a Priest forever after the order of Melchisedec." Therefore the Covenant and Priesthood in CHRIST JESUS is of the Gospel to Abraham, and the Law was an intercalation, and so this statement of facts also brings us to JESUS as our High-Priest.

Ch. viii. The Apostle develops these correlated facts of the Covenant and Priesthood as better than the shadows of the Levitical Covenant and Sacrifices and Priesthood, and adds the mediatorial consequence of this better Covenant.

Ch. ix. Still pursues the types of the Levitical service, and carries on the thoughts of the continuous intercession of our LORD.

Ch. x. Sums up as it were in different phrases the vanishing imperfect nature of the Levitical sacrifices, the perfect offering of one in His own Body, in which, raised from the dead, He is King as well as Priest and Mediator. Then the short preceding appeals to Faith and the access through Him to the FATHER are resumed, with a repetition of the substance of the solemn warning given in the sixth chapter, but now from a new position; and a reference to the past courageous martyrdom of the Hebrew Christians.

Ch. xi. Is wholly after the Apostolic manner, and is a glorious roll-call of the victorious heroes of the Faith, closing with the revelation that they without us will not receive the reward of faith, but are kept waiting that we should be perfected together.

Ch. xii. Makes a practical application of the need of Faith in the dangers of that day, and contains an appeal of wondrous force and beauty, which has so liturgical a tone that it has been claimed as quoted from the Liturgy of St. James, in which it also occurs.

Ch. xiii. Carries on the application of this Faith unto our daily life, and closes with one of those Pauline benedictions which are a peculiar feature of St. Paul's Epistles. Imperfect as the outline is, we can see clearly the doctrine of the Incarnation stated as leading up to this Priesthood, the fullness of the Atonement and its application to us through His eternal Priesthood, and the necessity of Faith in us by which we may lay hold of the hope anchored with JESUS the High-Priest forever after the order of Melchisedec. The Apostle "has provided in this Epistle an exhaustless supply of hope, comfort, peace, and joy for every Christian soul looking to the Cross of CHRIST, and then raising its eyes to Heaven and beholding Him seated as our King at God's right hand, ever living as our Priest to make intercession for us, and coming hereafter in His glorious majesty to judge the quick and the dead and to put all enemies under His feet, and to reward all true Israelites who believe in Him, obey Him, and suffer for Him, and who regard Him with the eye of Faith as no other than God of God, Light of Light, Very God of Very God, of one substance with the Father, existing before the world, creating and sustaining all things with His Power, and to welcome them to the everlasting mansion of the only continuing city, the Heavenly Jerusalem, whose builder and maker is God." (Wordsworth's Introduction to Epistle to the Hebrews.)

Hell. (Vide GEHENNA.) It was by a sad confusion that the translation of 1611 A.D., following earlier ones, used the same word Hell for Hades and Gehenna. It obscured two of the most important doctrines upon eschatology,—the doctrine of the intermediate state and the doctrine of future punishment. (In the sense of the abode of the soul before the Resurrection, the reader should consult the articles on ESCHATOLOGY, HADES; also GEHENNA.) As a place of punishment it is under other terms spoken of by the Prophet Isaiah (lxvi. 24): "for their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched," a phrase which our LORD uses thrice in St. Mark ix. 44, 46, 48. So, too, in Daniel it is written that some shall rise to everlasting life and some to everlasting shame; a contrast our LORD also uses in His parable of the sheep and the goats, "and these shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal," where "aeonian" is the descriptive adjective in both clauses, as it is in the LXX. translation of Daniel. Where it is we know not, but a terrible hint is given in Isaiah (lxvi. 24): "And they shall go forth, and look upon the carcasses of the men that have transgressed against Me: for their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched," which will compare with Revelation (xiv. 10): "and he shall be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the LAMB." The sorrows of that dread abode are described in phrases which may bear a metaphorical sense, but literally seem very material. It is not profitable to speculate upon these things, and it is far better to receive what is told us with sorrow that sin has made it so certain.

Hellenist. A Jew who was brought up in a foreign country, and had imbibed more or less of the foreign influence and the current language of his place of residence. The word occurs thrice in the New Testament (Acts vi. 1; ix. 29; xi. 20). The term was applied also to the proselytes of Greek or other Gentile parentage. But since the Hellenic dialect of the Greek was the most widely spread and best understood, the term was applied to all proselytes, of whatever descent. These Hellenists were of the greatest service to the spread of the Gospel, both indirectly and directly. Indirectly, because they already prepared the way by holding and more or less boldly teaching the unity of God among the Gentiles, and because by the translation of the Hebrew Scripture into the Hellenic Greek they placed a most serviceable instrument in the hands of Christian teachers. Directly, because many of them, already affected by the Gentile influences, or being proselytes, were ready to accept the Gospel when it was presented to them. It was to these the Dispersion, the strangers scattered in the provinces of Asia Minor, that St. Peter addressed his first Epistle. Among these St. Paul often found the most cordial reception.

Their most lasting service to the Gospel was the preparation, by the translation of the Old Testament into the Hellenic Greek, of a language of the Gospel. (Vide SEPTUAGINT.) The work done among them was individual, and often, so far as we can trace, but temporary; the work done through them had most important and permanent results for the Gentile Christians.

Heresiarch. The founder of a heresy, an arch-heretic. As heresy is very largely at first an intellectual error, sometimes a revolt from an overstraining of orthodox doctrine, its moral results are not at once very evident. And a leader in a heresy may be apparently a most estimable man in every relation of life, and by that very goodness of character commend doctrines which without his personal influence would be rejected. Arius was said to be a very devout man. Nestorius practiced great asceticism. St. Augustine spoke of Faustus, his Manichaean teacher, as one who by his life commended his heretical doctrines. So at the present day, since moral sequences stand at some distance adown the line of cause and effect, from intellectual and perverted religious teaching many strange and absurd notions are disseminated by men of pure lives. The term heresiarch cannot be applied to them as Founders, but in the sense of Leadership it can be applied to them as Leaders in false doctrine.

Heresy. The word had at first a good meaning,—a choice, a profession, a business; then a party, or school, or thought, as Josephus says he was brought up in the Pharasaic heresy. But soon in ecclesiastical language in the New Testament it meant the holding of a doctrine persistently contrary to the authoritative statements of it, a choice in error, and that a persistent choice. It is not an infidelity which denies the Faith, but a perversion, more or less extensive, of the Faith. It is overthrowing the foundation by the consequences. It is this which makes it so dangerous. Nestorius, apparently, was most reverent, and in the minds of very many now was much misused; but had his doctrine been allowed to stand, it would have overthrown Christianity as surely as would Arianism have done it. Heresy involves perverse doctrine; schism is separation on points of Episcopal government. St. Paul lays down the rule with regard to the treatment of a heretic. "A man that is an heretic after the first and second admonition, reject." And he excommunicated Hymenæus and Alexander for their false teaching. Heresy is exceedingly subtle in its disguises, though it is thoroughly Antichristian. It professes an insight and a wisdom which speaketh great things. Yet the Church has ever been very careful not to charge heresy but upon sure grounds. This will explain why so many men were apparently dealt with very gently at first and harshly afterwards, for she must, as a net cast into the sea, include all and afterwards select. The earliest heresies, so far as we can now judge of them, were in some degree Gnostic in matter and in form, and became glaring at an early point of their growth, and so were easily dealt with. But it was much more difficult to deal with men like Paul of Samosata, or Beryllus, or Praxeas, since theirs were errors much more logical in form and their defenders often able to hold a catholic doctrine in words, but in a very heretical sense. It was for this reason that the very word over which the Nicene battle was fought and won had been a century before rejected by the Church as capable of an unsound signification—the Homöousion. The heresies of the Cerinthians, Valentinians, and Montanists, of Paul of Samosata, and of Sabellius were mere skirmishes to the gigantic struggles into which Arianism and the secondary heresies which were derived from it plunged the Church. But out of it there came a series of definitions of the Faith which by their affirmation brands every counter-statement as heretical. The Nicene Creed really contains them by deduction. But the special definitions on Nestorianism, Eutychianism, Monothelitism buttress its articles against every wind of doctrine.

These, then, we must accept, and must test every new presented doctrine by them. Upon the definitions of the six Œcumenical Councils the Church must plant herself and defend the one Faith. There is another part, however, of this subject which it is well to speak of. These doctrines we have spoken of above are "of the Faith." But it may be asked, Is there not another series of dogmas which you stamp as heretical? You reject Mariolatry, Transubstantiation, the Immaculate Conception, and Infallibility as clearly as you reject the Pelagianism that is revived in a modern fashion. It is true, and herein, until there is an Œcumenical Council to pronounce them heretical, we only deny that they can endure the test of Holy Scripture and the harmony with the undoubted definitions of the Faith, and use the right belonging to the Church in each country to protect itself by forbidding them to be taught, till they are judged and passed upon by the whole Church in Council assembled. As we have never anathematized either the Eastern or the Latin Churches, we simply hold our accredited teachers to those doctrines taught in the first six centuries, and to none else. English Parliamentary Acts are not binding upon us, but these sentences from an act in the first year of Queen Elizabeth state concisely our position: "but only such as heretofore have been adjudged to be heresy by the authority of the Canonical Scriptures, or by some of the first four General Councils, or by any other Council wherein the same was declared heresy by the express and plain words of the said Canonical Scriptures."

The separate bodies of those who profess and call themselves Christians and show a zealous love towards our LORD are in schism, or in opposition to the external government of the Church, but may practically hold the Faith in all essentials. Still, an examination of many of their writings shows a laxity and that want of accuracy which is perilous. A person may hold heretical doctrine unwittingly, or through excess of zeal may be misled into it, but he is not to be accounted heretical unless so pronounced by the Church. Hooker's note on the title-leaf of the "Christian Letter" expresses the temper of every one who has authority to teach: "All things written in the books I humbly and meekly submit to the censure of the grave and reverend Prelates within this land, and to the judgment of learned men and the sober consideration of all others, wherein I may happily err as others before me have done, but an heretike, by the help of ALMIGHTY GOD, I will never be." The "Christian Letter" was an attack upon his Ecclesiastical Polity, and his (unpublished) replies were scribbled on the margins.

Apart from the earlier heresies of the Ebionites, Gnostics, Manichæans, Priscillians, which were offshoots of the same tendency to revolt, we must note the false doctrines of Sabellius (240 A.D.), who taught that the TRINITY was but the manifestation in three forms at different times of one and the same Divine Being, and the similar ones of Paul of Samosata; those of Arius, who denied the eternal sonship of CHRIST, and of the modifications in the Semiarium and Eusebian forms of it. Those of Pelagius, who held that man had the capacity still left in him to earn immortal life without grace. Nestorius was led by his zeal against subordinate errors to assert that the Blessed Virgin Mary had given birth only to CHRIST, but not to GOD, meaning thereby that there was not continuously a perfect union of the two natures in the one Person of our LORD. He did not deny the indwelling of the Divine in the human nature, but he would not hold to the perfect union of the two, as the body and soul together subsisting in perfect union make the one man. This heresy brought out its opposites, the Monophysite and the Monothelite heresies. Eutyches, in his fervor against Nestorius, maintained the single nature in CHRIST,—the Divine nature was so united to the human as to form but one nature, as silver fused with gold forms but one alloy. To escape this error (condemned by the Council of Chalcedon, 451 A.D.), Sergius, the Patriarch of Constantinople (630 A.D.), put forth the Monothelite error, in which, acknowledging the two natures, yet the Divine will absorbed the human will, and there was but one will and one energy in the Person of our LORD. These heresies appear to have exhausted all forms of false teaching against the Person of our LORD from within; of course the denial of His Divinity is an assault from without.

Hermeneutics signify the principles of Biblical interpretation, as Exegesis refers to the practical use of these principles. The early writers on Scripture tried to classify these principles and to lay down some fixed rules upon which to apply them. Though they accomplished much, their many subdivisions have in this later age been rejected with perhaps too much scorn. For a guide in researches into the hidden senses of Scripture, a thorough and devout study of the text is itself imperatively necessary. It was this study, in which he spent three years of unrelaxed labor, which gave Chrysostom his almost unrivaled power of exposition, and his great common sense kept him from misapplying his knowledge. Hermeneutics means really the principles of common sense used in the Exegesis of the Bible,—i.e., every department of human investigation must be governed by its own laws, as the physiologist investigates the deeper mysteries of our human system by the facts he has already gained, and his sagacity, common sense, and power to combine these facts skillfully lead to still greater results, but his sagacity and common sense would fail him if he were to apply them without previous special training to some other science, as, for instance, the Law. The Patristic expositors divided the science into from three to twelve or fourteen subdivisions, thereby defeating the establishment of any true system. It is perfectly defensible to lay down these three divisions: (a) The Principle that a book (or a text) should be studied in itself,—i.e., the connected form of its contents and their purpose, the surroundings because of which the book was written, and their bearing upon the contents. This may be called the Grammatical method. (b) Since each book has claimed for it the authority of Inspiration, it follows that its contents, which historically are local, can also have wider and later applications. This is specially true of special sections in the book,—e.g., our LORD's Parables had usually a historical application at the time they were uttered, but He intended that they should have an application to us in each successive age, and their wonderful wording gives them such a truth for each generation. (c) Then within the limits of that common sense spoken of above there is also what is, for want of a more accurate term, called the Principle of allegorizing, of interpreting passages so as to give them their true sense, yet one not on the surface. Such was our LORD's use of the words which He as the Eternal Word had used to Moses: "I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob." The perfectly legitimate conclusion our LORD drew from it, that He was not the God of the dead but of the living, was not upon the surface nor apparently within the purpose of the words when first uttered. So St. Paul compares Hagar to the Jerusalem that now is, and Sarah to the New Jerusalem, the mother of us all. It was this principle misused and pushed to extremes that brought the whole study of Hermeneutics into disrepute, but it was a very sound one in itself, and gave to the Patristic Exegesis very much of that power which it will never lose.

Hermits. (Vide ASCETICS.) The hermit life seems to have originated in the Eastern idea that matter was evil, and that by despising the body the soul might be elevated. The celibate Therapeutæ, clad in white garments, praying at sunrise with their faces to the sun, and with their allegorical rendering of Scripture, were hermits. They lived a life of contemplation, while the Essenes practiced agriculture and the arts, and lived together, and assisted others. The Therapeutæ gave their property to relatives before entering the brotherhood, while the Essenes had a "common treasure." The Therapeutæ lived separately in cells and were ignorant of the outer world, recruiting their ranks from boys brought up by themselves, while the Essenes only accepted adults as members. Banus the Pharisee, with whom Josephus lived, led a life of stern self-mortification, clothed in woven leaves and feeding on roots.

In the first two centuries of the Christian Church, while persecution raged, it was indeed a "church militant," and the great Decian persecution may have driven Christian men into the desert away from heathen cities, and excited a martyr spirit, as in New Testament times (Heb. xi. 38), when Christians "wandered in deserts." When Christianity grew worldly, those who desired to observe a very strict life naturally fell into the ascetic idea. Paul was the author, and Antony the encourager, of hermit life among Christians, and Hilarion and St. Jerome in his Bethlehem community were famed as promoters of it. At first scattered individuals practiced a life of asceticism in the Egyptian deserts, where Paul and Antony had performed their austerities in the third and fourth centuries. Pachomius, in the peaceable reign of Constantine, caused monasteries to be built in Thebais in Egypt, and thence monastic life has spread throughout the world.

While the Church uttered its protest against anything unholy in matter, condemning the abhorrence of things innocent, she approved asceticism in the so-called "Apostolical Canons" as a useful discipline. (Euseb. H. E., v. 3.)

In ancient times the pillar-saint, Simeon Stylites, who for years exposed himself to the weather, standing on pillars of various heights, is pre-eminent as a specimen of ascetic life. He would not leave his post even to embrace his mother, who visited him, although she died at his place of mortification.

St. Patrick in Ireland, St. Columba in Scotland, and St. Martin, Bishop of Tours, in France, have left illustrious names behind them.

In modern times the Russian monks have been remarkable hermits. In Dean Stanley's "Eastern Church" (Lect. x. pp. 393-94) we find the following extract from Fletcher's "Russian Commonwealth": "In the dark forest of Muscovy, in the frozen waters of Archangel, is carried out the same rigid system, at least in outward form, that was born and nurtured in the burning desert of the Thebaid." These Russian monks are very influential. They are called "The Black Clergy." In the sixteenth century they used to go nearly naked, with flowing hair. Many had an iron collar or chain about their necks even in the extremity of winter.

In some rare cases they are considered as prophets, and can rebuke whom they will. One of them checked and rebuked an emperor when he was intent on massacring the town of Plescon. (Stanley, pp. 396-97.)

Some conception of the vast numbers of early monks may be formed from the fact that Cassian speaks of a monastery with five thousand monks in it. The monasteries in deserts had their churches and officiating clergy. St. Jerome describes the effect of the daily sermon of the Abbot at evening prayer as seen in the tears of the brethren, and when the kingdom of CHRIST and heaven were the topics, "then one may observe how each of them, with a moderate sigh and eyes lift up to heaven, says within himself, 'Oh that I had wings like a dove, for then would I flee away and be at rest!'" He also commends the life of the monks of his beloved Bethlehem, where "one could not go into the field but he should hear the plowman singing his hallelujahs, and the vine-dresser tuning David's Psalms." It is of such a life that Geikie speaks, in the "lawless Middle Ages, when the cloister was like a speck of blue in a heaven of storm." Still, extreme asceticism sometimes produces a reaction of excessive laxity, and fleeing from the world to challenge Satan in the wilderness is not as heroic as the struggle with the world, and perhaps the life among others rightly lived may be less dangerous than solitary life.

REV. S. F. HOTCHKIN.

Hierarchy. The divinely instituted governing order in the Church. It really, both by New Testament evidence and by the testimony of history, comprises three orders,—the Bishop, the Presbyter (contracted into Priest), and the Deacon. By this Hierarchy every historical Church has been and is governed. Since the Reformation the disastrous attempt has been made and is now continued of deriving the government of the Church from the will of the congregation, not from the Divine commission. But the three orders have each been enlarged by a separation of details of government in each order. Thus the development of the Church work and multiplication of Dioceses required at an early date the arrangement of some rule of precedence, and the Episcopal authority held “in solidum” as a common right and power by all Bishops was subdivided by arranging the precedence, with presiding and appellate rights of the Bishop in the chief See of a Province with the title of Metropolitan. As the work grew and the difficulty of meeting all cases, both of government, of discipline, and of faith, which came up, the offices of Patriarch for the whole Province, which was usually coterminous with the civil province, of Metropolitan, and of Archbishop, for the subdivisions of the Province, were created, and under them the small Dioceses, whose territory was arbitrarily determined by the conditions of the Church there and of the work to be done, though it could not be enlarged or diminished at pleasure. But the Bishop of the smallest, poorest Diocese was invested by his office with all the spiritual authority the Patriarch could wield. This gradation of rank within the limits of the order was made gradually, for the sake of order, government, and decent conduct of the work. So too the office of the Priest was enlarged by appointing Archpresbyters and Deans, both which, however, changed their names; the Archpresbyter later took the title Archdeacon, and the Dean became attached to a Cathedral, while his place was taken by a Rural Dean. This was done that the interests of the clergy might be attended to while the Bishop, whose representatives they were, was busied about other important duties. So too the Deacons had an Archdeacon, usually the senior Deacon, set over them, who, when he received Priest's orders, ceased to be Archdeacon, but later the Archpriest took his title and exercised jurisdiction over both orders. It was to meet necessities as they arose, to fulfill the demands the growth of the Church made upon the clergy, to prevent clashing of interests, that these subdivisions of jurisdiction and of rank took place in the three orders of the ministry. Whether they continued to fulfill the needs which gave them existence is another thing. Whether they are needed at present by the extension of our work, and whether the machinery they involve is suited to our state here, is a problem now engaging the attention of the most active minds in the Church. Without intending to assert that they, as they existed in the early Church or are now with their functions defined by the growth of centuries in the English Church, should be transferred to our usages and interpolated into our methods, it is proper to insist that there is a need for some such reorganization of our Diocesan work. There is a shrinking in many minds from the introduction of titles and of such subdivisions of work and of appointing supervisors of it, but the necessity for it is shown by the attempts to meet it in the discussions of the Provincial system in the General Convention; the organizations of the local clergy into Conventions; the use of Church Congresses to discuss such subjects among many others. There is a real difficulty in selecting the names. The offices could be well discharged and are sometimes unconsciously filled by clergy who have a natural talent for leadership and for organization. But in this country we shrink from creating officers to whom we must apparently give the titles of Archdeacon, and Dean, and Provost. This is being met by the common, but usually unofficial, use of the title Dean for the presiding officer of the Convocation. It lies a good deal in the good sense of the clergy and their readiness to organize into a working body, having a system of missionary work which shall be faithfully carried out under such officers, whether titled or not, whom the Bishop may choose to recognize. In a few Dioceses these officers are already recognized and provided by Canon, but in by far the greater part of the Church there is only a semi-official recognition by the Bishop.

In the Hierarchy, then, upon the unalterable foundations of Bishop, Priest, and Deacon, there were developed as need demanded within, these ranks which grew out of the Episcopate. (I.) The PATRIARCH, who was at first called Archbishop, and the ARCHBISHOP, who was at one time called the Metropolitan. The Patriarch exercising supreme executive jurisdiction over the Archbishops, and the Archbishops under him exercising such authority over the Bishops of their Provinces. (Vide also EXARCHS and PRIMATES.) Within the Presbyterial office were developed (II.) the Archdeacons and the Deans. The so-called minor orders did not give any spiritual power, but were the systematized lay co-operation formally recognized by a public setting the person apart for his work by the laying on of hands.

High-Priest. The officer holding the highest office in the Jewish worship. He was to be only of the House of Aaron, to which the Priesthood was confined. It was to belong to the Aaronic family by a perpetual statute. The High-Priest had peculiar functions given him, which were typical of the eternal Priesthood of CHRIST. To him alone once a year it appertained to go into the Holy of Holies, to sprinkle the blood of the sin-offering upon the mercy-seat, and to burn incense within the veil. He could do this only in the proper robes of his office. A type of the robe of our Humanity our LORD wears, entering with it with His own blood of atonement and offering the incense of our Prayers. During his lifetime the homicide who had taken sanctuary in one of the cities of refuge could not leave it. Again, a type of the protection given to the soul by the very life of our High-Priest. Other functions of a judicial and an organizing character which he exercised were rather temporary, and depended more upon the ability and influence than the ecclesiastical office of the High-Priest. As did Eli, he might permit abuses to grow up around him unchecked if not without protest, or he might as Azariah oppose the royal power, or as Jehoiada institute large repairs. In these things the energy or the diffidence of his character was shown. In the service of the office, if the High-Priest were incapacitated by sickness or some defilement, the next of kin could discharge it for him. It must have been for some such reason that Zecharias, the father of St. John Baptist, was in the Holy of Holies offering incense when the Angel appeared to him with his message. Again, in the later political troubles under the Seleucidae, and under the Romans, one High-Priest was often removed and another put in his place, and as this was done from policy, without the slightest regard to Jewish Law, the people while they submitted to the High-Priest in office paid great reverence to the legal High-Priest. Therefore St. Luke (ch. iii. 2) wrote, "Annas and Caiaphas being High-Priests;" noting the two, Annas the true High-Priest, and Caiaphas his son-in-law, being the one thrust in. Here we can see why Caiaphas, being High-Priest that year, should prophesy "that it is expedient for us that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not," and why our LORD should be carried first before Annas, and then before Caiaphas.

Holy Ghost. The Third Person of the blessed TRINITY, to whom the third imploration of the Litany is addressed. "O God the HOLY GHOST, proceeding from the FATHER and the SON, have mercy upon us miserable sinners." And of whom is set forth in the V. Article the true faith we must hold. The HOLY GHOST, proceeding from the FATHER and the SON, is of one substance, majesty, and glory with the FATHER and the SON, very and eternal God, and is so confessed in the Creeds. In the Apostles' Creed, "I believe in the HOLY GHOST," and then the remainder of the Creed is a declaration of His work (as much as the preceding parts are each a declaration of the nature and the work of the FATHER and of the SON): "The Holy Catholic Church, The Communion of Saints, The Forgiveness of Sins, The Resurrection of the body, And the Life everlasting." More fully is His Person shown in the Nicene Creed: "I believe in the HOLY GHOST, the LORD and Giver of Life, Who proceedeth from the FATHER [and the SON], Who with the FATHER and the SON together is worshiped and glorified, Who spake by the Prophets." In this Creed also is His work set forth, but the circumstances under which this part of the Nicene Creed was enlarged at the Council of Constantinople (381 A.D.) did not lead the Fathers there to give it the form which shows it, but the answer in our Catechism does this: "Thirdly, in the HOLY GHOST, who sanctifieth me and all the people of God." The true faith, then, of the Christian concerning the HOLY GHOST is that He is a Person of the Substance, Power, and Majesty of the GODHEAD, proceeding from the FATHER and the SON. Sent by the FATHER and the SON and received by us, He is a Person, since He is sent by the FATHER. "And I will pray the FATHER, and He shall give you another Comforter, that He may abide with you forever" (St. John xiv. 16). "But the Comforter, which is the HOLY GHOST, whom the FATHER will send in My name. He shall teach you all things and bring all things to your remembrance whatsoever I have said unto you" (id. 26). He is sent by the SON also. "It is expedient for you that I go away, for if I go not away the Comforter will not come unto you, but if I depart I will send Him unto you" (xvi. 7; cf. xiv. 17; xv. 26; xvi. 13-15; Acts i. 5, 8). With this proof of His being a Person, we can understand the sentence, "And the SPIRIT of GOD moved upon the face of the waters" (Gen. i. 2). "My SPIRIT shall not always strive with man" (vi. 8). And, to pass by many other passages, Ps. li., "Take not Thy HOLY SPIRIT from me." St. Peter declared that He was the promise of the FATHER to the SON, and quoted the Prophet Joel (ii. 28-32). But He hath notes and marks as becometh a Person. He is HOLY. It must be His by nature, and it is an inseparable part of His Name—the HOLY GHOST. He is the LORD. "Now the LORD is that SPIRIT, and where the SPIRIT of the LORD is there is liberty" (2 Cor. iii. 17). He is the Giver of Life,—"The Spirit of Life." . . . "But if the Spirit of Him that raised up JESUS from the dead dwell in you, He that raised up JESUS from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by His Spirit that dwelleth in you" (Rom. viii. 2-11). He proceedeth from the FATHER and is sent by the SON. (Vide PROCESSION of the HOLY GHOST and FILIOQUE.) He, with the FATHER and the SON together, is worshiped and glorified. "GOD is a Spirit, and they that worship Him must worship Him in Spirit and in Truth" (St. John iv. 24). He spake by the Prophets. "For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man, but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the HOLY GHOST" (1 Pet. i. 21).

He is sent to abide forever in the Church; and therefore He is the informing, guiding Spirit in the Visible Church, which is Holy and Catholic. He is the Instrument of the Forgiveness of sins. "He breathed on them and saith unto them, Receive ye the HOLY GHOST. Whose soever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them, and whose soever sins ye retain, they are retained" (St. John xx. 22, 23). He is the Instrument, too, of our Resurrection. "Not that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life. Now He that wrought us for the self-same thing is God, who also hath given unto us the earnest of the SPIRIT" (2 Cor. v. 4, 5). "And grieve not the HOLY SPIRIT of God, whereby ye are sealed unto the day of redemption" (Eph. iv. 30). "But if the Spirit of Him that raised up JESUS from the dead dwell in you, He that raised up CHRIST from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by His Spirit that dwelleth in you" (Rom. viii. 11). In Baptism He is the regenerating Spirit. "Except a man be born of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter into the Kingdom of Heaven" (St. John iii. 5). In Confirmation He giveth His sevenfold gifts. "And the Spirit of the LORD shall rest upon him, the Spirit of wisdom and understanding, the Spirit of counsel and might, the Spirit of knowledge and of the fear of the LORD, and shall make him of quick understanding in the fear of the LORD" (Is. xi. 2, 3; cf. Collect in Confirmation Office); and makes us Temples of God (1 Cor. iii. 16; vi. 19). We are renewed by Him (Tit. iii. 5; cf. Rom. xiv. 2). In Him we bear fruit (Gal. v. 22, 23; cf. St. John xv. 16); and we have all joy and peace in believing (Rom. xv. 13).

"By the HOLY GHOST is given the restoration of Paradise, the return into the kingdom of heaven, the restoration of the adoption of sons, the confidence of calling God our FATHER, the communion of the grace of CHRIST, the appellation of sons of light, the participation of eternal glory; in a word, the plenitude of benediction, both in the present time and in the future, of good things prepared for us." (St. Basil on the Holy Spirit, ch. xv.; Browne on XXXIX. Articles; Bishop Forbes on the Nicene Creed; Hare's Mission of the Comforter.)

Holy Table. The name used generally in the Prayer-Book for the synonymous titles, Altar and LORD's Table. In this the English Church follows the practice of the Eastern Church, where the word "Altar" is seldom used, while the word "Holy Table" is far more usual. But the term Communion-Table is used twice in the Prayer-Book in the Form of Consecration of a Church or Chapel. It seems to be an inadvertence, since the LORD's Table, the Holy Table, to which we are invited to feast, is not our table,—not the Communicant's Table. (Vide ALTAR.)
